The sergeant and two soldiers who were supposed to have perished of hunger, arrived on the 14th. They assure that the English followed them only for half an hour; that the Indians had taken fright without cause; that they quitted the spot on the 13th where the canoes are concealed, all which are safe as well as what has been left in them. Some Indians who are on their return from a scout to Fort George, report that they have seen some forty tents, and laborers working at the fortifications. This confirms that the English have conveyed the major part of their forces to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and will keep on the defensive in this quarter.

This, my Lord, is all the news we have of the English. I think that their expedition against Louisbourg will possibly lead us to organize one on this frontier.

I have the honor to be, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant

MALARTIC.

1757. 21st January. At nine o'clock in the morning, Mr. de Rouilly, an officer of the Colony, acting as Major at Fort Carillon, received orders from Mr. de Lusignan, the Commandant to proceed to Fort St. Frederic, and have some brandy and forage loaded there on eight sleighs, having eight horses harnessed to each, under an escort of fifteen soldiers and one sergeant. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Liébot, an officer of the Royal Rousillon, Varennes, a Colonial officer, two sleighs, with ten men, had gone ahead; being at Presqu'isle, Mr. de Rouilly discovered the enemy issuing from the wood to the number of seventy or eighty men, who captured there two sleighs, and seven out of the ten men who were in charge of them were taken prisoners. The other three escaped on horseback. The enemy, to the number of one hundred and twenty, then advanced at great speed, detached the swiftest runners among their men to cut off our people, but in vain. Under these circumstances M. de Rouilly sent off a man on horseback to the Commandant at Carillon, with news of what occurred. The latter, not wishing to have anything to reproach himself with, forthwith dispatched a detachment of one hundred men, including Indians, soldiers and Canadian volunteers to intercept them, under the command of Captains de Basserode, of the Languedoc, La Granville of La Reine, Lieutenants Dastrel of the Languedoc, and Langlade, a Colonial officer, with five Cadets; half an hour afterwards ten men were sent off to convey, to our detachment, provisions and ammunition, which it required.

About three o'clock in the afternoon this party halted and waited for the English, within three leagues of Fort Carillon, and seeing them come singing, allowed them to approach to within musket-shot, then saluted them with one-half of our musketry, the other having missed on account of the rain. This ceasing, the firing became brisk on both sides until nightfall, when the enemy, after retreating some time, posted themselves very advantageously. In this interval two Canadians went to notify the fort that the ammunition was exhausted; the Commandant immediately ordered off a detachment of twenty-five men, under the command of Mr. Le Borgne, a Colonial officer, to carry some to them.

In the course of the night the enemy abandoned the field of battle, in order to retire, which they effected, leaving their provisions, ammunition and the arms of the wounded.

The English have lost thirty-four men who remained on the field; of these, three were officers. On our side we lost two soldiers of La Reine, two of the Royal Rousillon, two of Languedoc, and one Colonial.

We have taken six prisoners, who report that the English in the two forts of Lake St. Sacrament number one thousand men, and that Governor-General Leudon is to send a considerable army to attack Fort St. Frederic.

It is calculated that we have lost, on this occasion, eleven soldiers in all, including Regulars and Colonists and one Sauter Indian, and that we have had twenty-seven wounded, among whom are Captain Basserode, of the Languedoc regiment, and M. Clapier.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General, determined in the month of January last, to send a considerable detachment to Lake St. Sacrament, to burn some sloops and bateaux which the English had had built under the guns of Fort St. George, situate at the head of Lake St. Sacrament, the storehouses full of provisions, with other buildings and a little stockaded fort occupied by an independent company; the object of this was, to prevent the enemy making any attempt at the opening of the spring, on Fort Carillon.

He confided the command hereof to M. de Rigaud, Governor of Three Rivers, whom, however, he ordered, should circumstances be favorable for carrying Fort George by escalade, to do all in his power to profit by them.

This detachment was composed of fifteen hundred men, to wit: five pickets of troops of the Line, one of which was grenadiers drawn from four companies under the command of Captain de Poulalières of the Royal Rousillon grenadiers; three hundred Colonials and six hundred and fifty Canadians, one company of which consisted of fifty volunteers, together with four hundred Indians. This detachment marched from Fort St. John between the 20th and 23<sup>d</sup> February, and did not arrive at Carillon until the 7th of March; the thaw continuing, it tarried at that fort until the 15th, when it started and went to camp on the shore of Lake St. Sacrament.

On the 16th one hundred Indians set off, at day-break, on a scout. The detachment debouched, two hours after, on the lake in three columns; the company of volunteers formed the van-guard; the scouts returned, having observed no trail.

17th Marched at early dawn; the corps set out at three o'clock in the afternoon to approach under cover of the night, and at seven o'clock in the evening found itself beneath a mountain a league and a half from Fort George.

18th Mr. de Rigaud detached Mess<sup>rs</sup> Poulaillières, Dumas and Lemerrier, escorted by Frenchmen and Indians, to observe the fort from a hill overlooking it within less than half a league's distance. The condition of the fort was thoroughly reconnoitred by means of a telescope. It did not appear accessible by ladder except at half of one of its faces; and the activity perceptible on the works, excited the suspicion that the enemy were informed of the march of the French.

On this report, Mr. de Rigaud made a twofold arrangement; to scale the fort, under the supposition that the security of the enemy was favorable to it; if unfavorable, to operate at the same moment on the outworks agreeably to his orders; the army moved, in consequence, in the beginning of the night of the 18th-19th.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> Du Mars, Lemerrier, Savourin and Charly, escorted by twelve grenadiers, were detached to reconnoitre the approaches of the fort, to observe, more closely, the facility or inconveniences of the projected operation and to determine, with more certainty, whether the detachment was discovered or not.

The ice was so smooth that night that the scouts could not walk without making noise; the hous of the English commenced early according as the party approached the sentinels. Those gentlemen observed the uneasy curiosity of the guard of the fort, which determined them to wait until midnight to approach nearer; but though gliding on silently, the guard of the fort was not less alert on the first motion of our scouts, which made the latter resolve on returning to report to Mr. de Rigaud the vigilance of the sentinels.

That Commander, to whom scaling appeared no longer practicable, turned his attention to the sloops and bateaux. He sent some gunners with fascines and artificial fire-works to burn the enemy's marine; but those fascines not being sufficiently combustible, day dawned before they had burnt anything but a few bateaux. The enemy kept up a pretty brisk fire that night, whereby two men were killed and one Indian wounded.

20th On the next day Fort George was invested on all sides; a detachment of Indians repaired to the Fort Lidius road to cut off the communication with Fort George, and the main body occupied itself in making new fascines.

Mr. de Rigaud dispatched Chevalier Le Mercier to summon the English Commandant verbally to surrender. He had recourse to this ruse to obtain information of a spot which appeared adapted to effect a landing in case our offensive operations were directed, next campaign, against this place.

He caused his little army to make a movement at the same time; passed it, as it were, in review, so as to make it appear considerable and let the enemy see the ladders.

The Commandant of Fort George answered Mr. Le Mercier that he should defend himself as long as possible. On the next night the fires were lighted without interruption, the enemy discharging only a few cannon-shot and some shells.

More than three hundred bateaux were burnt that night by the company of Canadian volunteers; three sloops caught in the ice shared the same fate, together with a store full of effects and implements for the campaign, and over three hundred cords of wood designed for fuel for the garrison of the fort; the slightest wind would have reduced this fort to ashes, but that and the following nights were calm.

During the night of the 21st and 22nd such an abundance of moist snow fell that it was impossible to continue operations.

The last sloop whose bowsprit touched one of the bastions of the fort, could not catch fire, as it was the largest and was still on the stocks. M. de Rigaud ordered every effort to be made to destroy it, in spite of the thaw which was threatening the return of the army to Carillon.

22nd. The fort always blockaded, new fascines were prepared. Mr. Volff, a partisan officer of the regular troops, took upon himself to burn the sloop; several Colonial officers set fire during the night, to two large stores full of provisions, which still remained standing; to the hospital, to a stockaded fort containing seventeen houses; and a large store full of building timber, a saw-mill and several houses which were going up under that fort; a sort of Lower Town, and to two species of 30-oar galleys; all were consumed.

The whole of these, as well as the bateaux and sloops, were so near the fort that the musketry defended its approaches; their fire was, notwithstanding, momentary.

Only five Frenchmen, in all, were killed; one officer and an Indian were wounded.

The pillage was considerable; the Indians were all night removing, to the camp, clothing of all sorts, guns, tents, a quantity of kettles, boxes, medicine chests, and barrels of various kinds of liquor, on which they got so drunk that they would have remained around the fort, wrapped in the sleep of drunkenness, had they not been removed before day. On the 23<sup>d</sup> the thaw always continuing, the little army set out on its return march to Carillon, where it arrived on the following day.

Louisbourg, 25th of June, 1757.

We have eighteen men of war in the harbor under the command of Mr. Dubois de la Motte,<sup>1</sup> who bears here the flag of Vice-Admiral, and Mr. Beaufremont, who came, with his fleet, from St. Domingo, bears the flag of Lieutenant-General. I send you, hereunto annexed, the list of these ships. This formidable army puts us at ease respecting all the attacks the English would make in that quarter.

You cannot believe how it makes us settle affairs of state; everybody already wants Acadia to belong to us; perhaps the opinion is founded on the commission given to Chevalier de Grasse, to proceed hence in a skiff to Halifax to ascertain the enemy's movements and strength.

He is accompanied by two most excellent experienced pilots and two Indian chiefs, in case he be obliged to abandon his craft and save himself in the woods. He is expected every day.

The King's ships Le Bizare and Le Célèbre, and the flyboat Le Fortune, with two transports, sail to-morrow for Quebec, to convey the two battalions of Berri, with their effects to that place.

A flying and observation camp has been established at Cabarrus for the reception of our enemies there, in case they wish to make a landing at that place. It is commanded by Mr. Joubert, a very experienced officer, and who will do good business should the enemy show their faces there. He has two hundred Indians, exclusive of the troop. Mr. Boishébert is moreover expected there every day with eight hundred men, Indians and Canadians.

Louisbourg, 1st July, 1757.

Chevalier de Grasse<sup>1</sup> has returned without having been able to reach the environs of Chibouctou, to make the observations he was charged with, but he has sent two Indians and a Canadian over land from Port Toulouse.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Paulmy.

Montreal, 11th July, 1757.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to write to you and to Count d'Argenson, by way of Louisbourg on the 24th April. You will receive duplicates of those letters with this despatch. I had also the honor to write him on the 22nd May; I expected to profit likewise by the way of Louisbourg, but as it failed, you will receive the letter with this, which will serve as a continuation of my last.

We have not yet received any of your despatches or orders. By the only letter the Marquis de Vaudreuil has had, I perceive that eight companies are sent to reinforce the battalions of La Reine and Languedoc. They have not yet arrived. I likewise observe that many drafts from the Foreign volunteer corps are sent over to serve equally in completing the Marines and troops of the Line; in forming ten additional companies for the Marine and to increase ours to 50. The arrival of the whole of these reinforcements, or at least of the greater part of them, is much desired; but I begin to be alarmed. Up to this date only 600 men have arrived, 180 of whom have been given to complete the land troops, which will be nearly 120.

From the date of my last until the first instant, our troops have been in the same position. M. de Bourlamaque has continued in command of the principal camp, that of Carillon; where the regiments of Bearn, Royal Rousillon and a Canadian corps are encamped, to the number of about 2,000 men; La Sarre is encamped at St. John, and employed in increasing its fortifications under the superintendence of Captain Desandrouins, of the Royal corps. Guyenne has been occupied at Chambly constructing a road there, which is required in time of war, and is of use in time of peace. M. de la Pauze, Adjutant of that battalion, has charge of that work. La Reine has remained at Quebec and Languedoc at Montreal; the major part of the Colonial troops in garrison; the Canadians busy farming.

M. de Bourlamaque, whose zeal and talents I cannot too highly extol, has observed the best regulations in his camp to hasten the Carillon works; to make preparations there for an expedition against Fort George, which had been certain, had the want of provisions not prevented us pressing the enemy. The soldier's ration had to be reduced; he submitted to it with a good will—without the slightest murmur.

We have had continually small parties of the enemy, which have brought us some prisoners. M. de Malartic, Adjutant of the regiment of Bearn, has made the detail of that camp. He and Adjutant de la Pauze, of the Guyenne, are two officers of high distinction.

I have been on a tour to our camps and posts with Chevalier de Levis. Such have been our arrangements up to the first of July. Our news excited fears, at first, for the Beautiful river; we heard from that quarter that the enemy, who had been considerably reinforced, was meditating a naval expedition which we supposed threatened Louisbourg. The intelligence which we just received from there, reassures us, whilst waiting the arrival of our squadron. But the situation of this Colony is always very critical. But few of the provisions required from France have reached us up to the present time. Yet 'tis necessary that we have abundance of them.

Last month a thousand Indians arrived here from the Upper country; many of them come from 4 to 500 leagues. 'Tis necessary to endeavor to turn to account the onerous sojourn of such a troop; therefore, the Marquis de Vaudreuil finally determined to search up provisions among the farmers, which produced something, and we are going to try to keep the field, although with forces inferior to those General Webb<sup>1</sup> is concentrating about Lake St. Sacrament. We believe my Lord Loudon is at Alifax.

About the 20th we shall call together some 7,000 men, viz: 2,000 of the Line; 1,000 Colonial, and 1,500 Indians with 2,500 Canadians. Our Indians are equally capable of determining in a quarter of an hour the gain or loss of an affair. We have a train of artillery all ready for the siege of Fort George, should circumstances permit.

Chevalier de Levis set out on the 3rd to make the last preparations. I have been obliged here to gratify the Indian Nations, who will not leave without me, and am obliged to pass my time with them in ceremonies as tiresome as they are necessary. On the day before yesterday I was to chant the war and made a feast for the Indians of the Lake of the Two Mountains; yesterday, for those of the Sault St. Louis; to-day held a Council with the Upper Indians. I start to-morrow and shall, on my arrival, hold a general Council to reunite them all, by presenting them a large Belt of Wampum in the name of the Great King, for whom they entertain the most profound respect and veneration.

We have been very careful not to mention to them the horrible attempt on his sacred person. It caused us all to shudder with horror, and these barbarians so ferocious in war, so humane in their lodges, might waver in their esteem for us, seeing us capable of producing such monsters.

Must Henry the Fourth and Louis the Fifteenth, to the disgrace of humanity, experience like fury?

We think we can reassure ourselves this campaign as regards the Beautiful river, and that the 400 men we have sent thither will be sufficient, with those already in those parts, and the Indians who are within call. We shall even be able to spread desolation into the Provinces bordering thereon, such as Virginia, Pennsylvania and Maryland.

Captain Pouchot, of the Bearn regiment, continues in command at Niagara with some pickets of the troops of the Line. He is very useful there, and has attracted the confidence of the Five Nations, domiciliated in the neighborhood, and with which he keeps up a considerable correspondence.

Six officers of the Corps Royal and four young men with commissions of Lieutenant, have arrived at Quebec for the regiment of La Reine. Possibly they have arrived without their companies, with which, it seems to me, it had been equally convenient to embark them.

M. Doreil is at Quebec. I left him there with a Captain and two Lieutenants to receive our recruits, companies and augmentations, and to forward them to us according as they arrive.

This Commissary continues to acquit himself of his duties with much assiduity.

I have the honor to render you an account, in a separate despatch, of the soldiers who will return to France. They are all incapable of serving. 'Tis so difficult to get any conveyed here, that I pay the most scrupulous attention to them.

We have had no change in our battalions since the close of the campaign. Lieutenant D'herce, of the La Sarre regiment, has asked to return to France. He has already lost one eye, and is threatened with the loss of the other. At the end of the campaign I shall have the honor of submitting to you the filling up of his vacancy as well all those which may occur.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant

MONTCALM.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Moras.

Montreal, the eleventh of July, One thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven.

My Lord,

Although I have had the honor to write you direct to present you my compliments and to render you the reports I owe you, as I have the honor to serve under your orders; I have considered it my duty to transmit this private letter to you through Madame Herault, and to give you proofs of my respectful confidence.

Occupied by my principal mission, I omit not to instruct myself respecting a country little known, and which people, I believe, have sought not to make known. M. de Bougainville, with whose sagacity you are acquainted, labors still more than I do, in accomplishing that object, and will, perhaps, be able, some day, if we ever return to our country, to be useful to it and to this Colony, by depositing in the breast of an enlightened Minister, some memoirs which, probably, would never have seen the light, had he not come into office.

My commission is a delicate one; I am very subordinate and must be so in comparison with the Intendant, a man of genius and intelligence. I have only to congratulate myself on the circumstance. With the General no one will ever perceive that I have to complain, and the service will always proceed as well as 'twill be in my power. He is a kind man, mild, with no character of his own, surrounded by men who seek to destroy all confidence he might have in the General of the land forces; I am extolled overmuch in order to excite his jealousy, foster Canadian prejudice, and to oblige him not to deal openly with me, and not to adopt my ideas except of necessity.

I dare say that my conduct has always been as uniform as it has been respectful. You, my Lord, alone can apply a remedy, without in any wise changing a strict subordination which is necessary by writing in such a manner as to inspire confidence, to manifest some esteem for me, and to desire that my opinions, as regards military operations, may be somewhat listened to. This would at once determine my influence in this country.

What would be at the same time necessary, would be a sealed letter, to be opened only in case of the Marquis de Vaudreuil's death, wherein I should find an order to assume the command of the Colony, and of all the troops until you had nominated a Governor-General.

The contingency had been nigh occurring this winter, the Marquis de Vaudreuil having been very ill. The public mind was agitated to learn whether I should have the command in the Colony, which would be the wish of everybody, even of the Intendant, seeing the incapacity of him on whom the government of the country would have devolved, namely, M. Rigaud, who must assume the reins as senior Deputy-Governor; and this shortsighted man, always led by the first comer, would have seriously embarrassed the Intendant; failing him, it would have been a simple King's Lieutenant, and so on from one to another, to even a simple Colonial Captain, in preference to a general officer who, by his commission, is only nominally under the Marquis de Vaudreuil's orders, and who, in the field, commands all the others.

The precaution I suggest to you appears to me necessary for the good of the service. Before I left Paris, I knew enough of the form of the government of this Colony to have foreseen this difficulty, but I confess to you that I did not believe myself sufficiently the choice or the intimate of the Minister of Marine to dare speak to him about it.

I flatter myself, my Lord, that you will be pleased to concur with the Marquis de Paulmy in procuring some marks of favor for a corps of land troops which now belongs to you.

I have nothing to say to you respecting Chevalier de Levis; you know him, and I cannot have a better second; but you are not acquainted with M. de Bourlamaque, whose selection has been more blamed than approved.

Count de Maillebois<sup>1</sup> and M. de Chevert<sup>2</sup> were nevertheless justified in proposing him; I was never acquainted with him in Europe; our troops were not prejudiced in his favor; they now render him as much justice as I; he is a most excellent officer; he has acquired much and gained a great deal within a year.

M. de Bougainville transmits you, through M<sup>de</sup> Herault, a Memoir on this Colony, which is merely a prelude to more ample details to be transmitted to you, but to be postponed to the peace, when it will be necessary, without losing a moment, to correct the abuses and encourage the military state of the Colony.

What a Colony! What a people, when called on! What an advantage could a Colbert turn them to; you occupy his post, and are his worthy successor.

They all possess talent and courage at bottom, but up to the present time, nothing has animated that machine or served to develop the existing germs.

M. de Bougainville will likewise send you, at the close of the campaign, a Memoir on the Boundaries. As he communicates his ideas to me on this subject, and as we confer on it, you will learn therefrom my opinion, and whether his differs from mine. He will submit both of them with the reasons.

I have requested only two favors from the Keeper of the Seals; some allowances for my third Aid-de-Camp, who has none; 'twill be more agreeable to him and me to receive them from the King.

A commission of Clerk of the Marine for Sieur Estève Jeune, a gentleman and man of intelligence, and the nephew of him who was Advocate of the clergy. If you have had the goodness, in the labor you will have performed for the Colony, to grant me these two favors, I present you my thanks in advance; if you have considered it your duty to defer them, I shall once more, my Lord, renew the request at the close of the campaign, and more in detail.

I take the liberty to recommend to you M. de Montcalm de St. Veran, an old Lieutenant of the Navy, in the department of Toulon; he has sacrificed everything up to the present time — property, fortune, law suits, to the love of serving.

<sup>1</sup> YVES MARIE DESMARETZ, Count de Maillebois, son of the Marquis de M., Marshal of France, was born in 1715, and served under his father in the wars of Italy. He was appointed Lieutenant-General in 1748; was employed in the war of Spain, and distinguished himself at the taking of Port Mahon. He served next in Germany, under Marshal d'Estrées, against whom he brought charges of inefficiency, which, however, brought only disgrace on the accuser, who was committed to the Citadel of Doullens. He was recalled to active service in 1784, but was denounced in 1790, and indicted for having drawn up a plan of counter-revolution. He fled in consequence to the Low Countries, and died at Liege, 14th December, 1791. Biographie Universelle. — Ed.

<sup>2</sup> Lieutenant-General FRANÇOIS DE CHEVERT was born at Verdun sur Meuse, February, 21st 1695, and was left an orphan at early life; he joined a marching regiment at the age of eleven years, and served as a private soldier until 1710, when he was appointed Sub-Lieutenant. He reached the grade of Lieutenant-Colonel in 1741, and made the campaign of Bohemia, and commanded the Grenadiers when scaling the walls of Prague, which he was the first to enter; was created Brigadier in consequence; next distinguished himself as Governor of that city, when, in his turn, besieged, and marched out in 1743, with the honors of war. He afterwards served with distinction in Italy; was created Major-General in 1744, and Lieutenant-General in 1748. To him is due the victory of Hastenbeck, in 1757; he obtained the Grand Cross of St. Louis, in 1758, and served until 1761. He had the good sense of never being ashamed of his humble origin, and died at Paris, 24th January, 1769, aged sixty-four years. Ibid.

I dare assure you that he has a great many campaigns and favorable notices in your bureaux, and I fear not to say to you with all confidence that I request your permission to entertain in my Minister, that he will have either to be promoted or put on the retired list; he has been a long time in the service; is qualified for more than one employment; has been long an Ensign of the Company of Gardes Marines, and had the reputation of being loved, feared and respected by those young nobles.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Maurepas and E. Rouillé, desired successively to enrol him some day in that company.

I notice in his letters a latent disgust unless you sustain his emulation, and I fear my answer will not arrive in time to check it, if any of his juniors have been promoted.

He has a nephew who is mine, being the son of a Montcalm; his name is La Deveze and he is Ensign in the Navy; I have received a good report of him; he has appeared to me to have application. I asked him of M. de Machault, who had put him on board the frigate that brought me to America. I ask you in his name, my Lord, to let him see a great deal of service and to grant him protection, should you receive a good account of him. I shall be very grateful to you in return, and shall consider the favors you will be pleased to grant them, as conferred personally on myself.

As for me, my Lord, I ask no other favor than my recall at the earliest moment possible. Should it be the opinion that my second, or any other European general officer, would succeed better as Chief, I would always quit without difficulty a country where I am wasting my health; where I fear not to be as expeditious in the King's service as I would desire, and where the General will be occupied only in detracting from the share the Land forces and I may have in successes, and in rendering us responsible for those events which may be unsuccessful.

I wish the unfortunate and too much to be pitied M. de Dieskaw were in Paris; he must have made some reflections, and has no other fault than to have been ignorant of the Colony, and to have placed too much reliance on what had been told him.

Therefore, my Lord, recall me as soon as possible; if, however, there be, at the peace, an interval between the news and the departure of the troops, were it but of three months, I offer to go and look, with military and political views, at Detroit and the Beautiful river; but without an order from you, I should be refused permission to go and reconnoitre any part of the Colony where the business of the war will not per force take me, and I greatly wish never to have any for going to defend or retake the Beautiful river, although I have already drafted a plan, should the case ever occur.

My pay is only twenty-five thousand livres; I have none of the perquisites of the Governors or Intendants of Canada, I must support a Staff; I do nothing beyond, neither do I anything beneath, my station.

I am obliged to give myself importance, single handed; no person seeks to give me any here; they would fain try to deprive me of it, but they will not succeed. M. de Machault admitted that I was not adequately paid; he promised to make it up to me and to attend to it. I did not come here to carry home money; but should be sorry to make a hole here in the little patrimony of six children.

I have, nevertheless, expended ten thousand francs beyond my allowance, and shall continue since the expense I incur is necessary. I flatter myself you will assist me to pay my debts.

I have not the honor to write this letter to the Minister of Marine, but to M. de Moras, one of the most virtuous men of our age, and for whom I entertain the most profound esteem and all possible respect; wherefore I request that this letter be only for him and not for his bureau.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. My Lord, I have just seen the promotions of the Marine, and it only remains for me to express to you my gratitude for having been pleased to procure M. de Montcalm St. Véran his step. I request the continuation of your protection both for him and myself.

Montreal, 12th July, 1757.

My Lord,

I resume the details I have the honor to report to you of whatever occurred of interest around Carillon.

A party of ninety-two Indians and eight soldiers of the Marine, commanded by Sieur d'Anglade attacked near Fort Lidius, some wood cutters who were out with an escort, he at first took four prisoners and a number of scalps, but we had one Indian dangerously wounded, and whilst a litter was making to remove him, a strong English detachment came in pursuit of our party, which could not resist in consequence of inferiority of force. Nevertheless Sieur d'Anglade did not abandon the wounded Indian whom he brought to Fort Carillon, accompanied only by six Indians. A party of Iroquois found the five canoes which had conveyed Sieur d'Anglade's party and brought them back to Carillon, so that the English had not even the satisfaction of having captured a single one of our conveyances.

A party under the command of Sieur Langy de Montegron, took two Englishmen on the river of Orange.

A detachment of two hundred and thirty-five cadets and Indians having proceeded to the head of the Bay, hid their canoes. A party of sixty English, who were lying in ambush at the mouth of the Wood creek, fired on our men; M. de Richerville la Coulonnerie was killed. We had some Indians wounded mortally, and others less severely. As the river is lined at this point by inaccessible rocks, it was impossible for our detachment to land on the side where the enemy was. On the day following it went in hot pursuit, but could overtake only two Moraingans and one wounded Englishman. Our Indians were so furious that they tore one of the Moraingans to pieces.

A party of our Indians encountered a detachment of English scouts, and attacked it so vigorously and firmly, that the English found safety only in flight. They escaped with the loss of twelve prisoners, and three English killed, whom our Indians scalped.

It appears from the report of the last prisoners, that several ships have arrived from old England with considerable artillery;

That Lord Lawdon embarked on a naval expedition against Louisbourg or Canada. That he has taken with him the regular troops, only a few remaining on the frontier; that the Scotch have followed him along with the rest;

That there are about two thousand Militia at Fort George, and two thousand five hundred at Fort Lidius; that there are, at the former fort, thirty pieces of cannon, two barks carrying twelve swivels (pierriers), about forty bateaux; that considerable provisions have been conveyed thither, but that these prisoners had heard that this artillery was to be removed to Philadelphia, as an attack was apprehended at that place.

That General Webb appeared at the other side of the river, and that he was attended by three or four thousand men; that, nevertheless, the English did not expect any attack on our side; but that if Fort George were besieged, a gun was to be fired from fort to fort, as far as Orange, and that an additional reinforcement of two or three thousand men perhaps would come.

That the English were not occupying the islands opposite Fort George, and that no person was there.

Finally, that small-pox was prevailing in both the forts and at Orange.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.

Montreal, 12th July, 1757.

My Lord,

You will have seen, by the despatch I had the honor to write to the Keeper of the Seals on the 18th of April, whatever was of interest in the posts on the Beautiful river, and the measures I have adopted for the greater security of that quarter.

M. de Ligneris, in consequence of my orders, has had parties constantly out to harass the enemy.

He lost no time in obtaining satisfaction for the loss of the Canadian who was killed, and of the one who was taken near Fort Duquêne; for a detachment commanded by M. de Niverville, came, after a campaign of thirty-three days, within reach of Fort Cumberland, and though it was impossible for him to approach it, in consequence of the dread our Indians had of being surrounded, there being considerable snow on the ground, he nevertheless, took four prisoners in the settlements bordering on the river called Potsmak, in Virginia, about fifteen leagues from Fort Cumberland; burned ten houses and the like number of barns full of wheat; killed twenty horses or cows. This trifling success ought to show the enemy that the severest season of the year does not protect them against our incursions.

Another party, headed by M. de Montmidy, returned with eight scalps and seven prisoners taken on the frontiers of Pennsylvania.

Mr. de Rocheblave returned, likewise, with a prisoner taken on the bank of the same River Potowmack, three days' march from Fort Cumberland.

M. De Verger St. Blin took two scalps and one prisoner near Fort Cumberland. A party of Indians of Kanaouagon,<sup>1</sup> which was to join M. de St. Blin by another road to attack another fort, on returning overtook a party of English and Indians, of whom they killed one, wounded another and took a third prisoner. These Indians had scalped several English and Catabas, but were obliged to abandon them, not being able to resist the superiority of the enemy's forces.

A party of eight Poutéontamis and four Outaouas has returned with two scalps and one prisoner.

A party of Senecas attacked a fort beyond Cumberland, killed four men, two of whom only they could scalp, because they were surrounded by an English detachment.

Another party of the same Nation killed eight English, but on returning was overtaken by a hundred English or Indians; lost three men including the chief of the party.

As the Catabas, or at least a part of that Nation, joined the English, I sent several parties of the Five Nations to make war on them in the view of inducing them to abandon the English, which I would dare hope from the blows inflicted on them.

M. de Normenville, who was in the field since the 15th of April, arrived about a month afterwards at Fort Duquesne with three scalps, one of an Englishman and two of Indians or some other Nation. He met, a short distance on this side of the height of land, five men who appeared to him to be scouts, whom he pursued, killed three and could not overtake the other two. He lost a Seneca who was killed on that occasion.

M. de Montisambert, who was at the head of a party of two hundred men of different Nations, did not meet the success that might be expected. His party divided itself before coming to Fort Cumberland. That officer was unable to continue his journey as he fell dangerously ill about the height of land, where he remained waiting for his Indians. He arrived at Fort Duquêne with three scalps, which a party of twenty men had brought him from the vicinity of Fort Cumberland; the other sections of the same party returned with two prisoners and one scalp.

Three Delawares<sup>2</sup> were attacked fifteen leagues from Fort Duquêne by about fifteen English, three of whom they killed but brought away only one scalp, not having time to remove the others, one of these Indians having been wounded.

A party of Senecas and Cayugas struck a blow in the country of Northampton, in Pennsylvania, and brought back only one scalp; the reason they alleged for this was, that not being in the habit of going to war against the English, they had considerable recruiting to do; to effect which they had given three men and three women; that they had killed ten English, having repeated their attacks several times. They are highly pleased with their journey; they state that they have also killed an officer; that they have been obliged to go down very far into the cleared country to effect a blow; that they have burnt a number of houses and killed an infinity of cattle.

M. de Montcourt, a Cadet returned, after eighty-five days' absence, with two scalps taken in Pennsylvania.

Other parties who have been on forays in the same direction, have come back with five prisoners and four scalps.

Finally, the Delawares captured a fort in the winter, within four leagues of the one taken by Chevalier de Villiers. Last year they attacked a convoy, killed all the conductors, took away a considerable part of the provisions and concealed the remainder.

A party of the same Nation carried a prisoner to M. de Ligneris.

Our losses in the other rencontres we have had with the English, consist of two Senecas, one Chaouanon and three Delawares.

The English have not had any other advantages over us up to the 15th of June, when we lost Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Saussaye, St. Ours, and Bellêtre, the first an Ensign of foot in the troops of Isle Royale, and the two others seconded Ensigns in those of this Colony. These three officers were returning with three Canadians from Fort Cumberland, where they had no opportunity to strike, and were killed with the three Canadians, a little on this side of the height of land, by twenty Englishmen or Indians who were lying in ambush there, and who shot them point blank.

M. de Ligneris sent a Belt to the Delawares at the other side of the mountains to engage them in my name to come immediately to join their brethren and to range themselves under our flag. The two Indians he entrusted this Belt to, belong to the same Nation and the same village; they saw the Delawares at the end of the fall and spent the winter at Chingué. If we rely on what they told M. de Ligneris before their departure, there would be reason to believe that the whole of that Nation is firmly resolved to abandon the English forever, and to unite with us, but a prisoner has reported that these Delawares who have fought with the English, have gone, notwithstanding, to talk with them and make their peace. This merits confirmation.

The prisoners have reported to M. de Ligneris:

That the English have eleven forts to cover the settlements of Virginia; that there are other forts besides, the number of which is unknown to them; that there are about twenty Militia in each of those forts except one which is only five leagues from Fort Cumberland.

That in the Province of Maryland there is a fort called Frederic<sup>1</sup> garrisoned by five hundred men, whither considerable provisions have been conveyed.

That the English are fortifying themselves at Wenchester.

That the English were making every effort to conclude peace with the Nations on the Beautiful river and its environs, to whom they had sent messages everywhere to induce them to remain quiet. This report is true; it cost me no little trouble to acquire a knowledge of all these messages and to withdraw them from the hands of our Indians.

M. de Ligneris took pains to have scouts abroad in every direction, and has learned by those who have been, since spring, in the direction of Pennsylvania and Maryland, that towards the height of land, the tracks of men and horses showed two main roads; this circumstance induces him to send scouts frequently in that direction, without, however, neglecting Fort Cumberland.

It might well be that the English were forming new establishments to serve them as entrepôts. I have recommended M. de Ligneris to do his best to ascertain what the real object may be.

Some Indians have also reported to M. de Ligneris that they have discovered some high roads, on which they have seen a number of the enemy.

He learned at the same time, from a prisoner that the English are making preparations, collecting provisions of all sorts and horses in the different Provinces, for an attack on Fort Duquène; that they have three hundred Indians who are continually on the mountains; that four hundred men are at another post in Pennsylvania, and four hundred at Maryland; but this prisoner has added that he did not know where their rendezvous was; that he had seen only four pieces of cannon with twenty wagons in a small village of Pennsylvania; that the English have five hundred Regulars, one company of which are Grenadiers.

I do not think the English will attack M. de Ligneris; but though they make some movement this year, I have neglected nothing to place him in a condition to resist them, for, independent of his garrison, of the Militia and Nations inhabiting the Beautiful river, and of the Militia I have sent him from this Colony, he has actually, at his disposal, some Militia and some Indian Nations of Illinois; and, for greater security, I issued orders in the month of April to the Commandants of Niagara and of all the posts on the Beautiful river, to send their forces in rotation, from one post to the other, and to keep themselves always in readiness to afford each other mutual assistance. This gives me reason to hope that, should the English organize any expedition, they will fail.

But for the preservation of the Beautiful river, on which depends the security of all the posts of the Upper countries, 'tis indispensable that we fortify Fort Duquène in such a manner as to enable it to sustain a siege. There is no doubt but the English will attempt it, especially if we defer placing ourselves in a position to resist the forces they may organize. 'Tis less difficult than ever for them to penetrate so far with an army. General Braddock opened the road for them in 1755; he came within three leagues of Fort Duquène, and fortunately for us, his vast projects aborted there. Fort Duquène, in its present condition, could not offer any resistance to the enemy; 'tis too small to lodge the garrison necessary on such an occasion. A single shell would be sufficient to get it so on fire, that 'twould be impossible to extinguish it because the houses are too close. The garrison would then find itself under the painful necessity of abandoning that fort. Besides, 'tis so near the confluence of the Beautiful river with the Malangaillée, that it is always exposed to be entirely submerged by the overflowing of the rivers. M. de Ligneris is having such repairs done to that fort as it is susceptible of, regard being had to its bad situation; but that will not enable us to dispense with the erection of a new fort. I have incontrovertibly established the necessity thereof, in my letters of 1755 and 1756.

I feel less apprehension for Fort Duquène and the other posts on the Beautiful river, this campaign, than for the future. I have this year fortunately surmounted the impossibility of victualing that post from this Colony, through my foresight in supplying any deficiency in a great measure, by having provisions sent from Detroit and also from the post of the Illinois; and had I neglected these two resources, ever so little, that is to say, had I not issued and repeated, during the winter, the most urgent orders to the Commandants of those two posts, the Beautiful river would be at present wholly unprovided with provisions, and consequently all our forts abandoned.

The extreme scarcity we are suffering, only too severely, in the interior of the Colony, will not fail to make itself felt but too sensibly on the Beautiful river. 'Tis absolutely impossible for me to remedy it, otherwise than by the orders I gave M. de Ligneris to send off a detachment of one hundred and fifty or two hundred men to the Illinois, and to disperse the garrisons of the forts under his command. This winter, perhaps, will he be obliged even to reduce them to a very small number. I have already written several letters to the Commandants of Detroit and Illinois, to put themselves at that moment in a condition to transmit, at the opening of the navigation, for the victualing of the posts on the Beautiful river, the largest quantity of provisions of all descriptions that they could spare, by restricting the settlers to their mere subsistence. I have likewise issued orders to the Commandant of Fort Chartres, to forward to M. de Ligneris any reinforcements that officer will demand of him, in Militia and Indian Nations of the Illinois.

'Tis impossible for me, my Lord, to demonstrate more distinctly to what extremity the people are reduced, when a scarcity of provisions frequently prevails.

I am with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.

Montreal, 12th July, 1757.

My Lord,

You will see by one of my letters of this day's date, whatever of interest occurred on Lake St. Sacrament since the first of June, and the result of the reports of the prisoners of Fort George and Fort Lidius.

The letter you did me the honor to write me on the 28th of February, has greatly contributed to determine me to defer no longer the marching an army capable of reducing these two forts.

I have, in fact, my Lord, seen by that letter that the troops and ammunition which his Majesty has destined for this Colony ought to have sailed in the month of March. I doubted not that such would be the case with the transports freighted for the contractor; which makes me confident that provisions would soon be abundant in the Colony.

That the information you received had forewarned you of the designs of the English against Louisbourg and perhaps on Quebec, but that his Majesty had provided for the security of these two places, and destined naval forces capable of resisting those of the enemy.

That his Majesty's intention was that I should not lose sight of the operations I might have meditated in the direction of the frontier.

I therefore decided on making a powerful effort to reduce Fort George and Fort Lidius. Having formed that project towards the end of autumn, I felt the necessity of it more than ever and that on that movement depended, incontestably, the safety of the Province; for supposing that the English should really come to Quebec, I could, with difficulty, resist them at the same time on all sides.

I was not less preoccupied with the consequences of a check, should we have the misfortune of experiencing one on the frontier, as nothing could then prevent the English penetrating to Montreal whilst the other forces of the Colony would be engaged in the defence of Quebec.

Our situation, also, in respect to provisions has been another of my motives to press this expedition, for whilst remaining on the defensive, those which we have would be equally consumed; indeed, a little more slowly. But by that economy I would leave, in a state of inactivity, eighteen hundred Indians who have an extreme desire to assist at a siege, and I should afford the enemy time to provide everything he might require to come to attack us; and supposing that then we should not have received any provisions, I should find it really impossible for me to provide for the subsistence of the army which I should be obliged to oppose to the enemy.

The consequences of this scarcity would be still more unfortunate. I should witness, under my eyes, our grain that would have arrived at maturity, languish on the land with no one to harvest it.

Besides, I flatter myself that the provisions we shall find in the English forts will indemnify us twofold for those we shall have consumed on the expedition, and I am sure of the return of all our Canadians in season to save their harvest.

The more important is this expedition, the more bent am I on doing my best to assure its success.

For that purpose, I have placed at the disposal of the Marquis de Moncalm an army of about nine thousand men, composed of Regulars of the Line, the detachment of Marines, Canadians and Indians, with a respectable train of artillery. He set out to-day for Carillon. I hope he will be able to begin his march towards Fort George before the end of this month, Chevalier de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque having accelerated everything agreeably to the orders I had given them.

I have had the greatest facility in organizing that army through the good disposition of the Regulars, Marines, Canadians and Indians. The only obstacle I experienced was in victualing the army, which I could effect only by sending circular letters throughout the parishes of this government.

The Canadians have been so moved thereby, that they have voluntarily given up the little reserves they had made for their subsistence. They actually live on Indian corn, milk and vegetables; have neither flour nor pork; they have surrendered what they possessed with as much generosity as zeal for the King's service; but 'tis very essential, my Lord, that M. de Moncalm's departure be not subjected to any delay, so that he may anticipate the enemy and not consume in vain the provisions of his army, which it would be absolutely beyond my power to renew.

I have expressly enjoined on him:

1st To march with all his force, so as not to run the risk of receiving any check.

2nd Not to confine himself to the reduction of Fort George; to reduce Fort Lidius also; to pay particular attention carefully to preserve the munitions of war, artillery and arms to be found in these two forts, and to have them all removed to Carillon, after the total destruction of both forts and all their dependencies.

3rd Afterwards to disband all the Indian Nations and to form them into detachments for the purpose of laying waste the settlements of Orange and Corlac.

M. Rigaud de Vaudreuil makes the same campaign with the troops of the Marine; the Canadians and Indians have earnestly requested me to place him at their head, which has gratified him so much the more, as the Marquis de Moncalm had already expressed to me the pleasure he would feel at being accompanied by him, especially having perfectly recognized last winter the part in which he is to operate. I am well persuaded of his exactness and activity in executing the Marquis de Moncalm's orders and his ardor in seeking for opportunities of affording new proofs of his zeal for the King's service and attachment to Fatherland.

If, as I have reason to believe, M. de Moncalm fulfill his mission according to my orders, we shall have no more to apprehend from the enemy on the frontier who, as a necessary consequence, will be forced to abandon, also, his project against Quebec, being no longer able to operate a sufficiently considerable diversion of our forces.

I am with the most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.

Montreal, 13th July, 1757.

My Lord,

Since I had the honor of writing to the Keeper of the Seals, on the 17th of April, to report to him my negotiations with the Five Nations, I have continued to keep the domiciliated tribes of the Beautiful river busy. They have sent two English scalps to the Five Nations with a message whereby they remind them of their promises to succor those tribes should any Nation trouble them; and that time presses. They have called on them to keep their word. This proceeding, joined to my other negotiations, has had a good effect.

About fifty Senecas, headed by one of the principal chiefs of the Five Nations, on whom I can rely, arrived at Niagara. When the Council assembled, that chief presented to these Senecas one of my Belts, and speaking to them and the Five Nations, said:

"Here's the axe our father has presented to us that we may avenge the continued treacheries of the English; I have accepted it with all those who have been at Montreal, I present it to you and invite you to follow my example." The tribes of the Bear and Beaver accepted it and offered it to the two other tribes of the Wolf and the Tortoise, who all accepted it. 'Twas afterwards carried to the five other tribes who received it with pleasure and all with one accord unanimously say: "We are going to try M. de Vaudreuil, our Father's, axe on the English, to see if it cut well."

A Cayuga Chief, for whom M. Pouchot had sent, to penetrate the real dispositions of the Five Nations, told him that they required time to withdraw all the Mohawks from the English, for which purpose they had sent one chief from each village to them.

I had instructed that chief to report to me all the deliberations adopted in the Council of the Nontagués. He failed not to attend it, and told M. Pouchot that the deliberations of that Council might be of long duration; that, meanwhile, the war parties were not less active.

This chief assures, that since he and the other chiefs had reported to the Five Nations the Council I held with them at Montreal, they had all resolved to recognize only the Master of Life and their Father, Ononthio; that the English had sent three Belts to them, but they were not willing to receive them.

Some Oneida Deputies came to Montreal in the beginning of May, who requested of me, by a Belt, not to have my axe carried between their village and the Fork. They made many other speeches to me to assure me of the purity of their sentiments, but I was no more satisfied with them than with the first.

I told them that did I love them less, I would not have received that Belt; that it was utterly opposed to the sentiments I knew their ancients entertained; that they could not have forgotten the Belt which the Five Nations had given me in the Great Council I held with them at the beginning of last winter, to tell me that, were the forts which the English have built in their villages not razed on their arrival home, they were resolved to burn them; that they would not suffer the English to come among them, and that they would aid, by all means in their power, my warriors and children of the other Nations, when passing over their territory to strike the English.

I made them all the reproaches they deserved for the non-performance of their promise, and repeated to them that, whenever I thought proper, I should send war parties everywhere the English would happen to be.

I had several secret conferences with the chiefs and the most influential of these Deputies. 'Twould be too long, my Lord, to report them to you precisely. Suffice it that I have the honor to inform you, that the upshot of all these conferences was agreeable to my wishes; in fact, all these Deputies, in the name of their Nation and of the Thaskarorins, accepted my hatchet with ardor, and expressed to me an extreme desire to use it. They chanted the war song with expressions which permit me not to doubt the sincerity of their desire to strike the English.

Since the settlement of the Colony, the Five Nations have never been known to take up the hatchet against the English, whilst, on the contrary, experience has only too well shown that those Nations were much more partial to them than to the French.

Independent of the blows which the Five Nations have inflicted on the English, report whereof I have the honor to render you in other despatches, there are at least twenty parties of Senecas and Cayugas in the field, to wage war against the English and against the Catawbas.

The Senecas have told M. Pouchot that some of the first parties had returned to the village with some English prisoners.

One of these parties had killed sixteen Englishmen.

Several other parties have returned with a considerable number of English scalps and prisoners, and again start immediately on the war path.

A party of fifteen Senecas was less fortunate; after having scalped two, it fell into an ambush of three hundred English and one hundred Indians of the Dog tribe. The party killed fifteen English and two Indians, but lost three of its own men.

Colonel Johnson had recourse to every means to prevail on the Five Nations to postpone any attack, and to induce them to return my axe; but the warriors to whom this Colonel's Belts had been presented, have, despite the fair promises accompanying them, refused to listen to him, and had him told that I had cleared a good path for them, which they would stick to.

These first overtures having been unsuccessful, Colonel Johnson sent word to the Five Nations, at least to let my hatchet sleep for an instant. He had the weakness to tell them that it was very painful for him not to be able to go out of his house without exposing himself to the risk of having his skull cracked; how ungrateful they were to kill his cattle, which he regarded as their foster mother; finally, he invited them to go to Orange to receive some presents. He promised them that they would be clothed there and that he would give them anything they would require. The Five Nations have laughed at this speech; they sent word to Colonel Johnson that he was beginning to cry very early; that he would soon see something very different; that they had made up their packs; that they would not listen to his proposal and were about starting to try my hatchet.

I shall neglect nothing to maintain the Five Nations in, and even to increase, their present favorable dispositions.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.

Montreal, 13th July, 1757.

My Lord,

In my letter of the 18th of April, I have had the honor to report to the Keeper of the Seals that the Delawares of Théoga, whom I had attracted to Niagara, had informed M. Pouchot that the English had nine forts around them, one of which contained a garrison of six hundred men; this exacted the more attention on my part, as an English prisoner had already made the same report to me.

As these forces are within reach of Presqu'île and the River au bœuf, I gave orders to the Commandants of these two posts to have scouts constantly abroad in that quarter. I caused express recommendations to be given to all the Indians, and particularly to the Delawares, to inform the Commandant of the first post at which they might arrive, of the enemy's movements as soon as any should be perceptible.

M. de la Chauvignerie sent M. de St. Ours with six Canadians and fourteen Indians on a scout to the English fort containing a garrison of six hundred men. This fort is on the upper part of the River Zinanchain and positively in the proximity of Fort Machault. Sieur de St. Ours took two scalps within sight of that fort, but he was unable to make any prisoners.

A party of fifteen Loups of the same village of Théoge, which is in the vicinity of the fort in question,<sup>1</sup> brought to M. Pouchot, at Niagara, a German prisoner belonging to Bathleem, in Pennsylvania, with five scalps.

Another party of the same tribe brought another prisoner.

I was informed that the English had caused five hundred bateaux to be constructed at Skamoken, on the River Canestio; that a Delaware had even seen them; that the English were still busy building other bateaux and were giving out that they would march ten thousand men to reduce all the forts on the Beautiful river.

I felt the necessity of assuring myself of the Loups of Chaamonaqué or Théoga. 'Twas no trifling matter, but by dint of having Belts secretly conveyed to them, they sent me word that they would send their families to the neighborhood of Presqu'île, to plant Indian corn, and that all the warriors would rendezvous at Théoga, to oppose the enemy's march.

I profited by every opportunity to send some Indians to that quarter. A Seneca told me that more than one hundred men had gone with the Loups to the River Canestio, to harass the English, who are very numerous about Skamoken, where they are really building bateaux; that he felt a pleasure in killing the English; that the river had only to be crossed and they were all found in a heap.

Cadet de Chevigny, accompanied by a single Indian, was on the banks of the River Polowmack, where they killed an Englishman and took a French renegade prisoner, whose head the Iroquois broke on the way, because he could not march; Sieur de Chevigny burned two houses which were abandoned; a small fort, also abandoned, and four barns full of wheat.<sup>1</sup>

A party of seven Indians sent out by M. de la Chauvignerie returned with seven prisoners and three scalps, which they took in the direction of Pennsylvania. This party had ranged around Skamokin; but the English kept so strictly on their guard that our Indians could not find an opportunity to strike a blow; this obliged them to push farther into the interior of the country, to discover some settlements, having seen about forty houses abandoned.

It is to be presumed that the settlers had retired to Skamoken with their cattle, the Indians of the same party having assured that they had seen considerable movements in the neighborhood of the English fort, and that there was not a single person in the surrounding country.

Other parties, arrived at different intervals, having likewise assured that the settlements at a distance from the forts were deserted, and that all the small stockades which the English had erected last year, to cover their frontiers, were vacated.

I was informed of negotiations of the English to destroy mine with the Loups of Théoga; that many Indians of that nation had assisted at them, but on a message which I sent to their chiefs, the latter had departed with their warriors to go in search of those Indians, and had sent me word that in case they would not listen to them, they should be treated as real Englishmen. These Loups had been seduced by an English Interpreter who had made them considerable presents.

Some time after I learned that all was quiet among the Loups; that they had concluded their planting; that the chiefs who had been to Philadelphia, had returned and had engaged their young men to go to war against the English.

These Indians reported that a great chief had arrived at Philadelphia (this is doubtless General Lawdun); that he had held a great council there with the other chiefs of the country; when he was told that Colonel Johnson had caused his brethren of the Five Nations to be invited; that this great chief got into a considerable passion; that he had said that Colonel Johnson was wrong to call any one brother and ally; that the country of the Five Nations and that of the Beautiful river belonged to the King of England; that he knew the Five Nations and almost all the Indians sided with the French; but as soon as the grass was a little high, the Governor of Canada would be dead, and that he would march everywhere; that he was not afraid of the French; that though he should lose a great many men on account of the Indians, he would not give in; that he, too, had Indian friends whom he would bring with him.

The Loups have assured me that it was impossible for the English to come and attack Presqu'île, owing to the difficulty of ascending the river, where the English would expose themselves to be defeated by a handful of men, and that moreover it would be necessary that they should pass through their villages.

An Englishman told me he passed a hundred times in the river of Canestio to Skamoken; that it is of very trifling circumstance—about as wide as the Niagara river, but rather a torrent than a river; full of rapids, shoals and large boulders; that the most that could be done would be to ascend the river in very small bateaux by towing; that the country is impassable and full of defiles.

The Iroquois informed me that there was one portage of six leagues between it and the River Canaouagon, or that above La Paille Coupée; on the other hand, an Englishman has told me that, to reach Fort Machault, the English must make a land journey of seventeen leagues. I shall endeavor to ascertain precisely what I am to depend on.

I judge that the English fort in question is at least one hundred leagues from Fort Machault, and that it is situate on the frontiers of Pennsylvania.

I have a number of Indian parties, even of the Five Nations, on the way to attack that fort.

Although there is no appearance, according to the report of the Delawares and of our scouts, of any early movement on the part of the enemy, I have nevertheless given orders to M. de la Chauvignerie to cause to be completed the works necessary to put his fort in a state of defence.

I have not neglected anything to attract the Loups of Théoga, who are settled near Fort Skamoken,<sup>1</sup> to me. I was of the opinion that I could not effect it, because they have never had the least association with the French, and have always been among the English; nevertheless, my negotiations have so far succeeded, that I have actually with me the Great Chief of that Nation, who is called the King, with a suite of his warriors. I have received him very well, and sent him home in such a manner that he and all his Nation were attaching themselves warmly to the French and waging war on the English. I have required of him to give me a proof of the sincerity of his promise. He forthwith dispatched some of his warriors to join the army I am sending against Fort Georges. The sight of that army, which is about nine thousand men, will not fail to impress those Loups with a high idea of the French power, and reanimate the confidence they are beginning to repose in us. The alliance I am entering into with these Indians will be very advantageous to us in every respect. They can extend their parties as far as New-York and in many other places where our Indians cannot conveniently go to strike.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Vaudreuil.

[ Département de la Guerre, Paris. ]

Camp at Carillon, 27th July, 1757.

Sir,

I think it my duty to send you a canoe to communicate to you the auspicious opening of this campaign.

Lieutenant Marin, of the Colonial troops, who has exhibited a rare audacity, did not consider himself bound to halt, although his detachment, of about 400 men, was reduced to about 200, the balance having returned or been sent back by him on account of inability to follow. He carried off a patrol of ten men, and swept away an ordinary guard of 50 like a wafer; went up to the enemy's camp under Fort Lydius, [where] he was exposed to a severe fire, and retired like a warrior. The enemy, whose conduct has been as timid as ours has been bold, did not follow. He was unwilling to amuse himself making prisoners; he brought in only one and 32 scalps, and must have killed many men of the enemy, in the midst of whose ranks 'twere neither wise nor prudent to go in search of scalps. The Indians generally have all behaved well.

He had with him M. de la Roche Beaumont, one of my Aids-de-Camp, who has already made several excursions with the Indians, in which he acquitted himself very well.

The Outaouais who arrived with me, and whom I designed to go on a scouting party towards the lake, had conceived the project of administering a corrective to the English barges, and you will see, Sir, that it has been administered.

On the day before yesterday your brother formed a detachment to accompany them. I arrived at his camp on the evening of the same day. Lieutenant de Corbière of the Colonial troops, was returning in consequence of a misunderstanding, and as I knew the zeal and intelligence of that officer, I made him set out with a new instruction to rejoin Mess<sup>rs</sup> de l'Anglade and Hertel de Chambly. He has been reinforced by Chevalier de Meloise and M. la Chapelle, an officer newly arrived from France. They remained in ambush all day and night yesterday; at break of day the English appeared on Lake St. Sacrament to the number of 22 barges, under the command of Sieur Parker, who replaced Colonel Schuller, taken at Chouaguen, as Colonel of the Jersey regiment; five Captains, five Lieutenants and one Ensign.

The whoops of our Indians impressed them with such terror, that they made but a feeble resistance; two barges only escaped; all the others were captured or sunk. I have 160 prisoners here, 5 of whom are officers. About 160 men have been killed or drowned. These two affairs cost us—that of M. Marin, a Canadian who died of his wounds, being unable to run, two slightly wounded; that of M. de Corbière, one Indian slightly wounded.

M. de Villiers whom I cannot too highly commend, has participated considerably in the arrangement of this detachment, and in the determination of the Indians. This officer marched yesterday, but in vain, with that zeal which you know he possesses, to cut off the retreat of a small party of hostile Indians who had just killed a grenadier quite close to our camp; M. de Villiers' reputation is too well established to require any actions to increase it, but he will take full advantage of all those which fortune will offer him in war.

All the prisoners' depositions agree with those you are already in possession of, and afford me the greatest hopes, the rather, as the prisoners assure that our plans are unknown. Meanwhile General Webb, according to their report, arrives to-morrow or after, at Fort George, with some Regulars. No matter; I flatter myself that I shall render you a good account of them within twelve days. You see, Sir, that fortune declares herself the moment I arrive, and those two events afford the greatest confidence to the Indians with whom I have been in Council the whole day.

The officers of the Corps Royal are here since yesterday. We are hard at work at our Carrying place embarking our provisions, artillery. The naval engagement, the arrival of the prisoners, the joy that has spread throughout the camps, have somewhat deranged us to-day, for working, but at early dawn to-morrow I shall be at the Falls, and at six o'clock at your brother's camp, to review the Marine battalion, to look at the composition of our Militia brigades, to hold a Council with the Nations, and to fix the Great Council at which I am to present them in the King's name with the Large Belt you have placed in my hands.

I am, &c.

M. Doriel to M. de Paulmy.

Quebec, 31st July, 1757.

My Lord,

The opportunity by which I have the honor to transmit this letter, is not sufficiently sure to allow me to enter into certain details. Nevertheless I wish not to let it pass without informing you of an opening of the campaign which presages favorable results.

A detachment of 150 men, mostly Indians, sent by the Marquis de Montcalm on a scout between Forts Georges and Lydius, under the command of Lieutenant Marin of the Colonial troops, has accomplished the most daring expedition.

He arrived on the morning of the 23rd, near Fort Lydius. He first met a patrol of ten men who were killed; afterwards came up with a strong guard of 50 men who were, in like manner, wholly destroyed. A corps of the enemy, over 4,000 men ranged itself in line of battle, sallied out of its intrenchments and advanced towards the edge of the forest, where M. Marin lay in ambush, who fired over an hour, killed a number of the enemy and retreated in such good order that, though pursued for two leagues, he lost but one Canadian who died of exhaustion. Our detachment returned on the 26th with 32 scalps and one prisoner.

M. Marin's action is so much the more gallant, as he had left with 300 men of whom M. de Montcalm had composed his detachment. 150 Indians quit him on the way; he continued his march notwithstanding, with what remained of his men. M. de la Rochebeaucourt, your protégé, my Lord, was of this detachment. 'Tis the third that he has already accompanied this year with the heartiest good will.

Here, my Lord, is another most complete naval victory. An English detachment of 350 men, under the orders of one Colonel, five Captains, four Lieutenants and an Ensign had left Fort George in 22 barges, which are large bateaux. The enemy's design was to feel our outposts, and take some of our men prisoners.

About 400 of our Indians, under the command of M. de Corbière and some other Colonial officers, who were lying in ambush in the islands in Lake St. Sacrament,<sup>1</sup> utterly defeated this party on the 26th. Only two of the barges escaped. The Indians brought in 180 prisoners. The remainder was killed or drowned in the greatest part of the barges. Only 4 of them have been brought in, and two boats, which contain 60 men each. For all that, we had only one Indian slightly wounded. The English surrendered, so to speak, without striking a blow.

Whilst I have the honor to write you, M. de Montcalm is in full march to attack Fort George, an enterprise which would be terminated long since had our circumstances in regard to subsistence, permitted. I expect he will open the trench previous to the 4th of next month, and according to the deposition of prisoners, the most sanguine hopes may be entertained. They assure that only about 1,800 men were at Fort Georges when they left. 'Tis true, they were expecting General Webb with a reinforcement more or less considerable, according to different reports.

Considerable discharges of artillery heard at our camp the 27th, notified M. de Montcalm that General Webb had, in fact, arrived. That does in nowise exclude hope. According to the report of the prisoner brought in by M. Marin, there may be at Fort Lydius 4 @ 5 thousand men, and the camp at Lake St. Sacrament is not all intrenched. Our army is about ten thousand strong, including 2,000 Indians. All the French troops form part of it except the two battalions of Berry, which had merely landed here, in a very bad condition through sickness, and after having left 120 sick at Louisbourg.

A small body of men under the orders of Lieutenant de Saint Ours, of the Colonial troops, fell a fortnight ago into an ambush of 120 Englishmen. He cut his way through them, killed some of their people and returned to the camp with 4 men wounded, 2 of whom are dead. M. de St. Ours himself received a gun-shot in the hand. This action entitles him to the highest praise. It bears no resemblance to those of the English.

M. de la Grive des Assizes will not arrive so soon, since he was not yet relieved, three weeks ago. I would, however, have great need of that assistance in the present moment. My Secretary is of wonderful assistance to me, and principally since six weeks, during which time I cannot hardly stir out, having had the misfortune to meet with a fall that has bruised my entire body and occasioned a considerable wound in my leg, which is not as yet entirely healed. I pray you, my Lord, to be fully persuaded that nothing which concerns me is in danger, notwithstanding this accident.

I should have so many things to say to you, my Lord, on the events through which you have passed at the beginning of the year, that, through force of feeling them, I resolve on silence. I flatter myself that you are sufficiently aware of my attachment for everything that is personal to you, and that you will do me the favor to continue your protection and goodness to me.

I am, with most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

Ministerial Minute on the Course to be pursued with the Five Nations.

One of the objects the most recommended to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, on occasion of the war, has been to assure himself, as much as possible, of the Five Iroquois Nations.

Not, however, that we flattered ourselves with engaging them to take any part against the English.

Neither was there any fear, to a certain point, that they would declare openly against us, unless the English should succeed in forcing them to do so, by the advantages a decided superiority over us afforded.

For fifty years these Indians have constantly observed a species of neutrality between the two powers, in rendering themselves an object to the one and the other. Nevertheless, there have been almost always some chiefs strongly in favor of the English. Some of them, even in the preceding war, smote the French; this was especially the case with the Mohawks, among whom the manœuvres of the English have had more success. They are one of the Five Nations. The other four are the [Oneidas, the] Cayugas, the Senecas and the Onondagas. Some time ago the English added a sixth, under the name of the Taskarorins. There are, besides, some villages known by particular names, which are multiplying, and change according to the different residences these Indians adopt.

But, independent of the importance which attached to being at peace on the side of the Five Nations, especially in regard to the other Indians, some of whom they could corrupt, 'twas thought proper to profit by the circumstances of this war, to destroy, by the very fact of the conduct of the Iroquois, the pretence which the English set up in Europe, of sovereignty over the Indians whom they wish to be regarded as their subjects, because it is on this pretended right of sovereignty that they found the property of the territories on the lakes which they dispute with us.

The annexed despatch of the Marquis de Vaudreuil contains the detail of the success of the negotiations he employed for the execution of the orders which had been given him on that subject

Respecting this detail, it may be observed,

1st That the deputation which the Five Nations have sent to the Marquis de Vaudreuil is, without contradiction, as M. de Montcalm notes in the despatch submitted to his Majesty, one of the most remarkable that ever occurred in Canada, whence may be concluded that the Iroquois no longer trouble themselves about managing the English, to whom a proceeding so signal must not be pleasing.

2nd That too much reliance must, nevertheless, not be placed on the engagements which the Five Nations appeared to have entered into on this occasion with the Marquis de Vaudreuil, that they would go on their side to open hostilities with the English. It appears, in fact, that, according to their past conduct, we must expect they will always regulate themselves as much as possible by events.

3rd That the tone adopted by the Marquis de Vaudreuil towards them, by giving them the option of the part they would wish to take, must be approved, and that it is proper to order him to support it in all cases. One of the circumstances which has most contributed to foster the pride of the Iroquois is, that they have been made too much of, and the occasion is more favorable than it has ever been, to shake off the species of yoke which has, so to say, been self-imposed by this circumspection.

4th That independent of the advantage to be derived in regard to them, 'tis certain that the personal consideration of the Marquis de Vaudreuil and that of his name, place him in a position to do what no other Governor could perhaps undertake.

Finally, relative to the pretension of the English in regard to their chimerical sovereignty over the Iroquois, that 'tis proper to request the Marquis de Vaudreuil to transmit a formal procès-verbal of the deputation which he has received and of everything that occurred on that occasion; to order him to have a similar minute prepared of the other deputations he will possibly receive; to observe to him, likewise, to profit by the first opportunity which will present itself to cause the Iroquois to renew the protests they have already made at other times, against the pretension of the English and respecting their own independence.

31st July, 1757.

M. Doreil to M. de Paulmy.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Quebec, 14th of August, 1757.

My Lord,

A courier, who arrived yesterday from Montreal, brought us the happy news of the surrender of Fort William Henry, commonly called, by us, Fort George. 'Tis M. de Bougainville, Aid-de-Camp to the Marquis de Montcalm, who has been dispatched from the army to convey the intelligence to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, with the capitulation, copy whereof I have the honor, my Lord, to transmit you hereunto annexed.

Here is another expedition gloriously and happily terminated in very little time, for the trench was opened only on the night of the 4th and 5th; it was, as yet, but 120 toises from the palisade, when, on the morning of the 19th, the Commandant demanded to capitulate.

He could, nevertheless, reinforce his garrison every moment, having an intrenched camp on a height under his command with which he had communication. There were in the camp and in the place, about 2,400 men, nearly 200 of whom have been killed or wounded. We have lost about 30 men, one of whom was a Canadian and fifteen were Indians, who exposed themselves too much at the enemy's camp. We have about forty wounded; one only of these is an officer of the Languedoc battalion who received a slight hurt.

The Marquis de Montcalm had advice, the evening before his arrival, that the Commandant, who already had 1,200 men, was about to receive a reinforcement of a like number. He made his arrangements accordingly, and that did not prevent him prosecuting his enterprise which has so happily succeeded.

As I am not on the spot I cannot furnish you, my Lord, a more circumstantial detail. You will, doubtless, receive one at the same time as this letter, which will not leave, perhaps, for several days.

I do not think it possible to attempt anything at present against Fort Edward or Lydius where there is an intrenched camp of 6,000 men. 'Twould be necessary that our army were more numerous, and 'twould require 300 horses on the ground for the transportation of our artillery over an interval of six leagues.

Besides, the article of subsistence is alone an insurmountable obstacle. We are, in this regard, in the greatest distress since winter, and each person in Quebec has been, for more than a month, reduced to four ounces of bread. Positively the soldier only has his pound and a half. It is but too evident that a long time will elapse before we shall be more at our ease.

I am, with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Paulmy.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Camp on the ruins of Fort William Henry, called, by the French, Fort George; 15th of August, 1757

My Lord,

His Majesty had treated me too well on my departure from Europe, and I did not accomplish enough for his service to entitle me to any favor. Therefore am I penetrated with the most lively gratitude for that which you have obtained for me and for the honor conferred on me of the rank of Commander in the Order of St. Louis, and I am still more grateful for the approbation you have the goodness to bestow on my conduct.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil employed me last year in the Chouaguen expedition which places the Colony on the Lake Ontario frontier entirely at rest. The one I have just made by his orders, with more difficulties to be surmounted, is no less brilliant for the troops and the Canadians and covers the Lake St. Sacrament frontier, without the necessity of sending back the Indians of the Upper country and the Canadians to save their harvest. I might have attempted to go farther, but 'twould have been sacrificing the Colony for doubtful exploits wherein the desire to have one's self spoken of would be greater than that of doing the Colony a service. This capture is followed by the demolition of their fort and intrenched camp.

It procures us a heap of provisions for the subsistence of six thousand men for six weeks, some thirty pieces of artillery, more ammunition than we have employed at a siege, which is considerable for America, inasmuch as the place did not surrender until after it had been six days invested, nor until five days after the trench had been opened. The rapidity of our works always astonishes the enemy.

I had to take a fort supported by an intrenched camp, and in the one and the other were 2,400 troops which I should have made prisoners had the Colony had provision. The clause, not to serve during eighteen months, is of more advantage to it.

I had to fear the reinforcement of General Webb, who had six thousand men within six leagues of this place, and I have been obliged, in open day, to have the tail of a swamp filled in for the purpose of conveying the cannon to a fourth battery, erected at the foot of the glacis.

What I esteem the more in this operation in a Colony where men are so few, is, that we have had only fifty-three killed or wounded.

The moment the fort was captured I dispatched M. de Bougainville, one of my Aids-de-Camp, to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, that he may immediately inform the Court of these events. I have not had time to write to you, and refer to the detail he will transmit to you.

I cannot but give equal praise to the zeal of the Regulars, the Marines and Canadians. I have been well seconded by Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Levis, de Rigaud de Vaudreuil and de Bourlamaque. I shall have the honor in my next, to write you more in detail.

I cannot conceal from you that the capitulation has unfortunately suffered some infraction on the part of the Indians. But what would be an infraction in Europe, cannot be so regarded in America, and I have written with firmness to General Webb and to Lord Loudon, on the subject, so as to deprive them of all excuse for not observing the terms on a slight pretence.

At the same time that I received the despatch with which you honored me, informing me that I had been named Commander in the Order of St. Louis, I received, also, the return of the marks of favor granted to the army I have the honor of commanding. I present you my thanks therefor. I postpone, until the close of the campaign, writing to you at length on this subject, and proposing to you the distinctions I think the officers of our battalions deserve, and I pray you to favor my requests. It concerns the King's service that expatriated troops be well treated, especially when they serve with so much zeal, and submit to everything; war, labor, reduction of rations, the march, expedition with a bear's skin, and winter detachment on the ice.

Our battalions are employed, during the remainder of the campaign, according to the Marquis de Vaudreuil's intentions, on divers works at fortifications and highways, which are necessary in time of war and useful in time of peace.

Be persuaded, my Lord, of the thorough gratitude I feel for your goodness. I ask its continuance for myself and my son. I rely thereon as essentially as on those with which Count d'Argenson honored me. Rely, likewise, on an inviolable attachment.

I add an infinite respect with which I am,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

Our recently arrived officers of the Corps Royal have served with great distinction and usefulness.

From 12th of July, to 16th August, 1757.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

The Marquis de Vaudreuil having resolved in concert with the Marquis de Montcalm to push his conquests on the Lake St. Sacrament frontier, and to commence with the siege of Fort George, gave that General charge thereof, who after having been to chant the war song at the Sault St. Louis among the Iroquois; at the Lake of the Two Mountains, among the Iroquois, Algonkins and Nepissings, left Montreal on the 12th of July, arrived at Carillon on the 15th. Ordered Chevalier de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque to give a return of the artillery, ammunitions, provisions and bateaux transported to the head of the portage, and directed the forwarding of the rest.

19th July. Sent Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Rigaud and Dumas to the portage to organize the battalion of the Marine, which is to be composed of eight companies of 60 men each, of Villiers' Independent Company of 300 men, and of six brigades of Militia, composed of 450 Colonials or Militia; went to see Chevalier de Levis at the Falls where he camped with the battalions of La Reine, Lasarre, Languedoc and Guyenne; ordered the gentlemen of the Corps Royal and the Commissary of the Marine to hasten their transports, and returned to inspect the camp of the battalions of Bearn and Royal Rousillon, at Carillon, under the order of M. de Bourlamaque.

21st Learned at 3 o'clock in the afternoon that M. de St. Ours, who was scouting at Isle à la Barque<sup>1</sup> with 10 men, had been attacked by five English barges, each carrying 15 men, and 100 men who were firing on shore; that he had made so vigorous a defence as to force the English to retreat; to allow him to embark in a barge and quietly to regain his camp whither he returned with his ten men, one of whom, a Cadet, was mortally, and three Canadians, slightly, wounded.

22nd Received despatches from the Marquis de Vaudreuil with intelligence of the arrival at Bic, of two ships of war, and of that of the regiment of Berry and some merchant vessels.

23<sup>d</sup> Sent some Indians and Canadians to lie in ambush in the woods and on the lake, to prevent English barges and scouts coming as far as the portage.

24th At 10 o'clock in the morning, the Abenakis brought in 30 Englishmen whom they took in three barges, and Chevalier de Levis sends to report at noon that the other Indians have captured 12 barges, on board of which they took 130 prisoners, and killed nearly 140 men who tried to escape on shore. The prisoners arrived at four o'clock; they depose that they left Fort George last night to the number of 350 men,<sup>2</sup> under the orders of Colonel Parker, commanding the New Jersey regiment, to attack our outposts, and to burn the mill at the Falls; that they had separated in the course of the night; that the Indians attacked them at day-break, and that none had made their escape except the Colonel and about 60 men.

25th Many of the Indians wishing to leave with their prisoners, the Marquis de Montcalm has had considerable trouble to retain them and to prevail on them to consent to send the prisoners to Montreal, which consent they retracted in the evening; he has been obliged to issue counter orders, to dispatch one of his Aids-de-Camp, at 9 o'clock at night, to the Carrying place to hold a Council with the Chiefs of all the Nations, and to collect their opinions, who have unanimously consented to the departure of the prisoners, on condition that the Governor-General would have great care taken of them, and have white bread and shoes given them. M. Marin has returned with a detachment of Indians and Canadians; he says he went as far as Fort Lydius; retraced his steps taking a guard of 30 men; drew from the fort and intrenchments a sortie of over 2,000 men of whom he killed more than 100; the Indians scalped 38 and took two prisoners.

26th The prisoners left for St. Frederic, escorted by a Lieutenant and 40 men who are to put them on board a schooner and conduct them to Montreal. The Marquis de Montcalm is gone to hold a Council with all the Nations, consisting of thirty-seven, and on his return has fixed the departure of the army.

27th Went to encamp at the Carrying place, to hold a Grand Council with all the Nations; to communicate to them his plan for the departure and march of the army, which they have unanimously approved. The Iroquois have received the great Belt and transferred it to the Outaouas.

29th All the troops, who had orders to march very lightly equipped, have carried their kit to Fort Carillon. The grenadier companies and pickets which are to compose Chevalier de Levis' detachment that is detailed to proceed by land to cover the march and landing of the army, repaired to the Burnt Camp,<sup>1</sup> where the entire detachment has been mustered and reviewed by the Marquis de Montcalm.

Composition of this detachment.

Chevalier de Levis, Brigadier of the King's armies, commander.

M. de Senezergues, Lieutenant-Colonel of Lasarre.

M. de Pause, Adjutant of Guyenne, commissioned to make the detail.

Grenadier companies, .....	6
Pickets, .....	8
Brigades of Militia, .....	3
Indians, .....	600

30th Chevalier de Levis' detachment marched at day-break. The Royal Rousillon brigade, composed of the battalion of that name, and of that of Bearn, came to encamp at the head of the Carrying place. The brigade of La Reine, composed of the battalion of that name, of that of Languedoc, and of that of the Marine; and that of La Sarre, composed of the battalion of that name, and of that of Guyenne, went to occupy the Burnt Camp. The Marquis de Montcalm, perceiving that considerable effects still remained to be transported, has ordered that a brigade of Militia should work all night; that the Royal Rousillon brigade, and one of Militia be wholly employed on that business the entire morning, of next day, and issued orders at noon that 200 men of the brigades encamped ahead, complete the transport of what remained. Fire having broke out last evening near the artillery bateaux on the portage road, and again to-day in the same place, the troops marched thither to extinguish it. The Marquis de Montcalm received news at noon from Chevalier de Levis, that he had accomplished, by evening, 4 @ 5 leagues over very bad roads; that the worst is passed, and he hopes to arrive on the first at the Bay of Ganaouské.<sup>2</sup> Six days' provisions have been served out to the Militia and Royal Rousillon brigades, and to the Marine battalion, and the bateaux in which they were to embark, were pointed out to them. The Indians to the number of 13 or 14 hundred, took their departure at two o'clock, to go and camp and wait for the army, three leagues from this place.

Fire having again broken out near the artillery bateaux, the Marquis de Montcalm gave orders to shove off; doubled the Burnt Camp; left to the North, Bald Mountain,<sup>1</sup> les Arbres matachés, where we doubled a cape<sup>2</sup> and halted during a severe storm which lasted until six o'clock; we also tarried a short time opposite the Sugar loaf where we joined the Indians, and on the 2<sup>d</sup> Arrived, at break of day, at the Bay of Ganaouské; landed to the left of Chevalier de Levis' camp to cook; discovered an English barge traversing from one island to the other, observing our movements.

Chevalier de Levis started at 10 o'clock with his detachment. The Marquis de Montcalm put the army in motion at noon, a brigade of artillery having passed to its van; he halted at Great Sandy bay near which the Indians captured an English barge that was come to scout, in which they killed 4 men and took two prisoners. Left there at 6 o'clock and landed during the night at Chevalier de Levis' camp, one league from Fort George.

3rd The artillery did not arrive until day-break; all the troops landed, except those detailed to guard the bateaux, and placed themselves in order of battle. Chevalier de Levis constituted the van-guard and marched to the Lydius road to reconnoitre the enemy's position and prevent the arrival of reinforcements. He was followed to be sustained by the army in three columns, the General in the centre, the right commanded by M. de Rigaud and the left by M. de Bourlamaque. The Royal Rousillon brigade has been posted on the crest of a ravine which is opposite the fort, where it remained an hour in order of battle and received orders to join the army on a plateau beyond some heights to the left of the fort where all the troops remained until 5 o'clock in the evening, during which time the fort was reconnoitred as well as the intrenched camp which appeared too strong to be attacked sword in hand. The Indians have kept up a sharp fire on the fort, repelled several sorties, killed more than one hundred men, took 4 prisoners, killed a hundred beeves, 150 sheep, took 40 oxen and 20 horses. M. de Bourlamaque has ordered the La Sarre and Royal Rousillon brigades to encamp behind the ravine which the Royal Rousillon brigade had lined; the left rested on the cove where the artillery is to land and the right on the camp destined for the brigade of La Reine; and after having fixed the camp, ordered a guard of 50 men to be posted in the cove with instructions to light fires at nightfall to serve as beacons for the artillery bateaux. The Marquis de Montcalm and Chevalier de Levis bivouacked with the remainder of the army near the fort and the road to Fort Edward.

The Marquis de Montcalm sent at 7 o'clock to notify M. de Bourlamaque that the scouts report having seen a body of troops leaving Fort Edward and coming by the mountains. The prisoners taken during the day, agree in saying that, on the 1st, the General had in the fort and intrenched camp only 1,300 men; that some arrived on the 2nd, and on the night of the 2nd and 3rd, 500 of whom are in the fort, and the remainder in the intrenched camp, which is being fortified, and at which we hear them at work.

4th The La Reine brigade came to encamp on the right of the Royal Rousillon, with a brigade of Militia, and another of Militia behind that of La Sarre. The Marquis de Montcalm arrived at 7 o'clock in the morning at the camp; went to reconnoitre the fort with M. de Bourlamaque and the gentlemen of the Corps Royal, to decide where he would have the trench opened and batteries set up; sent orders at noon to Chevalier de Levis to call in his detachment to occupy the heights bordering on the right of the camp, with four brigades of Militia, the Independent company and Indians; to provide for its security and to have scouts continually on the Fort Edward road, so as to be notified in time of the enemy's movements. Tools were distributed to the troops, and requisitions were made for fascines and saucissons; 150 pioneers were commanded to commence, at one o'clock, a road from Artillery cove to the tail of the trench. The Marquis de Montcalm has given M. de Bourlamaque charge of the direction of the siege, who has demanded 450 workmen for nightfall; 300 men to support them, under the command of M. de Rocquemaure, Lieutenant-Colonel of the trench, and of Major de Sermonville. The working party was stationed at 8 o'clock within 350 toises<sup>1</sup> of the fort, to open a boyau on the border of the lake; to commence a battery at 80 toises from the tail of the trench;<sup>2</sup> a parallel to communicate with a second battery, 100 toises from that on the left, which includes all the front of the attack. The gunners who were going to the place, marked out for the right battery, not having answered the challenge of the pickets who were going there to cover it, created a small alarm, which passed off without any consequence. The pioneers struck the first blow of the pick-axe, in ground very easy to be moved, in other respects, full of trees, which it has been necessary to fell and saw; this had the effect of delaying the work; the enemy fired during the day a great deal of shell and shot; killed a soldier belonging to the Royal Rousillon, who was on duty, and at nightfall lighted large fires outside the intrenched camp, at which they have worked considerably.

5th At day-break, the working party of the night was dismissed as well as the pickets of the right battery; they have been replaced by a day party of 200, who have perfected the night work and greatly advanced the parallel. Several shell and shot having fallen in the camp of the La Sarre and Royal Rousillon brigades, and the Marquis de Montcalm finding it too much exposed, ordered them to go and camp, the former 400 paces in the rear of its camp; the second to the left of that of La Reine, and to open communications immediately with the trench in case of attack; the brigade of La Reine to the right battery, La Sarre to the tail of the trench, Royal Rousillon to support the head of the sap and Chevalier de Levis to descend the heights to take the enemy in flank. At 4 o'clock some scouts came to report to the General that 2,000 men were approaching from Fort Edward. The Marquis de Montcalm has sent three companies of grenadiers to Chevalier de Levis, with orders to go and meet them, and was himself preparing to follow with a portion of the army to sustain him, when the Indians brought a prisoner and the vest of a man they have killed, in which was found a letter from General Webb, Commander on the English frontier, to the Commandant of the fort, to the effect that, considering the position of Fort Edward, it did not appear to him prudent to march to the aid of Fort William Henry, or to send him any reinforcements; that he has learned from a French prisoner that the French army is composed of eleven thousand men, two thousand Indians, and is supplied with a considerable train of artillery; that he communicates this intelligence in order that the Commandant of the fort may profit by it to obtain a favorable capitulation, in case he cannot hold out until the arrival of succors required from Albany. The grenadier companies have returned, and have been to relieve the guards of the trench with two pickets under the orders of Lieutenant-Colonel de Fonbonne and Major de la Pause. The other grenadier companies have been sent to the bateaux, which 'twas suspected the enemy were desirous of attempting to burn; 600 workmen, who proceeded at 7 o'clock to the trench, have been employed to complete the battery on the left, to continue the parallel and the Royal battery. Half the pickets bivouacked convenient to the trench, and the remainder at the camp ready to march.

6th The Marquis de Montcalm went at day-break to the trench to witness the unmasking of the left battery, composed of 8 pieces of cannon and one mortar; it discharged several rounds consecutively, and afterwards fired every two minutes. The night party has been relieved by 300 men, who are occupied in perfecting the parallel and completing the Royal battery; the enemy's fire has been pretty brisk; one of our gunners and a soldier of Bearn have been wounded in loading a cannon, the vent of which they forgot to stop. The battalions have furnished 36 men to serve the artillery; the guard of the trench has been relieved at 4 o'clock by 3 companies of grenadiers and 3 pickets, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel de Privat and Major d'Herte, and the workmen, at 7 o'clock, by 300 night men, who have completed the Royal battery, and opened a boyau running from the parallel towards the gardens of the fort.

7th The workmen have been relieved by 300 day men who have perfected the boyau. The Marquis de Montcalm came at six o'clock to the trench, the two batteries received him with a general salute, and kept up a brisk fire until 7 o'clock, when he dispatched M. de Bougainville, his first Aid-de-Camp to convey to Lieutenant-Colonel Monroe,<sup>1</sup> Commandant of the fort and of the intrenched camp, a letter from him with that of General Webb. The Lieutenant-Colonel answered, that he was highly flattered by that politeness and intended to make a gallant defence. The batteries opened again at 9 o'clock, and have continued every two minutes, to the great diversion of the Indians who uttered cries of joy on seeing the shot and shells falling in the fort. At 3 o'clock the English made a sortie with 500 men to establish a post on the road to Fort Edward, and secure that communication. M. de Villiers marched against them with his company and the Indians; repulsed them and forced them to reënter the intrenched camp, killed more than 50 of their men, and took 4 prisoners; the battalions furnished 72 men to serve the artillery, and have made a considerable number of fascines and saucissons, and the Militia, round sticks for the construction of a bridge. The trench guard has been relieved at 4 o'clock by three companies of grenadiers and 6 pickets under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel de Senezergues and Major Malartie. 230 working men arrived at 8 o'clock, 100 of whom are designed to repair the batteries, and the other to extend the boyau descending into the ravine, and to construct a small bridge over the little swamp; at 10 o'clock the Indians and Canadians ambuscaded in the garden, fired 7 @ 8 shots at two men who cried out that they were deserters and friends of France; they were taken and carried to M. de Bourlamaque.

5th The working party was dismissed at day-break; 300 other men have been employed in perfecting the night's work, in commencing a new battery, 100 toises in advance of that on the left, continuing the sap and forming an épaulement to cover the new bridge; a working party has crossed the swamp to construct a slope which terminates at the gardens. A Bearn soldier has been killed and 4 belonging to different regiments have been wounded. At three o'clock some men and the glitter of some arms were observed up one of the mountains. Scouts came to report to the General that relief was approaching. He dispatched three companies of grenadiers to Chevalier de Levis, with orders to proceed and oppose the arrival of reinforcements, and followed with the brigade of La Reine and one of Militia; left that of Royal Rousillon on the heights ready to support him or the trench in which the La Sarre brigade entered. M. de Bourlamaque made his arrangements to repel the sorties, ordered the artillery officers to bring two guns to bear on the gardens and plateau, to fire à toute volée<sup>1</sup> on the intrenched camp in which considerable movement was observed, and the troops were seen in line of battle. At 5 o'clock a considerable report of musketry was heard followed by whoops of Indians; M. de Montcalm sent, half an hour afterwards, one of his Aids-de-Camp to M. de Bourlamaque, to tell him that the relief had disappeared, and that the troops are about to return. At 7 o'clock 3 companies of grenadiers, and 7 pickets under the command of Chevalier de Bernetz, Lieutenant-Colonel, came to relieve the guard of the trench; at 8 arrived 550 working men, 100 for the new battery and the remainder to finish the bridge and post themselves on the exterior crest of the ravine, some toises from the ditch of the place. At 10 o'clock a deserter was brought in who states that the English thought we were going to attack them when they saw us march out.

9th At day-break the men of the working party found themselves sheltered by the lodgment established in the gardens and have been relieved by 300 who have completed it. Two soldiers were wounded during the night. Our artillery has continued firing as usual; at 7 o'clock the fort hoisted the white flag, and the Commandant sent to demand permission to capitulate, which has been granted on the following conditions, to wit:

That the garrison of the fort and the troops of the intrenched camp to the number of 2,200 men, shall march out with the honors of war, carrying away arms and baggage, and take with them one cannon, out of respect for the gallant defence they have made.

That they will not serve during 18 months against his Most Christian Majesty and his allies.

That within 4 months from this date they shall send back to Carillon the prisoners they have taken from the French and their allies, on the territory of North America, since the commencement of the war.

That they shall leave in the ramparts, arsenal and magazines, all the artillery, ammunition, provisions and other effects that are there.

The guards of the trench took possession, at noon, of the fort and intrenched camp in which were found 36 pieces of ordnance, 2,500 shot, 545 shell, 36 thousand weight of powder,

350 thousand rations, some other provisions and some merchandise; two sloops in the harbor, two on the stocks, 4 large flat bateaux and eight barges.

In this expedition we have had 13 men killed and 40 wounded.

The English say they have lost 200.

10th Chevalier de Levis sent off the English at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, escorted by a detachment of Regulars, the officers attached to the Indians and by all the Interpreters. They did not proceed half a league when the Indians pursued them; killed some of them; took several, plundered almost all, killed one soldier and wounded three who endeavored to oppose their cruelty. The Marquis de Montcalm ran thither with almost all the officers; rescued out of their hands all the English he discovered with them, made all reënter the fort who had escaped their fury, and all those return, who could not reach Fort Edward without danger.

After this fine exploit, many of the Indians embarked with their prisoners for Montreal; others conscious of their error came to find their Father, to tell him that they had no sense and that they brought him back the English. The Marquis de Montcalm had them all brought together in the fort, had garments bought to clothe them. The officers of the Line conducted the officers to their quarters, and guarded them there. The soldiers have been sent to the intrenched camp, to the number of nearly 500; about 1,500 have arrived at Fort Edward and 200 have been carried off by the Indians. At 8 o'clock, relieved the guard of the fort of which M. de Bourlamaque was Governor, Chevalier de Bernier, King's Lieutenant and M. de Belcombe, Major.

Chevalier de Levis came to encamp in front of the intrenched camp, with the brigade of La Reine, 4 brigades of Militia and the Independent Company; Marquis de Montcalm with the other brigades near the fort which he has begun to have demolished on the same day, and on the 11th, continued the demolition. He has forwarded all the ammunition and provisions to the Carrying place; on the 15th sent back the English under a strong escort, after having showered civilities on them, and expressed his regret that 'twas not possible to restrain the Indians who often are beyond control. The fort having been demolished and razed on the night of the 15th,

On the 16th he sent the Royal Rousillon brigade to encamp on an Island, not having enough of bateaux to take them along, and left at noon with the army for the Carrying place.

M. de Bougainville to M. de Paulmy.

[ Département de la Guerre, Paris. ]

Letter of M. de Bougainville to the Minister, with the Articles of capitulation granted to Lieutenant-Colonel Munro, on the 19th of August, 1757.

Montreal, 19th August, 1757.

My Lord,

The Marquis de Montcalm's last two despatches, bearing date the month of July, prepared you for important events.

One announced to you his departure from Montreal on the 12th of July for the purpose of besieging Fort George, erected by the English in 1755 and 1756, at the head of Lake St.

Sacrament, and called by them William Henry. The other, written from Carillon, rendered you an account of the excursion of M. Marin, Lieutenant of the Colonial troops, against Fort Lydius, which the English name Edward; and of the fight on Lake St. Sacrament, in which M. de Corbiere, Lieutenant of the same troops, at the head of a party of Indians, had entirely defeated an English detachment of 350 men. Fort William Henry is taken, and the Marquis de Montcalm, occupied with the consequences of that conquest, has commissioned me to convey the news thereof to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and at the same time to render you an account of all the details relative to that expedition.

The Marquis de Montcalm, pursuant to the instructions of M. de Vaudreuil, had immediately on his arrival at Carillon, divided the Militia into brigades, distributed by companies mixed with some soldiers from the Marine, and commanded by officers of that corps. That arrangement introduced more order and facility into their service. He had also formed from the detached companies of the Marine, a battalion similar to ours and destined to act with them. His intention had been to place in this battalion the officers less qualified by their age, or by their want of strength, to accompany the Canadians and Indians in their excursions on foot. Sieur de Villiers, Captain of the Marine troops, distinguished by the role he had played in the last campaign, was at the head of a body of 300 Canadian volunteers.

The army was not entirely assembled at Carillon until the latter days of July. This was its force and its composition :

Before leaving for Fort William Henry the army was distributed in the following manner : M. de Rigaud occupied the head of the Carrying place and some advanced posts with the battalion of the Marine, Militia and Indians. The battalions of La Reine, La Sarre, Languedoc and Guyenne, were encamped three-quarters of a league lower down, at the Fall of the waters from Lake St. Sacrament under Chevalier de Levis' orders ; those of Royal Rousillon and Bearn were yet at Carillon, where they had opened the campaign with M. de Bourlamaque.

29th July. The Marquis de Montcalm posted himself, in person, at the head of the Carrying place to accelerate its work. With all the activity imaginable on the part of the troops, this portage of a considerable artillery, of munitions of war of every description, of provisions to victual the entire army for nearly a month, of 250 bateaux, of 200 canoes, could be completed only in the night of the 31st to the 1st of August. We had neither oxen nor horses. Everything was done by men's arms, and in the last days the entire brigades, headed by their Lieutenant-Colonels, relieved each other for this work as long as it was laborious.

As the number of bateaux would not suffice to embark the whole of the army ; as besides, 'twas necessary that the forest should be examined along which it was to sail ; that the landings be sure and reconnoitered, the Marquis de Montcalm made his arrangements for marching a body of 2,000 men, exclusive of Indians, by land, under the orders of Chevalier de Levis, who, having near ten leagues to march in the woods and over almost inaccessible mountains, set out two days in advance of the army in order to arrive simultaneously at the Bay of Ganaouské, situate within four leagues of Fort William Henry, and marked as the first point of rendezvous, according to the advice of Kanactagon, a famous Iroquois hunter.

These arrangements being completed, the Marquis de Montcalm communicated them, on the 26th, to the Chiefs of the Indian Nations, in order that they may confer together thereupon, and be prepared to report their opinion of them to him, in the General Council fixed for the following day. In this Council, at which the Nations took their places according to the ranks settled among themselves, he presented them in the King's name, with a belt of six thousand beads, to bind all those different tribes to each other and to him, so that they may act together and not separate from each other, nor quit him before the close of the expedition. This solemn and customary act was, under existing circumstances, more important than ever. For during several days, hardly could those be retained who participated in the fight on Lake St. Sacrament; these people scrupling to incur again the risk of war after one success, pretending that such would be tempting the Master of Life and bringing down on them bad luck.

The Iroquois, to whom of right the Belt belonged, as being the most numerous of all the Nations present with the army, did the honors on the occasion, in their name, and that of the other domiciliated Indians, to the Nations from above, out of regard for their character as strangers. In this same Council, the Marquis de Montcalm asked the Nations for the answer to the propositions he had submitted to their chiefs the evening before, on the subject of the marching of the army, of the route to be followed in the woods, the day of departure and his other arrangements. For these independent people whose assistance is purely voluntary, require to be consulted; everything must be communicated to them, and their opinions and caprices are oftentimes a law for us.

The Iroquois, originally proprietors of this country, now the theatre of the war, and with which they consequently are thoroughly conversant, offered themselves to the Marquis de Montcalm to serve as guides to Chevalier de Levis. The Indians consented that about one-third of them should march by land with him, although, they observed, this march was very fatiguing, and they left the time of their departure to the option of the Marquis de Montcalm.

29th Chevalier de Levis' division moved off at night and went to encamp about half a league beyond the portage, at a place called the Burnt Camp, on the left shore of Lake St. Sacrament.

30th This detachment marched in the morning from the Burnt Camp without tents, kettles or equipage, Villiers' volunteers and some Indians forming the van-guard. The Canadians and remainder of the Indians marching as flankers, the troops in the centre, in three columns, that is to say, files.

The same day the Royal Rousillon brigade came from Carillon with M. de Bourlamaque to encamp at the head of the Portage, and the brigades of La Reine and La Sarre occupied the Burnt Camp which Chevalier de Levis had just quitted.

31st The Indians destined to go by water, set out at night and were to wait for the army three leagues from the Portage; they were weary of their inactivity in a camp where there was neither brandy nor wine to drink. Our domiciliated Indians, in truth children of Prayer, afforded occupation to the Missionaries, to whom the day was scarcely long enough to confess them. But this pious exercise was not for the Upper country Nations, whose superstitious and excessively restless mind was juggling, dreaming and fancying that every delay portended misfortune. On marching, these Nations left suspended a complete equipment as a sacrifice to the Manitou, to render him propitious.

1st August. At two o'clock in the afternoon, the army embarked in 250 bateaux, and set sail in the following order: A bateau mounted with a 12-pounder, fixed by Lieutenant Jacquot of the Artillery, the brigade of La Reine, that of La Sarre, that of Courtemanche, the Militia, the Artillery, and, on pontoons* the brigade of St. Ours, Militia to navigate them, and that of Royal Rousillon as an escort; the provision bateaux manned by the Gaspé brigade, the field hospital, and lastly, two pickets composing the rear-guard. The Marquis de Montcalm had left a garrison at Carillon of one hundred men, with 100 armed laborers under the orders of Captain Dalquier of the grenadiers of the regiment of Bearn; 50 men at the Falls in possession of a redoubt erected in the middle of the rapid itself, and 150 men at the head of the Carrying place, where a portion of our supplies were deposited.

Halted at 5 o'clock at a point above Isle a la barque,<sup>1</sup> where the Indians, who were waiting for us, took the lead in 150 bark canoes.

2nd. At three o'clock in the morning the army arrived at Ganaouské bay. Three fires lighted on the shore, which was the signal agreed upon, notified us that Chevalier de Levis was posted there, having arrived at four o'clock on the preceding evening, after a march which the excessive heats, the continual mountains, the fallen trees, the necessity of carrying everything on one's shoulders had rendered fatiguing even to the Indians. He resumed his march at ten o'clock in the morning; proceeded to a cove about three leagues from Ganaouské bay, and went immediately to reconnoitre the environs of the fort, its position, that of the enemy and the proper place to land the artillery. The army arrived at the same cove in the evening. During the night, two English barks out scouting were discovered by the Indians, who gave them chase and made three prisoners, who on being interrogated on the spot, told us that the enemy numbered 3,000 men, 500 of whom were in the fort, the remainder in an intrenched camp on a height convenient to the fort, to relieve its garrison every day; that all the troops had orders to stand to their arms, and to come to meet us on the firing of the signal gun.

* These pontoons were nothing else than two bateaux coupled and united together by a platform which carried the gun or mortar mounted on its carriage; a species of pontoon of very great use in a lake such as Lake St. Sacrament, whose waters never rise, the chain of mountains which line both shores sheltering it from squalls.

3<sup>d</sup> At two o'clock in the morning a gun from the fort was heard and the Abenakis scouts gave notice at the same time that all was in motion in the English camp. The Marquis de Montcalm immediately gave orders to approach the fort and this order was repeated, to receive the enemy in case they came against us; and should they not come, to invest the place, and even to attack the intrenched camp, if it were considered susceptible of being taken by main force.

The St. Ours brigade, attached to the artillery, remained to guard it, and two men per bateau were left to guard the bateaux, all under the orders of Lieutenant-Colonel Privat.

The army moved at the dawn of day. Chevalier de Levis composed the van-guard with his detachment and all the Indians; the brigades followed in columns by battalions; M. de Rigaud on the right with the Canadians of Courtemanche's and Gaspé's brigades; M. de Bourlamaque on the left and M. de Montcalm in the centre. At ten o'clock in the forenoon, Chevalier de Levis took up a position on the road leading from Fort William Henry to Fort Edward, investing the place in the entire of that quarter; the remainder was invested by the main body of the army. The Marquis de Montcalm having proceeded in person to the front, perceived that it was impossible to attack the enemy's intrenchment without compromising all the forces of the Colony. At the same time, as the post occupied by the van-guard, although the best possible to completely blockade the English on that side, was not a post of war, and was besides too far from the siege, provisions and other stores, he sent out orders to M. de Bourlamaque to lay out the camp of the army, the left resting on the lake, the right on inaccessible ravines, and to conduct thither forthwith the La Sarre and Royal Rousillon brigades. For himself, he bivouacked through the night with the brigades of La Reine and Gaspé, within supporting distance of Chevalier de Levis' corps. Throughout this day the Indians fired into the farm of the fort, a manœuvre which they have continued throughout the siege, and killed all the horses, oxen and other cattle belonging to the enemy. The Commandant was also summoned and notified that if once our batteries were erected and cannon fired, perhaps 't would not be in our power to restrain the cruelty of the Indians; this summons was without effect.

4th At break of day the troops posted on the road to Fort Edward drew closer to the fort. The Marquis de Montcalm brought back the brigades of La Reine and Gaspé to take their places in the camp laid out by M. de Bourlamaque; the grenadier companies and the pickets of Chevalier de Levis' detachment rejoined their corps, and the army of the siege, of which M. de Bourlamaque had the direction, was composed of seven battalions and of the St. Ours and Gaspé brigades. Chevalier de Levis, with those of La Corne, Vassan, Repentigny, Courtemanche, Villiers' volunteers and all the Indians, was intrusted with protecting our right, sending scouts on the Fort Edward road, observing the enemy on that side, and making them believe, by continual movements, that we were again occupying that communication, for it was impossible wholly to invest the place with less than an army three times more numerous than ours.

At eleven o'clock in the forenoon the army was entirely posted, and the Marquis de Montcalm having resolved to open the trench that very night, went reconnoitring with the Engineers and M. Mercier, Commandant of the artillery. 'Twas decided to attack the fort from the northwest, and orders were at once issued for the construction of the necessary fascines, gabions and saucissons; the establishing of the dépôt of the trench and making a road from the camp to that dépôt. In regard to the landing of the artillery, it was judged easiest and most expeditious to bring the pontoons and unload them in the night, according as they were needed, at a little cove at the end of the dépôt.

On the night of the 4th @ 5th, 800 workmen, supported by six pickets, opened a sort of 1st parallel within 350 toises of the fort, began two batteries, one at the right, the other to the left, and the boyaux communicating from these batteries to the parallel. In spite of the obstacles presented everywhere by soil encumbered by trunks of trees and abatis, which required the employment of the axe and saw, the work advanced rapidly, and at day-break the men were everywhere under ground, except at the battery to the right, where the work had been slower, because the ground was worse. 12 guns were landed also that night, some mortars and the ammunition necessary for their service; the working party for the day perfected the boyaux which had been commenced, and considerably advanced the batteries on the left. They could not continue that on the right, its communication with the parallel not being completed.

As the garrison consisted of 2,500 men, and was consequently well able to make sorties, and as movements in the forest were difficult, the army had encamped convenient to the trench, in order to be within sustaining distance of it, yet, the troops being in that position, too much exposed to the fire of the place, the shot and shell from which had killed some men in the tents, the Marquis de Montcalm had the camp of the Royal Rousillon and La Sarre brigades moved back; that of La Reine, which formed the right, remained in its first position.

On the same day, the Indians intercepted a letter from General Webb, commanding on that frontier, dated Fort Edward, the 4th, at midnight, wherein he informed the Governor of Fort William Henry that he could not march to his relief, in order to extricate him, nor forward him any reinforcement until the arrival of the Provincial Militia, to whom he had sent orders to come and join him forthwith; that should the Militia arrive too late to enable him to advance and engage the French army, the Commandant should look to obtaining the best conditions possible.

This letter determined the Marquis de Montcalm to hasten the construction of the batteries, convinced that the success of the expedition depended on the celerity of the works of the siege; the number of workmen were consequently augmented; he also called the Indians together to reproach them that, whilst more engaged in firing to little purpose around the fort than with the essential business of scouting, they were neglecting their Father's will; that the majority of them remained idle near their canoes, and that scarce any of them had joined Chevalier de Levis' camp, as they had agreed to do, and the good of the service required. The Indians, on their side, complained that they seemed to be despised; that they were not consulted on the actual operations and would be made march without any understanding with their chiefs.

'Twas easy for the Marquis de Montcalm to make them comprehend that the cause of their complaint was imaginary and groundless, and at all events could not be but the effect and consequence of experiencing some of those neglects inevitable in the hurry of vast occupations; therefore two Belts and ten Strings of Wampum were sufficient to efface the bad impressions, to clear the sight, cleanse the heart and restore the senses.

The Indians promised to join Chevalier de Levis' camp that very night, and to obey his orders in regard to scouting. The Marquis de Montcalm then communicated to them the news, the contents of General Webb's letter, the steps he proposed adopting in consequence, and finished by telling them that the big guns (so they call the cannon) would open fire next day; which diffused great joy throughout the meeting.

On the night of the 5th @ 6th our working parties finished the battery on the left, completed the communication of the parallel with the battery on the right, which they also considerably advanced. The former consisting of 8 guns, 3 of which were 18<sup>s</sup>, and one, a 9-inch mortar, opened its fire at ten o'clock in the forenoon. It threw shot either parallel, or in an acute angle with (écharpant) the defences of the lake front, of the west front or the roadstead of the sloops.

On the night of the 7th @ 8th our workmen ran a boyau of 150 toises forward towards the capital of the west bastion, and completed the battery on the right, which was unmasked at day-break. This battery of 8 guns, viz', 2 18s, 5 12s, 1 8, and two 7-inch howitzers, and one 6-inch mortar, threw shot in an acute angle with the front of attack, and swept the intrenched camp with a ricochet fire.

At 9 o'clock in the morning, after a double salute from the right and left batteries, which was accompanied by loud whoops from the Indians, the Marquis de Montcalm sent me to carry to the Commandant, General Webb's letter, which had been intercepted two days before. The perusal of that letter at a moment when our works were so advanced, might determine him to surrender, and the Indians had demanded the adoption of that course.

On the same day, the Marquis de Montcalm received with the list of the favors granted to the French troops, the despatch wherein you announce to him, my Lord, that the King has honored him with the Red ribbon. Every one feels his zeal for his Majesty's service redouble in consequence. Even the Indians came to compliment our General and to state to him, that they were delighted at the distinction with which the Grand Ononthio had just decorated him, as they knew how highly he appreciated it; that as for themselves, they did not love nor esteem him the more on that account, inasmuch as it was his person they loved and esteemed, and not what could be added to his exterior. 'Tis true, my Lord, that the Marquis de Montcalm has known how to win their affections. They themselves observed that he was acquainted with their customs and manners as if he had been reared in the midst of their cabins, and what is almost unprecedented, he has succeeded in managing them, throughout this entire expedition, without giving them either brandy or wine, or even an outfit of which they stood in the greatest need, but the army lacked. He did, indeed, take the greatest care of their sick and wounded, and he gave up his supplies to them to contribute to their restoration.

On the night of the 7th @ 8th we continued the boyau commenced on the preceding evening, which was run to within about 100 toises of the ditch of the place. At the extremity of this boyau a crotchet was also opened, for the purpose of establishing a 3<sup>d</sup> battery or lodging some musketry there. The guard of the trench had been augmented; it was composed of three companies of grenadiers and 7 pickets. About midnight two deserters who were approaching our camp, fell into an ambuscade of Indians who had been posted on their bellies in front of the working party, and had fired on those two men. On the report of this fire all the mountains around the fort reëchoed with the whoops of the Indians who called and answered each other. This probably dissuaded the besieged from attempting a sortie which they were very near doing.

The night's work brought us to a swamp of about fifty toises in width, bordered by an acclivity that sheltered it from the batteries of the place, except eight @ ten toises which were exposed to their fire. Although broad daylight, the Marquis de Montcalm, to accelerate the works, ordered this passage to be effected like that across a wet ditch of a fort. The sappers applied themselves to it with so much activity that it was finished that same morning, notwithstanding the enemy's very brisk cannonading and fire of musketry; we were thus enabled to construct across the swamp, before night, a road of round sticks and hurdles capable of bearing artillery.

About 4 o'clock in the afternoon, some Indian scouts reported a considerable force marching by the Fort Edward road to the relief of the place. Chevalier de Levis repaired immediately to the spot with the greater part of the Canadians and all the Indians. The Marquis de Montcalm followed him at the head of the brigades of La Reine and Gaspé and of three companies of grenadiers. The other three, the brigades of La Sarre, Royal Rousillon, St. Ours and the Militia, remained under the orders of M. de Bourlamaque, to cover our trenches, bateaux and the camp. At 6 o'clock the Marquis de Montcalm reached the Fort Edward road, where he joined Chevalier de Levis. Unfortunately the news of the enemy's march was false. An Abenaki became afraid and thought he saw them. The promptness of our movements, which astonished the Indians, contributed, at least, to increase still more their confidence in us, and to show them that they had reason to rely as much on the vigilance, as on the valor, of the French troops, whom they called their wall of support. Before the close of the day, all the troops had returned to the camp and the work of the siege was in nowise deranged.

On the night of the 8th @ 9th we issued from the swamp by a boyau communicating with the second parallel which was opened on the crest of the acclivity. This parallel was to be the starting point to establish the batteries for effecting a breach, and by its prolongation to encompass the fort and cut off its communication with the intrenched camp which had been open until then. This work was considerably advanced that night, although the fire from the fort had never yet been so brisk. The guard of the trench consisted, as on the night preceding, of three companies of grenadiers and seven pickets.

9th At eight o'clock in the morning, the besieged hoisted a white flag, and Colonel Young,<sup>1</sup> commanding one of the battalions of the Royal American regiments, was sent by the Governor to propose the articles of capitulation. The Marquis de Montcalm, after having agreed with him on the principal points, notified him that he could not pledge his word to any of them before the Indians had accepted them, for which purpose he forthwith called a General Council, where he explained the conditions whereon the English were offering to surrender, and those he was resolved to grant them. He demanded of the chiefs their consent and whether they could answer for their young men not violating the terms. The chiefs unanimously assured him that they approved all he would do, and would prevent their young men committing any disorder.

After this promise, solemnly given by the chiefs of all the Nations, the Marquis de Montcalm sent me to prepare the capitulation, copy whereof is annexed to this despatch. He would have provided that the garrison should surrender prisoners of war, and it had probably agreed to this condition; but how could the Colony feed 2,500 additional men, so long as the inhabitants of Quebec are reduced to a quarter of a pound of bread a day?

Before returning to the trench, I paid the greatest attention, according to the instructions I had received, to have the wine, brandy and all the intoxicating liquors spilt, and the English easily perceived how important it was for them to take this precaution.

At noon the garrison marched out of the fort with their effects, and retired, as was agreed on, to the intrenched camp, into which a detachment of our troops was sent, as requested, by the English themselves. M. de Montcalm likewise ordered the officers and interpreters attached to the Indians to remain until the departure of the English. M. de Bourlamaque took possession of the fort with the troops of the trench. He contented himself with stationing guards on the powder magazine and provision stores. The remainder was abandoned to pillage, which it had been impossible to prevent.

Notwithstanding all the precautions that had been taken, the Indians, who got into the intrenchment of the English, wished to pillage their chests; the latter, opposing such proceeding, 'twas to be feared that some serious disorder would ensue. The Marquis de Montcalm ran thither immediately; prayers, threats, caresses, consultations with the chiefs, interposition of the officers and interpreters, who have some authority over these savages; he made use of every means to stop and restrain them. About 9 o'clock at night, he appeared to have accomplished that object. In addition to the detachment of 300 men, and the officers and interpreters, stipulated by the capitulation, he even prevailed on two chiefs per Nation to accompany the English as an escort as far as the vicinity of Fort Edward. It was not until after this arrangement that he made me start for Montreal.

Such, my Lord, are the principal details of this expedition. You will receive, by the earliest ship, the plan of the fort and of the attacks, the list of the garrison, artillery and munitions of war, and provisions which have been taken in it. It does not become me to set a value on the merit of an operation in which 5,500 effective men, exclusive of the Indians, have captured a fort and intrenched camp, defended by nearly 3,000 men, and within reach of relief from all the forces of the English Colonies. Therefore, I leave it to my General to render you an account of the zeal and ardor evinced by every one on this occasion. I only know that the entire army was employed as long as the siege lasted, either in the camp, or in the woods for fascines, gabions and saucissons, or in the trench; that 600 toises of works had been constructed, the boyaux having been wide enough to admit the transportation of two pieces of cannon abreast, which was indispensable, inasmuch as the abatis, with which the ground was encumbered, did not permit of the passing of the artillery over the reverses.

Had the enemy postponed the surrender, everything would have been in readiness to batter in breach on the 11th, and the Marquis de Montcalm's plan was to have the fort assaulted and the intrenched camp attacked both at the same time. M. de Bourlamaque would have had charge of the first operation; Chevalier de Levis of the second, and the Marquis de Montcalm would have stationed himself between the two, ready to sustain the one or the other.

We have had about 60 men killed or wounded. The English are computed to have had 200 killed and 150 wounded. The extreme fatigue attendant on passing an army almost exhausted by fatigue and bad food over a portage, without oxen or horses, the want of munitions of war and provisions, the necessity of sending back the Canadians to their harvests already ripe, the departure of all the Upper country, and of almost all the domiciliated Indians; such were the insurmountable obstacles which prevented our immediate march on Fort Edward. The Marquis de Montcalm is now busy razing the fort and intrenchment, in evacuating and clearing out, and in making the portage at Carillon, whence he does not expect to return before the end of this month. Probably we shall wind up the campaign in that quarter with two battalions on the defensive. The other four will be employed in continuing the works begun at St. John, the road from that fort to Laprairie and that between St. Thérèse and Chambly.

The two battalions of Berry arrived at Quebec in very bad condition. An epidemic contracted on shipboard has caused the death of a great many soldiers, and several officers, and this sickness has not yet subsided.

Permit me, my Lord, to assure you that I anxiously seek every occasion to render myself of any utility to my General and country, and that my greatest desire is to merit your favor, and whatever distinctions it will procure me.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DE BOUGAINVILLE.

P. S. We have just learned, my Lord, the news of the outrages committed by the Indians on the morning of the 10th. The English, who entertain an inconceivable fear of them, being impatient to get at a distance from them, wished to march before our escort was collected and in order. Some of their soldiers in spite of all the warnings that had been given on that point, had given them some rum to drink, and who in the world could restrain 2,000 Indians of 32 different Nations, when they have drank liquor? The disorder commenced by the Abenakis of Panaouamské in Acadia, who pretended to have experienced some ill treatment at the hands of the English. Their example operated on others; they flung themselves on the garrison, which instead of showing fight, were panic-stricken. This emboldened the Indians who pillaged them, killed some twenty soldiers, and carried off five or six hundred. All the officers ran thither on the report of this disorder, made the greatest efforts to put a stop to it there, so that some grenadiers of our escort were wounded by the Indians. The English themselves state publicly that the Marquis de Montcalm, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Levis and de Bourlamaque and many others, ran the risk of their lives, in order to save theirs, for in such cases the Indians have no respect for persons. At length the latter were quieted, and the Marquis de Montcalm released immediately about 400 of those who had been taken, whom he caused to be clothed and sent back to Fort Edward under an escort, after the Indians had departed. Those whom the Indians have brought to Montreal have been ransomed out of their hands by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, at a great cost, and at the King's expense, and they will be immediately forwarded to Halifax by a vessel sent as an express. The Marquis de Montcalm has written two letters; one to General Webb, the other to Lord Loudon, to notify them that this disorder, which was involuntary on the part of the French, ought not to afford the English a pretext of disregarding the capitulation, and that he would expect from their honor, that they would observe it in all its points.

You will find hereunto annexed, my Lord, a copy of those two letters.

Articles of Capitulation granted to Lieutenant-Colonel Monra for his Britannic Majesty's garrison of Fort William Henry, the intrenched camps adjoining the same and their dependencies, by the Marquis de Montcalm, General of his Most Christian Majesty's troops in Canada, the 9th of August, 1757.

ARTICLE 1<sup>a</sup>.

The garrison of Fort William Henry, and the troops in the intrenched camp adjoining, shall march out with their arms and the other honors of war.

The baggage of the officers and of the soldiers only.

They shall proceed to Fort Edward escorted by a detachment of French troops and some Officers and Interpreters attached to the Indians, and march at an early hour to-morrow morning.

ARTICLE 2<sup>a</sup>.

The gate of the fort shall be delivered up to the troops of his Most Christian Majesty after the signing of the capitulation, and the intrenched camp, on the departure of his Britannic Majesty's troops.

ARTICLE 3<sup>a</sup>.

All the artillery, warlike stores, provisions, and in general everything except the effects of the officers and soldiers specified in the first article, shall, upon honor, be delivered up to the troops of his Most Christian Majesty, and with that view an exact inventory of the property herein mentioned shall be delivered after the capitulation, observing that this Article includes the fort, intrenchment and dependencies.

ARTICLE 4th.

The garrison of the fort, intrenched camp and dependencies shall not be at liberty to serve for eighteen months, reckoning from this date, against his Most Christian Majesty nor against his allies; and with the capitulation shall be furnished an exact return of his troops, wherein shall be set forth the names of the officers, Majors, other officers, Engineers, artillery officers, Commissaries and employés.

ARTICLE 5th.

All the officers, soldiers, Canadians, women and Indians, taken on land since the commencement of this war in North America, shall be delivered at Carillon within the space of three months, on the receipts of the French Commandants, to whom they shall be delivered; an equal number of the garrison of Fort George shall be at liberty to serve, according to the return which shall be given in thereof by the English officer, who will have charge of the prisoners.

ARTICLE 6th.

An officer shall be given as an hostage until the return of the detachment, which will be furnished as an escort for his Britannic Majesty's troops.

ARTICLE 7th.

All the sick and wounded who are not in a condition to be removed to Fort Edward, shall remain under the protection of the Marquis de Montcalm, who will take proper care of them and return them immediately after they are cured.

ARTICLE 8th.

Provisions for the subsistence of said troops shall be issued for this day and to-morrow only.

ARTICLE 9th.

The Marquis de Montcalm being willing to show Lieutenant-Colonel Monro and his garrison, some token of his esteem on account of their honorable defence, grants them one piece of cannon—a six-pounder.

Done at noon, in the trenches before Fort William Henry, the ninth of August, one thousand seven [hundred] and fifty-seven.

Granted in the name of his Most Christian Majesty, pursuant to the power I possess from the Marquis de Vaudreuil, his Governor and Lieutenant-General in New France.

(Signed), GEO. MONRO, Lieutenant-Colonel 35th, and Commandant of his Majesty's forces in and near Fort William Henry.

(Signed), MONTCALM.

M. de Montcalm to Brigadier-General Webb.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Copy of a letter written by the Marquis de Montcalm to General Webb, the 14th of August, 1757.

Sir,

Colonel Monrow's gallant defence has determined me to grant to him and his garrison an honorable capitulation. It would not have experienced the slightest alteration had not your soldiers furnished rum; had that troop been willing to march out with more order in the execution of what I had prescribed to it, and had the Abenakis of Panaoüameské in Acadia not supposed they had reason to complain of some ill treatment.

You know what it is to restrain 3,000 Indians of 33 different Nations, and I had but too many apprehensions which I did not conceal from the Commandant of the fort in my summons. I consider myself lucky that the disorder was not attended by consequences as unfortunate as I had reason to fear. I am pleased with myself for having exposed my person as well as my officers in the defence of yours, who render justice to all that I have done on that occasion. I shall cause to be conducted to you, to-morrow, the prisoners and your officers whom I have collected together and rescued from the hands of the Indians. They will be escorted by two companies of Grenadiers and two hundred volunteers, and will be conducted as far as the Half-way brook. I request you will have a like detachment stationed there to receive them, which will bring back the detachment I send you for M. Ameltor's<sup>1</sup> safety.

All the wounded, among whom are two officers, being under my protection, have left with one of my surgeons and all possible help for Montreal.

I have dispatched an express to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of New France, to rescue from the hands of the Indians all the prisoners of your garrison, and when I shall have them collected, they will be sent by an armed vessel or express boat, for their greater security, to Louisbourg. The Commandant of that post will forward them to Halifax. When the few Frenchmen and Canadians, whom you may have prisoners since the beginning of this war, will be collected together agreeably to the capitulation, I request you to have them sent to Halifax, to be exchanged for yours, whom I shall send to Louisbourg. The communication between Carillon and your frontier is always too much infested by our Indian parties on both sides, to be safe. I have kept until to-day, the prisoners and your officers whom I had collected, to allow the fury of the Indians to die out.

I have the honor to address you letters for his Excellency Lord Lawdon, to whom I give an account of what has occurred.

I shall not send any Indian party out to-morrow to fight.

I am, &c.

M. de Montcalm to Lord Loudon.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Copy of the letter written by the Marquis de Montcalm to Lord Loudon, 14th August, 1757.

My Lord,

Colonel Monrow's gallant defence has determined me to grant him and his garrison an honorable capitulation. It would not have experienced the slightest alteration had not your soldiers furnished rum; had that troop been willing to march out with more order and not taken fright at our Indians, which emboldened the latter; in a word, had they been willing to put into execution what I had proposed to them for their own benefit. I regard as a real misfortune, the having with me the Abenakis of Panaouské in Acadia, who had supposed that they had reason to complain of some ill treatment. You know what it is to restrain 3,000 Indians of 33 different Nations, and I had but too much apprehension of them, which I did not conceal from the Commandant of the fort in my summons. I consider myself lucky that the disorder was not attended by consequences as unfortunate as I had reason to fear. I am pleased with myself for having exposed my person as well as my officers in the defence of yours, who render justice to everything that I have done on that occasion.

Therefore, my Lord, I request you to cause the capitulation to be executed in every particular. The least omission in its execution, on the slightest pretext, would be of still more fatal consequence for you than for us. I have withdrawn from the Indians over 400 prisoners and the few that remain in their hands shall be collected by the Marquis de Vaudreuil to whom I have dispatched an express, and will be sent by an armed vessel or express boat for their greater safety, to Louisbourg, the Commandant of which post will forward them to Halifax, when the few Frenchmen and Canadians that you may have prisoners since the commencement of this war will be collected agreeably to the capitulation. I rely on your honor for the number, and I demand particularly the man named Laforce, a Canadian, who ought to have been sent back according to the capitulation of Fort Necessity. I request you to have them conducted to Halifax to be exchanged for yours whom I shall send to Louisbourg,

I shall take great care of Captain Fech who has remained as a hostage for the capitulation, as well as of the wounded Captain whom I have already sent to Montreal, with a Surgeon and all possible help. I annex to this letter one I have the honor to write you by Lieutenant-Colonel Yong, and which is a proof to you of the high esteem I entertain for your Excellency.

I am, &c.

Detail of the Campaign of 1757.

North America—Detail of the Campaign of 1757, from the 30th of July to the 4th September.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil having formed a plan of offensive operations towards Lake St. Sacrament, to secure Forts Carillon and St. Frederic, sent, in the month of March, a corps of fifteen hundred Frenchmen, Canadians or Indians, under the command of M. de Rigaud, Governor of Three Rivers, to burn the sloops, bateaux and storehouses under the guns of Fort George, called by the English, William Henry.

That expedition having been attended with all the success that was anticipated, the Marquis de Vaudreuil determined to open the campaign by the siege of Fort George, and consequently ordered betimes the necessary preparations.

The delay of the fleet and the want of provisions rendered this operation very doubtful, the ships which arrived at the end of June and in the course of July having been insufficient, the Marquis de Vaudreuil ordered a strict inquiry to be made among the farmers as to what provisions they might have in their possession.

Each farmer reduced himself to a small allowance until the harvest, and gave the surplus, which supplied what was lacking for this enterprise.

After assuring himself in the matter of provisions, M. de Vaudreuil issued his orders to collect the troops destined for the siege in the course of July at the portage of Lake St. Sacrament, where a corps of Canadians was stationed since the month of May, under the orders of Mr. Gaspé, a Colonial Captain.

The army being assembled at the appointed time at the portage, which is half a league in extent, was occupied from the moment of its arrival in transporting artillery, bateaux, munitions of war and provisions.

July 30th Everything being ready, Chevalier de Levis set out with two thousand eight hundred Frenchmen or Indians on his overland march for the Bay of Ganaouské, to await there the Marquis de Montcalm, who was to embark on the 1st of August with four thousand eight hundred Frenchmen or Indians.

August 2<sup>d</sup> At three o'clock in the morning, the army, consisting of seven thousand six hundred men, formed a junction at the Bay of Ganaouské, whence it took its departure on the same day. Chevalier de Levis' detachment led the van to reconnoitre a favorable place for landing the artillery and the force commanded by the Marquis de Montcalm.

3rd At four o'clock in the morning all the troops landed within two leagues of Fort George.

At seven o'clock in the morning the artillery being arrived, the army set out to invest it.

Meanwhile, the Marquis de Montcalm having been informed by two prisoners taken the preceding evening, that the enemy proposed to come and meet him, marched with the intention of giving them battle.

Chevalier de Levis, commanding the van-guard, approached the fort without opposition. He advanced towards an intrenchment, which appeared well fortified and guarded by a considerable force. After having reconnoitred it, he made a report of its condition to the Marquis de Montcalm, who did not deem proper to attack it, being unwilling to expose his troops.

But on the same day caused the Commandant to be summoned, who gave him for answer, that his troops were determined to defend themselves to the death. After that answer, arrangements were made for the siege, and the army was encamped.

The troops of the Line, resting on the lake, formed the left wing; the Canadians and Indians formed a separate camp at some distance on the right of the troops, so as to be ready to repair promptly to the road from Fort Ledijs, called by the English Fort Edward, at the earliest notice that may be received of the enemy having dispatched a corps from that quarter to the relief of this place.

Chevalier de Levis, intrusted with that duty, was continually sending Indians out, in order to be informed of the enemy's movements.

Every time he marched with his force, on the intelligence he received from his scouts, M. de Montcalm set out immediately with a certain number of Regulars to support him, and left behind only enough to secure the trench, which he had ordered opened near the lake on the night of the fourth and fifth.

The success of this expedition, depending on the celerity of the works, the Marquis de Montcalm ordered that the greatest number of workmen possible be furnished, and that they be paid daily from the Military chest, on the certificate of the Engineers, or officer in charge of the detail of the trench, countersigned by Chevalier de Montreuil, Major-General.

6th We had eight guns and two mortars in battery.

7th One of our Indians intercepted a letter which General Oueb was sending to Colonel Monrau, Commandant of the troops of the intrenchment and of the garrison of Fort George.

Notifying him that he had dispatched orders to the Militia to march with the greatest diligence possible; as soon as any should arrive, he would not lose a moment in sending him a reinforcement.

He solicited him to surrender his post on honorable conditions, should he be forced to do so by the delay of the Militia.

This General, who commanded a corps of four thousand men, encamped before Fort Lidijs, within six leagues of Fort George, informed the Commandant that, owing to the situation of his fort, 'twas out of his power to send him any troops.

8th M. de Montcalm, correctly judging the effect such a letter would produce, forwarded it to the Commandant of the post this morning, after having ordered a second battery, equal to the first, to be discharged.

The Commandant of the post, after having thanked M. de Montcalm, continued his fire; our two batteries kept up, in like manner, a continual cannonade during the day.

9th The Commandant of the fort, seeing our works so far advanced, demanded to capitulate. M. de Montcalm offered him the honors of war and one cannon, with the clause not to serve for eighteen months.

Whilst these things were proceeding, he had the Indian chiefs called together to whom he communicated his design, which they approved.

The capitulation having been accepted, Chevalier de Montreuil, Major-General, repaired immediately by orders of M. de Montcalm to the fort and intrenchment, to take a list of the troops, and to see to the security of the provisions and warlike stores.

The grenadiers and pickets of the French were ordered to proceed and relieve the garrison of the fort, which was to march out to join the troops encamped in the intrenchment.

Everything having been regulated, Colonel Monrau applied for leave to march with his troops at nightfall, so as not to be annoyed by the Indians.

M. de Montcalm ordered out an escort and directed M. de St. Luc de la Corne, commanding the Indians, and several Colonial officers conversant with their languages, to accompany the garrison in order to protect it against insult from the Indians.

These officers having learned that the greater portion had gone to lie in ambush on the Lidius road, where the English soldiers must necessarily pass, advised Colonel Monrau not to set out before the break of day, so as to be better able to control the Indians; but they were no longer masters of them on the morrow.

A party of Englishmen were plundered on leaving the intrenchment; four hundred were taken on the road and brought to the camp, the greater portion of the English officers happened to be among these.

M. de Montcalm rescued the major part of them, paid them great attention and sent them back with an escort after the Indians had left.

M. de Vaudreuil caused the others to be given up at Montreal, when the Indians were passing through, and will send them back by the first opportunity.

We have lost at this siege, in killed,	men, 13
wounded,	40
And the enemy, in killed,	men, 41
wounded,	71

The French army, including Indians, consisted of 7,626, and the garrison of Fort George and the troops encamped in the intrenchment, of 2,372.

Our artillery consisted of 31 pieces of cannon, 1 mortar, 3 howitzers, 10 grenade mortars, 70 thousand weight of powder; shell and shot in proportion.

And that of the enemy, 23 cannon, of which 8 were brass, 1 iron howitzer, 1 mortar, 17 swivels, 35,835<sup>lbs</sup> of powder, 2,522 shot, 545 shell, 1,400<sup>lbs</sup> of ball, one case of grenades, 6 cases of fire-works and some grape shot of divers calibre.

Over 3,000 barrels of flour or pork, which have been forwarded from Fort George to Carillon 10th Fort George being entirely destroyed, our artillery, that of the enemy and all the munitions of war, and provisions being sent to the Carrying place, the army embarked and arrived there on the same day.

M. de Montcalm not having bateaux enough for the entire army, ordered the Royal Rousillon and Bearn battalions to encamp on one of the islands of Lake St. Sacrament, and he sent to bring them along the next day.

17th The Marquis de Montcalm has sent away all the Canadians in order to save the harvest, and has retained the Land and Marine forces to transport to Carillon the artillery, bateaux, warlike stores and provisions.

This transportation which forms a land carriage of half a league, is to be completed about the 14th of September, after which the battalions will leave in order to work until the close of the campaign, at the forts and roads which it is essential to put in order.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Paulmy.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 8th of September, 1757.

My Lord,

M. de Bougainville, my Aid-de-Camp, whom I had sent to the Marquis de Vaudreuil to convey the intelligence of the fall of Fort William Henry, and whom I had instructed, at the same time, to write to you by the ship which M. de Vaudreuil was to dispatch to France, has, it appears to me, left nothing to desire in the Relation he has had the honor of addressing you. Therefore will I content myself with transmitting a duplicate of it to you, annexing thereto a return of what composed the English garrison which is not to serve for eighteen months after the capitulation; a return of the artillery, vessels taken from the enemy, and provisions; the article of provisions forms, under the circumstances, a most precious object for a Colony where we are suffering a real scarcity; finally, a return of the killed and wounded. I also annex thereto a letter from Sieur des Androins, the Engineer, with whom I am more and more satisfied. He has the honor to address you a most exact plan of the fort and of his approaches, with his journal of the siege.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, being apprehensive that the English, whose bad faith is only too well known to us, would seek to elude the capitulation and to justify themselves by ill-founded reproaches, in consequence of the inconsiderate attack of the Indians, after the capitulation had been signed, has most readily communicated the most trivial circumstances to the Secretary of State for the department of the Marine. I have drawn up a letter in the name of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, which he has been pleased to adopt. I have the honor to transmit you a copy of it and of the Articles of the capitulation. I believe the simple recital of the facts will place him in a position, should the English wish to ascribe any odious imputation to us, to prove to the entire of Europe that the conduct of the troops, of their General, and of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, is not only exempt from all reproach but may merit some eulogiums and much gratitude on the part of the English, who saw me expose myself much more to save them from the fury of the Indians than to capture their fort.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil has annexed to his letter for M. de Moras, copy of divers letters mentioned in the one he writes to that Minister. I have not the honor to send them to you; they add nothing to the reality of the facts; besides, I paid great attention in writing them, to exhibit therein to General Webb and Lord Lawdon the dignity, firmness and politeness which appear to me proper.

I am, respectfully,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. You will perceive, my Lord, by the extract of a letter of the 16th of August, from M. Bigot, Intendant of Canada, that circumstances obliged me to stop after the capture of Fort William Henry.

"The resolution you have taken not to besiege Fort Edward and not to make the garrison prisoners of war, is the wisest in every point of view; we could not feed them. 'Twould be greatly to be feared that the harvest in the government of Montreal would have been lost had you detained the farmers any longer. You had not provisions enough at Carillon for that enterprise. I could not have subsisted our army on Lake St. Sacrament after the month of August. We must consider ourselves very fortunate to have been able to set on foot the army that you commanded and to have provided for its subsistence for forty days in a year in which people are, so to say, without bread. The Colony must feel all the obligations it is under to you."

The English, my Lord, will be only too well informed of our situation as regards provisions; therefore, should they intercept my despatches, they will learn nothing from me; they suppose us, in truth, much worse off than we are.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Copy of the despatch written by the Marquis de Vaudreuil to the Secretary of State for the Marine.

Montreal, the 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1757.

My Lord,

I could not refrain from informing you succinctly, by my despatch of the . . . , of everything connected with the capitulation granted by the Marquis de Montcalm to Fort William Henry.

If the English possess the least spark of justice, they cannot make us any reproach on that occasion; they will believe their own officers in regard to it, who are satisfied with our proceedings, as far as they are concerned, and the capitulation will be respected, on their part, in every particular. As, however, that Nation, who has given us but too many proofs of its bad faith, may wish not to execute it, and may even seek to justify itself by ill-founded reproaches,

I thought it my duty to supply you with means to prove to all Europe, if necessary, that the conduct of the troops, of their General and mine, is entirely irreproachable, and may even merit some eulogium. The simple exposition of the facts suffices, without proceeding to recrimination, and without entering into the detail of all their treacheries towards the Indians, a people who forget and forgive nothing, that the English have violated almost all the capitulations concluded in America, particularly at Fort Necessity, which was reduced by us in . . . , and at Beausejour, which was taken by them.

The Marquis de Montcalm, who had already experienced the difficulties of making the Indians observe the exact laws of a capitulation at the time Chouaguen was reduced, was afraid he should be less able to control them at a siege, where there were 2,000 of them, of 33 different Nations. Therefore, he caused the Commandant to be summoned on the very first day Fort George was invested; you will see by his letter annexed to this report, that he was led to that course by humanity, and that he did not conceal the apprehension created in his breast by the cruelty of the Indians.

The Commandant of the fort having sent Lieutenant-Colonel Yonck,<sup>1</sup> commanding a battalion of the Royal American regiment, to him on the morning of the ninth, with an offer to capitulate, and the Marquis de Montcalm having agreed with him respecting the terms, stated to Lieutenant-Colonel Yonck, that the sincere desire he felt to observe his capitulation, the uneasiness created in his mind by the Indians on that point, and his honor did not permit him to make any promises before holding a Council with these Nations and obtaining their promise. He immediately convoked, in that officer's presence, the Nations to a General Council; explained to them the conditions on which the English offered to surrender, and those he had resolved to grant them; asked the consent of the chiefs, and whether they could answer to him that their young men would not violate those terms. The chiefs unanimously assured him that they would approve whatever he would do, and that they would prevent their young men committing any disorder.

After this promise had been solemnly given by all the chiefs, the capitulation was signed. In order not to omit anything that prudence dictated on a like occasion, the Marquis de Montcalm had ordered Sieur de Bougainville, his Aid-de-Camp, who was with Lieut-Colonel Monro the Commander of the fort, to have the wine, brandy, rum and all the intoxicating liquors spilt; to confine the troops to the intrenched camp, where they were to remain, according to the capitulation, until the next day, when they were to be conducted to Fort Edward, notifying him that otherwise, 'twould not be possible to restrain that multitude of Indians; a precaution, the importance whereof ought to be perceived, however so little it had been attended to in America. He sent to the intrenchment, for the security of the English, as had been agreed on, a Lieutenant-Colonel with 200 men; finally, he ordered the officers and interpreters attached to the Indians to remain in it until the departure of the English. Such was the position of affairs at noon of the 9th.

Lieutenant-Colonel Yonck having, at the time of the capitulation, told the Marquis de Montcalm that he had the honor to be attached to my Lord Lawden, and that he was afraid the clause not to serve during 18 months might militate against his promotion, as he was to be Governor of Virginia, the Marquis de Montcalm, who had anticipated herein my intentions, gave him a letter to Lord Lawdon, copy whereof I transmit you, permitting Lieutenant-Colonel Yonck, notwithstanding the capitulation, to be at liberty to perform the civil functions of Governor of Virginia. The Marquis de Montcalm ran to the intrenchment on the afternoon of the 9th, on being notified that the Indians wished to plunder the baggage belonging to the English officers, and that the latter had made several of them drunk with rum; had recourse to prayers, menaces, caresses, councils with the chiefs, interference of the officers and interpreters who possess some authority over these barbarians; to everything to stop and restrain them. This beginning of disorderly conduct appeared in fine abated, and the Marquis de Montcalm retired to his camp at 9 o'clock at night, after having agreed that the English should march at the break of day with an escort, all the officers and interpreters attached to the Indians and two chiefs of each nation, to restrain the young men; a precaution which was superadded to all those that had been adopted in the morning.

During the night several Indians got drunk on the rum which, notwithstanding all that could be recommended to the English, the latter were furnishing, under the supposition that they would by such course render those people more favorable to them, of whom they entertain an inconceivable terror. The same dread determined them to set out on their march before our escort was entirely assembled and ready. The Abenakis of Panaouské in Acadia, who pretend to have experienced, this very year, some ill treatment on the part of the English, ran to insult them. Scarcely had they uttered their whoop, than the English troops, in place of evincing an air of confidence, took fright and fled helter-skelter, throwing down arms, baggage, and even their clothes. The great number of women this garrison was bringing back, contributed not a little to increase its terror. The Indians, emboldened to excess by this very panic of the English, set about plundering them, and I know not what would have been the result, had it not been for the promptness with which all the officers ran forward. The escort, which commenced collecting, opposed the outrage; we even had some grenadiers wounded on the occasion. The English themselves publish that the Marquis de Montcalm, Chevalier de Levis, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Rigaud, de Vaudreuil, de Bourlamaque and several others, had run the risk of their lives to save them, for in such cases the Indians respect nobody. Finally, the Marquis de Montcalm calmed the riot, put the entire of that garrison on its march somewhat worried, and on the same day, had more than 1,400 English conducted to Fort Edward, with very few officers indeed, for the dread of the Indians caused all, beginning with the Commandant, to prefer remaining in the camp. He recovered also on the same day, and made the Indians surrender about 400 English. The majority of the Nations gave them up to him with the greatest respect, and the most ample apologies on the part of the chiefs. The Marquis de Montcalm had all the clothing possible repurchased to fit out the English. Agreeably to Article VII. of the capitulation, he sent all the wounded to Carillon, and the greatest care was taken of them. He next sent me advice of what had just happened, and notified me that those of the Nations who were unwilling to surrender the English to him, had even gone away, contrary to usage, without taking leave, and carried their prisoners to Montreal. He retained the English he had recovered and all their officers, the 11th, 12th and 13th, to allow the fury of the Indians to die out. During the whole of that time, he paid all the attention to that garrison that you may expect from any one who thinks like the Marquis de Montcalm; but I can tell you, from the acknowledgment of the English, that he was well seconded by all the officers.

14th Everything appeared to him quiet, and as there was only a few domiciliated Indians with the army, he sent M. Amilton,<sup>1</sup> an English officer, under the escort of 30 grenadiers, commanded by Lieutenant Saviourin, of the La Sarre regiment, with Sieurs de St. Luc and Marin, officers attached to the Indians and two interpreters, and confided to them two letters, one for General Webb, who was at Fort Edward, and the other to be forwarded to Lord Lawden. I have the honor to transmit you copies thereof and of General Webb's answer. The English, and all the officers recovered by the Marquis de Montcalm from the Indians, set out on the following day, the 15th, escorted by 250 men, commanded by Captain de Poulharies of the Royal Rousillon grenadiers, who delivered them up to a like detachment, sent half way by General Webb. These troops took with them the cannon which had been allowed to them, agreeably to the 9th Article of the capitulation.

The Marquis de Montcalm requested of Lieut-Colonel Monro to furnish him an officer whom he might send to Montreal to me to witness there the exactness with which I should observe the capitulation, by collecting together again all those whom the Indians might have carried thither. Captain Fesch, of the Royal Americans, was selected and immediately sent to me. That officer has seen with what zeal I have ransomed all the English, not those included in the capitulation of Fort George, but all those, also, of that garrison who had been previously taken in the fight that occurred on Lake St. Sacrament on the 24th of July. The latter were, incontestably, prisoners of war and belonged even to the Indians according to the laws of war established among the most civilized nations. It has cost the King considerable, but I am too well aware of the intentions of his Majesty, who has always won the respect and admiration of his enemies by his moderation in the midst of his triumphs, not to have employed every means to enforce the capitulation granted by the Marquis de Montcalm and to afford proofs of his exactness in keeping his word, and of the generosity and humanity which seem to form, if I may be allowed the expression, the special character of our nation.

It had been agreed, by the 1st Article of the capitulation, to send back the English to Fort Edward, but at their request and for greater security, I have just armed a vessel or express boat, and sent them to Halifax with Captain Fesch. Of that garrison there remain with me only one wounded Captain and about 50 sick or wounded, of whom I shall take great care until they be in a condition to be sent back agreeably to Article 7 of the capitulation. The English, far from complaining, ought to feel the more grateful for what we have done on that occasion, inasmuch as all belonging to that garrison, whom the Indians had taken, are restored to them, and as, thanks to the activity of the Marquis de Montcalm and of all his officers, the disorder has been promptly arrested and only 6 or 7 English soldiers killed. I annex to this letter, copies of those I have just written to the Commandant of Halifax and to Lord Lawden, in sending back M<sup>r</sup> Fesch; of that which the Marquis de Montcalm wrote to that General; of M. Fesch's receipt, on delivering the English over to him to be carried away, and of a note explaining to you the proceeding of which the Abenakis of Panaouské complain, and which has been one of the principal causes of the event, all the particulars whereof I have just now detailed to you.

I am, &c.,

My Lord,

M. de Montcalm to M. de Paulmy.

[ Département de la Guerre, Paris. ]

Letter of M. de Montcalm to the Minister, with a copy of the circular letter from
M. de Montcalm to the Commander of the battalions, of the 25th July, 1757.

Quebec, 18th September, 1757.

My Lord,

By my last, of the fifteenth of August, 8th 7<sup>her</sup>, and that of M. de Bourgainville of the twentieth of August, you have been rendered a most exact account of everything relative to the capture of Fort William Henry. I now continue the detail of the little that remains to be written to you up to this day, when the packets are to be put on board the two men of war, Le Bizarre and Le Celebre, which are returning to France, after touching at Louisbourg.

The demolition and evacuation of Fort William Henry being entirely completed on the fifteenth of August, I brought back the army on the 16th to occupy the camp of the Lake St. Sacrament portage. I left that place on the 29th in order to repair to the Marquis de Vaudreuil at Montreal.

Chevalier de Levis organized a detachment on the 31st, with six companies of grenadiers, seven pickets and 100 Canadians, with the sole view of reconnoitring Wood creek, the head of the Bay and the defiles towards the enemy. He left the camp at Carillon, himself, on the 3rd, and brought back the battalions of La Reine, La Sarre, Languedoc and Guienne encamped at Carillon until the close of the campaign, together with the Royal Rousillon and Bearn battalions, some Colonial troops and Canadians. There exists the greatest dearth of provisions. We have lost so great a number of ships and the harvest is so bad, that this interesting item excites serious apprehension.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil proposes to terminate the campaign this year somewhat earlier than last, viz<sup>t</sup>, about the fifteenth of October. The winter quarters are already fixed upon; four battalions in the government of Quebec, four in that of Montreal. I have determined to station in the Quebec government those of La Reine and Languedoc, to approximate them to their companies which arrived only a few days ago after a long voyage. These companies have landed in a very feeble condition, with few sick, having only 255 men. Such is not the case with the two battalions of Berry, which will remain also near Quebec. These, including 91 men left at Louisbourg, are reduced to 913 men, having lost 141 men since sailing from Brest. The four battalions of La Sarre, Royal Rousillon, Guienne and Bearn will be stationed at Montreal and in its environs. The military hospitals have been as effective as they were bad last year, a circumstance owing to the attention which has been paid by the Intendant to my representations and memoirs and to those of M. Doreil. The latter, who performs his duty as well as any man can, spent the summer in Quebec, where his presence has been much needed, in order to receive our recruits and companies. On the arrival here of Sieur de la Grive, Commissary of War at Louisbourg, who, you state in your letter of the 20th of March, is to come hither, M. Doreil will see to the regulation of the duties he will have to perform.

The latest intelligence from Louisbourg is of the 20th of August. It appeared that the English fleet was preparing to cope with ours, or to attempt a landing. That enterprise is a mad determination.

Our latest news from Fort du Quesne and Niagara are of the 15th of August. They only make mention of small parties which continue to harass the enemy, and it appears that the Five Nations are always favorably disposed and at least inclined to an exact neutrality; many of their young men go out to fight on our side.

I came to Quebec to review the regiment of Berry, to see the new companies of La Reine and Languedoc and our recruits. I shall wait for the Marquis de Vaudreuil who is coming hither in the early part of next month. Considerable has been done to the fortifications at Quebec in setting up batteries there. I have not been consulted. I had offered to come and pass eight days here in the beginning of spring. Neither have the officers of the Corps Royal. Nevertheless I am now going to see actually what has been done. It might have been of more use to have instructed me to look at it before. M. Levis has remained at Montreal, near the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and within hail of our four battalions at St. John and Chambly.

I annex to this letter the return of our six battalions, according to the reviews I made of them on the 22<sup>d</sup> and 23<sup>d</sup> of August. Since our receipt of 326 recruits, I am enabled to raise all the companies to 39, including the new ones of La Reine and Languedoc. You perceive, my Lord, that we are very far from thinking of the augmentations authorized by the order of the 25th February, 1757, to fix all the companies at 50. Up to the present time we have received only 1,100 recruits, 750 of whom have been taken by the troops of the Colony for their ten augmentation companies, or to render them complete. 'Tis asserted that the English have captured about 600 recruits in divers ships; 'tis much to be feared that no more will arrive.

I annex to this despatch copy of a letter I have written to Mess<sup>rs</sup> the Commandants of the corps, when I marched on the expedition against Fort William Henry. 'Twill afford you an idea, my Lord, of the difficult circumstances under which the war has to be waged.

I also annex hereunto a memorandum of those letters you have done me the honor to write to me, and which I have received this year, and another of those I have had the honor to write you.

I have received the commissions and letters for the nominations to the vacant employments.

I have filled up, according to your intentions, those blank ones you have sent me, and shall forward you a memorandum thereof by the latest ships, with a memoir of the proposals for the situations which will be vacant in the course of this year.

I have received the duplicate of the despatch advising that the King had granted me a place of Commander in the Order of St. Louis, and the list of favors granted to the officers who are serving in Canada. I have to repeat to you my thanks, and to assure you of my entire gratitude; but I have as yet received neither the private letter respecting the favors, nor the Crosses; not even that of Commander, which was announced to me by your despatch of the 11th of March.

I have received the Colors I had the honor to request of you for the regiments of Guienne and Bearn.

It only remains for me to express to you my entire satisfaction with the assurance of your approval of my conduct, which you are pleased to give me in the letter you have honored me with on the 20th of May; and I have to thank you no less for the letter with which you honored me on the 10th of April. It requires a special answer which I have the honor to send you.

I am, with respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

Copy of the circular letter written from the camp at Carillon, on the 25 July, by the Marquis de Montcalm to the Commandants of Battalions.

Sir,

You are not ignorant of the nature of the expedition we are about to undertake; your experience in the profession sufficiently informs you that celerity principally must cause its success. Besides, the circumstances of detail, peculiar to this Colony and which are not unknown to you, render it indispensably necessary for us to act with promptness. You are also aware what are the difficulties, embarrassments, and consequently the slowness inseparable from transport in this country. We have few bateaux; the warlike stores and provisions fill the greatest portion of them to such an extent that we are obliged to make a large division of the army march overland. Is it not rendering justice to your zeal, Sir, and to that of the officers, to be convinced that they will coöperate cordially and heartily in whatever will hasten the termination of our expedition? They will themselves perceive that what, under other circumstances, might be regarded as a matter of necessity, would on this occasion be a luxury prejudicial to the good of the service. The following, then, is the regulation, which I consider it my duty to make, respecting what each person will carry along.

1st All the soldiers will leave their vests here; they will march with their coats and blanket; they will carry tents and kettles, and as the companies of the Regular troops are reduced, they will carry only three tents per company. They will be aware that it will be necessary for them to carry several days' provisions; therefore 'twill be for their advantage not to overload themselves with articles of superfluity.

2nd Officers of whatever grade will carry with them a canvass awning (canonnière) for every two, and I shall furnish the example in this instance as I have done in the Chouaguen campaign; for servants, one awning for every eight. A blanket and bearskin are the bed of a warrior in such an expedition. Yet, I forbid not a mattress. Age and infirmities may render it necessary to some. I shall not carry any, and I doubt not but all who will be able, will willingly imitate me. Provision will be made for some in the suite of the army for the sick and wounded.

3<sup>d</sup> Every sort of coop is absolutely prohibited, and the Majors will receive orders on embarking to throw away those which might be presented. Some fowls can be conveyed in a less cumbersome manner; it even seems that a soldier's fare ought to be sufficient for us; every two officers 15 quarts of wine, or if they prefer it, a case of wine per mess.

4th Finally, as soon as the order of marching is issued, and it becomes known who those are that are to go by land, arrangements will be made in the battalions for those going in bateaux to take charge of the provisions and baggage of their comrades, so as not to delay rejoining them.

Such, sir, are the regulations which circumstances render necessary for an expedition which, in other respects, is to be regarded as a tour of 15 days, or 3 weeks at farthest. I request you to communicate it in advance to the officers of your regiment.

I have the honor to be, &c.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Paulmy.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Quebec, 18th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1757.

My Lord,

I owe an answer and thanks for the private despatch with which you honored me on the 10th of April. You write me graciously; I shall omit nothing to render me worthy thereof. You order me to write you with confidence; I would not have awaited your letter, for I would be as inviolably attached to you as to the Count d'Argenson, and that is saying everything. I had been so already; I shall be so all my life, to whatever will bear your name, and I should disown my son were he not of the same mind. Your uncle and I had agreed on an address which I made use of, and will again have recourse to, should you write me that it is not subject to any inconvenience. Meanwhile, I shall write you particularly, making use of the cipher with which he had furnished me. You will receive, by the last ships, a very lengthy and very minute despatch, which will leave you nothing to wish for in point of the most interesting details. You will receive it in triplicate and therein will consist the greatest security.

The wise counsel you give me proves to my mind how much you are pleased to interest yourself for the success of my mission. You can assure the King that what you so strictly recommend on his part is exactly followed on mine; therefore have I acquired to the highest degree the confidence of the Canadians and Indians. With the former, when I am on the march or in camp, I have the air of a Tribune of the people; my success, which any other might have had, and the intimate acquaintance with the manners of the Indians, the attention I pay them, has won for me their affection. This is so strong that there are moments when, perhaps, my General is astonished at it. He is a native of Canada, and his system and that of his friends has ever been to proclaim that his name alone would suffice to attract the confidence of the Nations. I should fancy that I am now as sure of mine. The officers of the Colony esteem, consider and believe me to be just and severe, and many fear me; but these are neither a Villiers, nor a Contrecoeur, nor a Ligneris, nor many others. In regard to our troops, I have established the greatest political harmony. There will never be anything else between our officers and theirs. Nothing remains to be wished for on this head, as far as we are concerned, for we meet all the expenses and are prodigal in officiousness to serve. Our officers are not all qualified to accompany the Indians, and the Governor-General does not care about my sending any of them out often; he would fain retain this, at least as an exclusive merit for the Colony; nevertheless I send some out occasionally and I select them judiciously. M. de La Rochebeaucour is gaining a great reputation in this line, and is about to enter on his 5th detachment. Although but few of our officers are qualified to accompany the Indians in war, all are attentive in treating them in camp with much kindness and affability. As for our soldiers, they are like brothers with the Canadians and Indians, who esteem them much more than the soldiers of the Colony, called detached troops of the Marine. In regard to the latter, who are good but unsteady, our soldiers do not entertain sufficient respect and esteem for their officers; therefore, and I have always omitted to render you an account of it, I very soon held a court-martial and ordered a Corporal of La Sarre to be hung on the 14th of last month, who was wanting in respect to a Colonial officer. This is the exact truth. I neglect nothing to please my General and to deserve his confidence. The letter you wrote him wherein you mention whatever I had written to his brother's advantage, has had a marvelous effect, and if M. de Moras, his Minister, from whom I have not as yet received a letter, and who, in his despatches to him, has not yet mentioned my name, ever speak to him of it, so as to inspire him with confidence, the King's service will be benefited thereby.

His brother, 'tis said, is to have the government of Montreal. The Colony has received a great many favors, proportionably more than we, seeing that they number only 30 Captains. Five Crosses of St. Louis; two pensions; they never have had any; a sum of two thousand écus in gratuities for the subalterns. They have, 'tis true, more service than we. People are persuaded that the reports I have rendered of their services have had a considerable share in this. As for the rest, nothing is better than to have given Montreal to M. Rigaud; that government is worth 11 @ 12,000 livres. It must be reserved, for the sake of emulation for the officers of the Colony, but at least of superior talents; 'tis not necessary that the Governor of Montreal should go higher, and I believe this to be the case in point. For the rest, should the Governor-General happen to die, as the government of the Colony belongs to the senior Governor, by devolution, and so on, even down to a simple Captain, certainly I cannot be subject to their orders. The case will not occur; but at all events 'twill be one for despatching a sealed packet to be then opened to confer the command on me, and in my absence on Chevalier de Levis. I write to this effect to M. de Moras, in a letter which will not pass through his office, but indeed through the hands of M. de Herault; for the Colonial office has too many relations of interest and correspondence with the Colonies.

Chevalier de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque are good seconds. The former, indefatigable, courageous, possessing an excellent military routine; the latter, a man of talent, of detail, gains immensely this winter and this campaign, in public esteem. I greatly desire their promotion, but to speak to you of it seems to be mentioning my own, on which I have only to say two words to you, and to meet two objections. The King has treated me so well that I have nothing to ask; should he make me Lieutenant-General only in the ordinary course, I have nothing to say; should he do so, I shall never make a precedent of it; I am about entering on my 36th year of service; I date from 1721. I am the only Major-General<sup>1</sup> commanding in chief a corps of troops and small armies 1,500 leagues off, having made two successful campaigns and sieges. But if I be made Lieutenant-General, can I be under the orders of a Captain of a ship; he is Governor-General, and I was well whilst Major-General. Can I be promoted without favors being conferred on the Marquis de Vaudreuil; I know not. At all events make him Commodore; he ranks the Captains of ships; this grade was conferred on him ad honores, without his ever having served at sea; or, what he will like better and does not cost any money, give or promise him the honors of the Grand Cross. Had I not been advanced in years, I should feel less desire for the grade; but a man of rank who serves his master to the best of his ability, and who on his return from America will go to Africa, if desired, must have some hope of reaching the highest step in his old age. However, whether I be made Lieutenant-General or not, [I shall feel] the same zeal for the service, the same attachment for my Minister, and let not the consideration of what concerns me ever stop the promotion of the superior officers under my orders.

The Major-General<sup>2</sup> is a very worthy man, but he will never be a Major-General. Fortunately I have here some very good adjutants. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Pauze and de Malartic are of the 1st order, and M. d'Hert is very good; yet I shall ask you, at the close of the campaign, to pension him; he has performed that duty during three years in America.

M. Doreil, on the contrary, is a good Commissary, a great worker. 'Tis a pity he has not more to do, for the Commissaries of the Marine do, as it were, the whole. All the favors you will consider it proper to confer on him will be well conferred; I shall be very glad of them. There is one, he has greatly at heart, and which many who love you will solicit at your hands; 'tis the Cross of St. Louis; you will find me as forward as they can be in asking it of you when we arrive in France, but it is of importance that you should not grant it to him as long as he will continue in America. The Cross of St. Louis is held in greater veneration here than the Red ribbon is in France, and the latter is more esteemed than the Blue ribbon. Should the Colonial officers and the Marquis de Vaudreuil see it conferred on him, they would be confounded, and I believe you will be obliged to me for advising you of the fact beforehand.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

If you have any particular order to give me, you can write to me, my Lord, earlier by way of Louisbourg. Despatches are received there at all seasons, and letters are sent us by land which we receive by the end of February or March.

Document annexed to M. de Montcalm's despatch.

Quebec, 18th September, 1757.

Want of provisions. The people reduced to a quarter of a pound of bread. It will be probably necessary to reduce still further the soldier's ration. Little powder, no shoes; those that were coming have been taken. We have apprehensions for Louisbourg; it would require a principal man of more strength than those who are there. Is M. Franquet as able as is reported? Saint Julien doubts it. He has good sense and experience. The seamen of the fleet may be interrogated. Provisions, powder, ball and shoes early. Some ought to be sent in the very commencement of March.

An Account of the Campaign of 1757 in North America.

[Annexed to the letter of M. d'Abadie de St. Germain.]

The Marquis de Vaudreuil having formed a plan of offensive operations in the direction of Lake Saint Sacrament, for the security of Forts Carillon and Saint Frederic, sent, in the month of March, a body of fifteen hundred Frenchmen, Canadians or Indians, under the orders of M. de Rigaud, the Governor of Three Rivers, to burn the sloops, bateaux and storehouses, placed under the cannon of Fort Saint George, called by the English, William Henry, situate at the head of Lake St. Sacrament, six leagues from Fort Lediús, called Fort Edward.

That expedition having had all possible success, M. de Vaudreuil determined on opening the campaign with the siege of Fort George, and consequently gave orders early for the necessary preparations.

The delay of water conveyance and want of provisions rendered this operation very doubtful; as the first ships that arrived at Quebec in the end of June and in the course of July did not bring sufficient to allow the siege of Fort George to be undertaken, M. de Vaudreuil commissioned Sieur de Martel, the Inspector of the King's stores, to make a strict search in the farmers' houses for all the provisions they might possess.

Every farmer, full of zeal for his country, voluntarily reduced himself to a very small portion, barely adequate for his support until the harvest, and whatever was over, supplied the wants of the siege.

M. de Vaudreuil, after being sure in the matter of provisions, issued his orders for the concentration of the troops in the course of July, at the Little Carrying place of Lake Saint Sacrament, which is half a league long, where a corps of Canadians had been stationed since the month of May, under the orders of Captain de Gaspé of the Colonials.

The army being assembled there at the appointed time, was employed after its arrival in transporting artillery, bateaux, warlike stores and provisions.

27th July. The Marquis de Montcalm had the chiefs of the Indian Nations assembled, and presented them, in the King's name, with a belt of 6,000 beads of Wampum to bind all the Nations to each other and to him, in order that they might not separate from one another nor quit him before the expedition was terminated.

30th July. Things being ready, Chevalier de Levis set out with two thousand eight hundred Frenchmen, Canadians or Indians, on his march by land for the Bay of Ganaouské, situate on the left shore of Lake Saint Sacrament, four leagues from Fort George. He had orders to wait there for M. de Montcalm, who proposed embarking on the 1st of August with four thousand eight hundred men, to be followed by the entire artillery.

These two divisions having formed a junction at three o'clock in the morning of the second of August, again advanced during the day. Chevalier de Levis commenced his march at ten o'clock in the morning, and proceeded within a league and a half of Fort George. M. de Montcalm set out at noon, and arrived at five o'clock in the morning of the third, with the troops and artillery at the place of landing, which had been reconnoitred by Chevalier de Levis; he was told by two prisoners on arriving, that the enemy, informed of our new movement, were to march from Fort George on a signal gun being fired, to come and meet us.

He merely had his troops landed, and prepared to march against the enemy whenever the first gun would be heard.

At seven o'clock in the morning several guns were, indeed, fired at Fort George.

M. de Montcalm immediately marched out at the head of his army, and left five hundred men, under the orders of Lieutenant-Colonel Privat of the Languedoc regiment, to guard the bateaux and artillery.

Chevalier de Levis, forming the van-guard with a party of Canadians, all the Indians, and the same detachment he had had previously under his command, approached unopposed within cannon-shot of the fort, and took up a position on the Fort Lidiús road to intercept all relief.

M. de Montcalm repaired to the van-guard at one o'clock in the afternoon, and having perceived with Chevalier de Levis that 'twas impossible to attack by main force an intrenchment which communicated with Fort George, without compromising the King's troops, concluded to have the Commandant summoned; who returned him for answer, that the troops of his garrison and those of the intrenchment which he commanded, were resolved to defend themselves to the death.

M. de Montcalm issued the necessary preparations for the siege.

The trench was opened on the night of the 4th @ 5th of August, close to the Lake, within 350 toises of the fort.

The troops of the Line and Marine were encamped at a short distance from the tail of the trench, with their left flanked by Lake Saint Sacrament and their right in the depths of the forest.

The Canadians and Indians commanded by M. de Rigaud, M. de Vaudreuil's brother, under Chevalier de Levis, formed a camp at some distance from the right of the troops of the Line and Marine, in order to be ready promptly to repair to the Fort Lidius road on receipt of the first notice of the enemy marching to the relief of Fort George. Every time Chevalier de Levis marched out on the occasion of some alarms, M. de Montcalm and the Major-General followed him very closely at the head of the brigade of La Reine, composed of three battalions, one of which was formed of the soldiers of the Marine. The La Sarre and Royal Rousillon brigades, of two battalions, remained each in camp under the orders of Colonel de Bourlamaque, to defend the trench in case of a sortie.

5th The Indians intercepted a letter of General Web, written at Fort Lidius, and dated at midnight of the 4th, informing the Commandant of the fort that he would advance to give battle to the French army immediately on the arrival of the Provincial Militia, which he had ordered to come and join him at once; in case, however, the Militia should arrive too late, the Commandant was to look to obtaining the best conditions possible; he added, that the situation of Fort Lidius did not permit him to detach any of his troops. 'Twas known, however, that that General was in command of a camp of four thousand men.

6th We have eight guns and one mortar in battery, which fired with considerable success.

7th A second battery of eight guns, one mortar and two howitzers was finished from which a fire was opened at eight o'clock in the morning.

After the first salvo, M. de Montcalm had a Red flag hoisted and sent General Web's letter to the Commandant of the place, who, after having thanked him in writing for it, waited for the first shot on our part before opening his fire.

On the night of the 7th @ 8th, our working party was occupied constructing a road with a quantity of fascines across a swamp 30 toises in width, which a hill protected from the guns of the fort.

The works on the night following were advanced to within about sixty toises of the fort.

9th At eight o'clock in the forenoon, the Commandant of the fort had the White flag hoisted and demanded to capitulate.

M. de Montcalm consented on the following terms:

1st That the troops of the garrison and intrenched camp should march out with their baggage and the honors of war.

2<sup>d</sup> That they should retire on the following morning to Fort Lidius; and in order to be protected from the Indians, they should be escorted by a detachment of our troops and the principal officers and interpreters attached to the Indians.

3<sup>d</sup> That these troops should not be at liberty to serve for eighteen months either against his Majesty or his allies.

4th That within the space of three months, all the French, Canadian and Indian prisoners taken on land in North America since the commencement of hostilities, should be brought back to the French forts.

The capitulation having been approved by the Indian chiefs assembled for that purpose, was signed at eleven o'clock, after which Chevalier de Montreuil, Major-General,<sup>1</sup> proceeded immediately to the fort and intrenchment to prepare a list of troops and to provide for the security of the provisions and warlike stores.

The troops of the garrison were relieved by the grenadiers and pickets of the trench, and conducted to the intrenchment where a guard of our troops was posted.

Chevalier de Montreuil proceeded to execute the orders of the Marquis de Montcalm and when everything was arranged, the Commandant demanded to march out with his troops at nightfall, in order to avoid the Indians.

M. de Montcalm immediately ordered an escort and directed M. de Saint Luc de la Corne, commandant of the Indians and several Colonial officers who were conversant with their language, to accompany it, that he and his troops may protect the English against all insult on the part of the Indians.

These officers having learned that the greatest portion of the Indians were lying in ambush on the Lediis road, where they must necessarily pass, advised the Commandant to postpone his departure till day-break.

The next morning the English were attacked on their retreat by the Indians who plundered the greatest part of their baggage, took about six hundred men whom they carried to the camp and killed some thirty.

The Marquis de Montcalm, Chevalier de Levis, M. de Bourlamaque, Chevalier de Montreuil and several officers rescued about three hundred of them from the hands of the Indians and had them placed in safety in the fort.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil ransomed at Montreal those English which could not have been rescued out of the hands of the Indians.

The former have been sent back from the camp of Fort George to Fort Lediis; the others from Quebec to Alifax, by sea.

The loss of the French, Canadians and Indians during the expedition amounted to thirteen men killed and forty wounded; that of the enemy to forty-one men killed and seventy-one wounded.

The French army, including the Indians, numbered 7,626 men, and the troops of the garrison and intrenchment to 2,372.

Our artillery consisted of 31 guns, 2 mortars, 3 howitzers, 10 grenade mortars, 70 thousand weight of powder, shells and shot in proportion.

In the fort and intrenchment were found 3,000 barrels of flour or pork, 23 cannon, of which 8 were brass, 1 iron howitzer, 1 mortar, 17 swivels, 35,835 pounds of powder, 2,522 shot, 545 shell, 1,400 pounds of ball, 1 grenade case, 6 cases of fire-works, and some grape-shot of divers calibre.

The capture of this fort had been preceded by the defeat on Lake Saint Sacrament on the 24th July, of 300 English, who were taken prisoners or killed by 400 Indians or Canadians, under the orders of Lieutenant de la Corbière of the Colonials, without losing a man.

16th Fort George being entirely destroyed, our artillery, that of the enemy and all the warlike stores and provisions having been transported to the Little Carrying place of Lake Saint Sacrament, the army embarked and proceeded thither on the same day.

M. de Montcalm not having enough of bateaux to accommodate the whole of his army sent the Royal Rousillon and Bearn battalions to one of the Islands of Lake Saint Sacrament to encamp until the return of the bateaux which he sent them the day after his arrival.

17th The Canadians were sent home to save the harvest.

The Land and Marine forces remained at the camp of the Little Carrying place to transport the artillery, bateaux, warlike stores and provisions, after which they have been detached to work at the fortifications of Fort Carillon and Saint John and at the Chambli roads.

The expedition against Fort George is the most brilliant ever made in Canada; its success is due to the excellent arrangements of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, to the experience of the Marquis de Montcalm and to the activity with which Chevalier de Montreuil executed his orders.

The troops of the Line and those of the Colony, as well as the Indians, furnished on the occasion the greatest proofs of their zeal and courage.

Summary of the preceding Accounts.

Capture of Fort George, called by the English William Henry, situated on Lake St. Sacrament.

The army destined to attack this fort, under the command of the Marquis de Montcalm, was composed of 7,300 men, viz: 5,500 French Regulars and Militia, and 1,800 Indians.

The enemy, including those in the fort and in the intrenched camp, who could continually recruit the garrison of the fort, numbered 2,500 @ 3,000 men.

It was invested on the 3<sup>d</sup> of August; the trench was opened on the night of the 4th @ 5th; and at 8 o'clock of the morning of the 9th the besieged hoisted the White flag.

The principal conditions of the capitulation were:

That the troops, both of the garrison and of the intrenched camp, should retire to Fort Edward with their baggage and the honors of war.

That they should not be at liberty to serve for 18 months either against the King or his allies.

That they should be escorted to Fort Edward to guarantee them against the Indians.

And that, within the space of 3 months, all the French prisoners taken on land in America, since the commencement of the war, should be sent into the Colony of Canada.

The French have had only 13 men killed and 40 wounded.

The enemy have lost 108 men. In the fort were found 23 pieces of cannon, some of which were 32-pounders, 4 mortars, 1 howitzer, 17 swivels, 34 thousand weight of powder; shot, shells, grenades, fire-works and implements of artillery.

Likewise a considerable quantity of provisions of every description; but there was some pillage on the part of the Indians, which was inevitable on this occasion.

In spite of the escort furnished to the enemy to conduct them to Fort Edward, the Indians fell on them; the Marquis de Montcalm has been obliged to expose himself in order to restrain them. He has advised Lord Lowdon and General Webb of the fact. M. de Montcalm was busy razing the fort, and had already sent away the Militia for the purpose of saving the crops.

In consequence of the destruction of Fort George the English have remaining on that frontier only Fort Edward.

Reduction of Fort William Henry.

An Account of the Capture of Fort George, or William Henry, situate on Lake Saint Sacrament, and of what occurred this year in Canada.

[From the printed Pamphlet.]

The ill success which the English have experienced in the attempts they have made, either in profound peace or since the declaration of war, to invade Canada, have not discouraged them. No one is ignorant of the immense preparations they had made to attack it this year simultaneously by sea and land. The naval force which the King has destined for the defence of that Colony has caused the miscarriage of their sea project; and the arrangements adopted in the country, have equally put it out of their power to make any attempt against the frontiers.

At the close of last year's campaign, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor and Lieutenant-General of New France, set about making all the arrangements in his power to enable him to repel them on every side.

He adopted measures to have parties of Canadians and Indians continually in the field during the winter. The incursions of these detachments on the enemy have cost the latter a great many people, and spread alarm throughout the Colonies, which have been extensively ravaged.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil likewise applied himself to managing the favorable dispositions of the Indian nations, which, in general, rose up against the injustice of the pretensions and the violent proceedings of the English. Those in ancient alliance with France have not ceased to furnish new proofs of their fidelity, and have been continually in the field against the enemy. Other numerous nations have entered into this alliance, and have taken part in the war. The Iroquois themselves, those nations whom the English represent to Europe as their subjects, animated by similar motives to the other Indians, have taken the same side, notwithstanding all sorts of efforts the English Governors have had recourse to, in order to persuade them to observe the neutrality to which they had adhered in the preceding wars between France and England.

It was in view of the advantages the Marquis de Vaudreuil saw himself in a position to derive from the dispositions of all those Nations, that he regulated these operations.

He had come to the conclusion that the enemy would direct their principal efforts towards Lake Saint Sacrament and Lake Champlain; and he has paid particular attention to strengthen the forts which defend that frontier. The enemy having been informed that some provisions were to be conveyed from Fort Saint Frederic to Fort Carillon, under the escort of a small detachment, sent a party of eighty picked men, which captured the advanced sleighs of this convoy and seven soldiers; but the Commandant of Fort Saint Frederic dispatched another detachment which intercepted that of the enemy on its way, utterly defeated it, three men only escaping, and recovered the sleighs that had been seized and three soldiers, the remainder of those that had been captured. This action took place in the month of January. Captains de Basserode and de la Grandville of the regiments of Languedoc and La Reine, performed the principal parts in it.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil learned at the same time, that the enemy had been again collecting considerable supplies of all sorts at Fort George, on Lake Saint Sacrament, and had had built under the cannon of that fort a large number of sloops, bateaux and other craft, not only for the transportation of these supplies, but also to secure the navigation of that lake to themselves. He was of opinion that all these preparations were intended for some operations which the enemy were proposing to execute in the spring. To deprive them of the means to accomplish their design, he dispatched in the month of March, a detachment of fifteen hundred Regulars, Canadians and Indians, under the orders of Sieur Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor of Three Rivers, who succeeded so well in his expedition that he burned all the water craft, all the stores which were filled with every description of munitions of war, and implements for an army of fifteen thousand men, and generally whatever the enemy had collected under the fort, which remained isolated.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil did not confine himself to the obstacles he was opposing at that point to the execution of the enemy's projects on Lake Saint Sacrament; he renewed the garrisons of the posts on that frontier, and, by means of the reinforcements and other aid the King had ordered to Canada, found himself in a condition to operate offensively against the enemy.

In the direction of the Beautiful river, he caused many small forts to be destroyed which they had erected in that quarter.

In order to profit effectually by the advantages of Sieur de Rigaud's expedition, and of the situation in which the Colony was placed on the sea-board, he formed the plan of seizing on Fort George.

The erection of that fort which is only of quite a recent date, was one of those invasions the English are in the habit of making in times of peace on their neighbors' possessions, and afforded them the greatest facilities to attack Canada by its centre.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil committed this important expedition to the Marquis de Montcalm, Major-General (Maréchal de Camp). The troops destined therefor consisted of six battalions of infantry of the Line, one detachment of Colonial troops, several detachments of Militia, and many parties of Indians. All these troops were collected together on the 20th of July at Carillon, where Colonel de Bourlamaque of the infantry had already made the preliminary arrangements for the march of the army.

The Marquis de Montcalm had repaired thither some time previously. Before the army was ready to march, he had detached Sieur Rigaud de Vaudreuil to occupy the head of the portage of Lake Saint Sacrament, with a corps of Colonial troops, Canadians and Indians.

Sieur Rigaud de Vaudreuil having established himself in that post, sent out three scouting parties.

The first, which consisted of only ten men, was attacked on Lake Saint Sacrament by several canoes containing one hundred and twenty to one hundred and thirty Englishmen. Although Lieutenant de St. Ours of the Colonials, who commanded the party, was wounded at the first volley, he defended himself with so much firmness as to oblige his enemies to retire.

The second, which was pretty considerable, was commanded by Sieur Marin, another Lieutenant; he sent ahead eight Indians who composed his van-guard, and fell in with forty English. At the first brunt they let fly at the enemy, killed their Commandant and put the rest to flight. Sieur Marin, having rejoined his van-guard, reduced his detachment to one hundred and fifty picked men; reached the vicinity of Fort Edward, a few leagues from Fort George, without being discovered, where he first defeated a patrol of ten men; next, an ordinary guard of fifty men and several laborers. He showed himself before the camp of the enemy, who marched out to the number of three thousand men firing at him, which he sustained during two hours. Indeed, 'twas with difficulty that he obliged the Indians who accompanied him to retire. In this action, he killed more than one hundred and fifty men, forty of whom the Indians scalped. He did not lose a man, and only two Indians were wounded.

The third detachment, commanded by Sieur Corbière, another Colonial officer, lay in ambush during one day. At nightfall, he descried on the lake twenty barges and two skiffs containing more than three hundred and fifty English under the command of Colonel Parker, five Captains and six other officers. The Indians who accompanied M. Corbière raised their whoop and fired at the same time. The enemy offered a feeble resistance. Two barges only escaped; the others were taken or sunk. Sieur Corbière returned with one hundred and sixty-one prisoners; more than one hundred and fifty Englishmen were either killed or wounded; whilst of the French detachment only one Indian was slightly wounded.

The Marquis de Montcalm was in the meantime busy arranging his march. He divided the Militia into several battalions, the command of which he gave to some officers of the Colonials; and of the detached companies of the latter troops he formed a battalion to roll with those of the Regulars. He also gave a corps of three hundred Canadian volunteers to Captain de Villiers of the Colonials, known by various expeditions he has led in the course of this war, so that the army consisted of three brigades of Regulars, viz: the brigade of La Reine, composed of the battalions of La Reine and Languedoc, and of that of the Colonials; the brigade of La Sarre, formed of the battalions of La Sarre and Guyenne; that of Royal Rousillon, composed of the battalions of Royal Rousillon and Bearn; of six brigades of Militia; of three hundred of Villiers' volunteers, and of one detachment of Artillery and Engineers, consisting of seven officers and about one hundred and twenty gunners, bombardiers and laborers. All these, notwithstanding, formed altogether but five thousand five hundred fighting men, exclusive of the Indians who numbered about eighteen hundred, because the Marquis de Montcalm was obliged to take some detachments from the troops both to garrison Fort Carillon and for some other posts.

It was necessary to convey by land, and on men's shoulders, from Carillon to Lake Saint Sacrament, not only the artillery, warlike stores and provisions of all sorts, but even more than four hundred bateaux and canoes; and that operation was attended by so much zeal that it was accomplished on the night of the 31st July and 1st of August.

On the 30th of July, the Marquis de Montcalm dispatched Chevalier de Levis, Brigadier, at the head of a corps of two thousand five hundred men, composed of six companies of grenadiers, eight pickets of Villiers' volunteers, about one thousand Canadians and five hundred Indians, to march across the woods, secure the passage of the army by water, reconnoitre and cover its debarcation. Which officer, notwithstanding the difficulties and fatigues of that march, took up his post on the evening of the following day at the Bay of Ganaouské, four leagues from Fort George.

On the first of August the army embarked and, at three o'clock on the morning of the 2nd arrived in the same bay. Chevalier de Levis marched from there with his detachment at ten o'clock, repaired to a cove about a league from the English fort, and went to reconnoitre the fort, the position of the enemy and the landing proper for the artillery. The army arrived about eleven o'clock at night in the same cove, and everybody bivouacked.

Some prisoners, taken by Canadians and Indians in the course of the night, reported that the number of the enemy may amount to three thousand men, five hundred of whom were actually in the fort and the remainder in an intrenched camp located on a hill within two hundred toises of the fort and convenient for the continual relief of the garrison. They added, that all the troops were to take to their arms on the firing of a signal gun.

On this report, which corresponded with the observation Chevalier de Levis had taken of the enemy's position, the Marquis de Montcalm issued, at once, the order of march for the army, which was adapted to receive the enemy in case they came to meet him, and should they not come out, to invest the place and even to attack the intrenched camp, were it considered capable of admitting of an attack by assault.

3<sup>d</sup> The army marched at day-break, Chevalier de Levis forming the van-guard with his corps, a part of the Militia and all the Indians. The battalions and the remainder of the Militia marched next in column, Sieur Rigaud de Vaudreuil on the right, Sieur de Bourlamaque on the left, and the Marquis de Montcalm in the centre. Lieutenant-Colonel de Privat had been left with five hundred Regulars and a brigade of Militia to guard the bateaux and artillery.

At noon the place was completely invested. The Marquis de Montcalm, who joined the van-guard, having perceived the impossibility of attacking the enemy's intrenchment without compromising his forces too much, sent orders to Sieur de Bourlamaque to lay out the camp of the army with the left on the lake, the right on some almost inaccessible ravines, and to convey thither, at once, the brigades of La Sarre and Royal Rousillon. For himself, he bivouacked throughout the night with the brigade of La Reine and one of Militia, convenient to the camp occupied by Chevalier de Levis with the van-guard on the road between Fort George and Fort Edward.

4th As the van-guard was posted at too great a distance from the siege, bateaux and provisions, it drew nearer this morning. The Marquis de Montcalm brought back the two brigades he had with him to take their place in the camp. The army destined to form the siege was then posted and consisted of seven battalions of Regulars, and of two brigades of Militia. Chevalier de Levis and Sieur Rigaud de Vaudreuil, with the rest of the Militia, Villiers' volunteers and all the Indians, were ordered to cover the right of the camp, to observe the enemy's movements in the direction of the Fort Edward road, and by continual movements to impress them with the belief that that communication was still occupied.

In the afternoon of the same day, the 4th, the dépôt of the trench was laid out; the road from this dépôt to the camp was made; also, the fascines, gabions and saucissons necessary for this first night's work; and a cove where the dépôt terminated was put in order so as to be able to land the artillery there in course of the night according as it would be needed.

In the night of the 4th @ 5th the trench was opened within 350 toises of the front of attack, embracing the northwest front; this trench was a sort of first parallel; two batteries were also commenced with their communication to the parallel.

During the day of the 5th the day-squad perfected the night work, but the left of the camp of the army, which was found to be too much exposed to the fire of the fort, had to be withdrawn a little farther back.

On the same day the Indians intercepted a letter from General Webb, written at Fort Edward and dated the 4th, at midnight. He advised the Commandant of Fort George, that he would advance to give battle to the French army immediately after the arrival of the Militia from the Provinces, to whom he had sent orders to come immediately and join him; if, however, these Militia should arrive too late, the Commandant should so manage as to obtain the best conditions he could. This letter determined the Marquis de Montcalm to accelerate further the construction of the batteries; and the working party was increased.

On the night of the 5th @ 6th, the left battery was completed and in condition to open its fire at day-break. It consisted of eight guns and one mortar and battered the front of attack and the harbor; the communication between the right battery and the parallel was also completed, and that battery considerably advanced.

On the night of the 6th @ 7th, a boyau was run 150 toises forward towards the capital of the Western bastion and the right battery was completed. It consisted of eight guns, one mortar and two howitzers; its fire formed an acute angle with the front of attack and ricocheted the intrenched camp. It was unmasked at seven o'clock in the morning, and after a double salute from both batteries, the Marquis de Montcalm thought proper to transmit by Sieur de Bougainville, one of his Aids-de-Camp, General Webb's letter to the Commandant of the fort.

On the night of the 7th @ 8th, the working party, advancing towards the place by continuing the boyau commenced the evening before, which was run to within 100 toises of the fort, also opened at the end of this boyau, a crochet in order to set another battery on, and to lodge some muskets in it. About midnight, three hundred men made a sortie from the intrenched camp. Sieur de Villiers fell on them with a small number of Canadians and Indians, killed sixty, took two prisoners and forced the remainder to return to the camp.

The night's work had led to a marsh of about 50 toises in width, which was protected by a hill on its margin, from the batteries of the fort, except for a distance of 10 toises where it was exposed to the fire of those batteries. Although broad daylight, the Marquis de Montcalm had that passage constructed like one over a ditch filled with water. The sappers applied themselves to it with so much vivacity that, notwithstanding the fire of the enemy's cannon and musketry, it was completed that very morning, and before night a road was constructed across the swamp capable of bearing artillery. The musketry of the Canadians and Indians who aimed at the embrasures of the fort, silenced considerably that day the enemy's fire.

At four o'clock in the evening the Indian scouts reported a strong body of men coming to the relief of the place by the Fort Edward road; Chevalier de Levis proceeded thither forthwith, with the greatest part of the Canadians and all the Indians. The Marquis de Montcalm did not delay joining with the brigade of La Reine and one brigade of Militia. He was advancing in order of battle, ready to receive the enemy, the battalions in column on the high road flanked by the Canadians and Indians in the woods, when he learned that it was a false alarm. He dismissed the troops to their camp. This movement did not interrupt the operations of the siege; and the promptness with which it was executed, produced a good effect on the minds of the Indians.

In the night of the 8th and 9th, the men issued from the swamp by a boyau communicating with the second parallel which was opened towards the crest of the hill, and pushed considerably forward in the night. This parallel was to form the starting point whence the breach batteries were to be set up, and, by prolonging it, the fort was to be enveloped and its communication with the intrenchment cut off which up to that time had been open. The besieged did not give time to carry this plan out. They hoisted the White flag at eight o'clock in the morning.

The Marquis de Montcalm told Colonel Yong, who was sent by the Commandant to negotiate the capitulation, that he could not sign any, without having first communicated its articles to the Indians. Two motives led him to be thus cautious; he considered he owed it to the confidence and submission with which they had applied themselves, since the commencement of the expedition, to the execution of the orders issued, and of all the proposals made, to them; and he wished to place them thereby under an obligation not to do anything contrary to the capitulation which would be agreed to. He thereupon immediately called together a General Council of all the Indians; explained to the chiefs the terms on which the English offered to surrender, and those he had resolved to grant them. The chiefs submitted to whatever he would do; promised to conform thereto and to prevent their young men contravening it either directly or indirectly.

The Marquis de Montcalm, immediately after the council, sent Sieur de Bougainville to prepare the capitulation with Colonel Monro, the Commandant of the fort and of the intrenched camp. The principal articles were:

That the troops, both of the garrison and of the intrenchment, should march out with their baggage and the honors of war and retire to Fort Edward.

That in order to be protected from the Indians, they should be escorted by a detachment of French troops, and by the principal officers and interpreters attached to the Indians.

That they should not be at liberty for 18 months to serve either against the King or his allies.

And that all Frenchmen, Canadians and Indians, taken prisoners by the English on land in North America, since the commencement of the war, should within three months be conducted to the French forts on the frontier.

This capitulation was signed at noon, and the garrison immediately marched out of the fort to join the troops of the intrenchment; and Sieur de Bourlamaque, with the troops from the trenches, took possession of the fort. The Marquis de Montcalm sent a guard at the same time to the intrenched camp, at the request of Colonel Monro; and ordered the officers and interpreters attached to the Indians, to remain there until the departure of the English, who numbered 2,264 effective men. In spite of all these precautions, and notwithstanding the assurances given by the Indian chiefs when the capitulation was discussed, the Indians created some disorder in the English camp. The Marquis de Montcalm ran thither with a detachment of his troops. The Indians had already made a great number of prisoners, some of whom they had even carried away. He caused those that remained to be given up, and the Marquis de Vaudreuil had the others sent back.

The Marquis de Montcalm ordered the fort to be razed, and everything connected with it to be destroyed, agreeably to the instructions the Marquis de Vaudreuil had given him. In the fort and intrenched camp were found twenty-three cannon, several of which were thirty-two pounders, four mortars, one howitzer, seventeen swivels, about thirty-six thousand weight of powder, a great quantity of shot, shell, grenades, balls, with all sorts of ammunition and artillery implements. A pretty considerable stock of provisions was also found there, notwithstanding the pillage committed by the Indians.

The French had only thirteen men killed and forty wounded during this siege. Lieutenant le Febvre of the Royal Rousillon grenadiers is of the latter number, from the bursting of a shell; his wound is in the hand. No other officers have been either killed or wounded. The enemy have lost one hundred and eight men on the occasion, and have had two hundred and fifty wounded.

During the entire siege the army has been, almost night and day, on service either in the trenches, or in the camp, or in the woods constructing the necessary fascines, gabions, and saucissons. With the pick, the axe and the saw, six hundred toises of trench were made sufficiently wide to admit of two guns being carried abreast; the fallen trees with which all the ground was encumbered prevented them being carried around. The success of this expedition is due to the wisdom of the Marquis de Montcalm's arrangements, and to the activity with which he followed up the execution of them. He has been perfectly seconded in all his operations by Chevalier de Levis, Sieur Rigaud de Vaudreuil and Sieur de Bourlamaque. The particular details of the artillery and engineering have been very well performed by Chevalier le Mercier, who commanded the artillery and Sieurs Desardouin and Lotbinière, Engineers. The officers and soldiers of the Regulars and Colonials, as well as the Militia and the officers who commanded them, have furnished the greatest proofs of valor and good will, and never did the Indians manifest so much firmness and constancy; they had applied to mount the breach with the grenadiers and were waiting with impatience for the moment to do so.

This new triumph which has diffused a general joy throughout the Colony of Canada, has animated, more and more, the zeal wherewith the farmers are endeavoring to respond to the measures the King has the goodness to occupy himself with for the defence of that Colony, and to second the care the Marquis de Vaudreuil unceasingly bestows on everything that may concern it.

M. Doreil to M. de Paulmy.

Quebec, 25th of October, 1757.

My Lord,

As I am, this year, within reach of the Intendant when he is making out his requisition on his Minister for the wants of the Colony, of every description, he has consulted me in regard to the necessaries for the French troops. I have given him my opinions and Memoirs, whereof

I have informed the Marquis de Montcalm who, on his side, has been pleased to occupy himself seriously with that matter. We are assured that nothing has been omitted; therefore, my Lord, I shall not enter into any detail here on this subject, persuaded that M. Bigot writes conformably to all that has been agreed to. It appears to me sufficient, my Lord, to supplicate you on my part, to induce M. de Moras to order all the demands of that Intendant to be supplied.

But I must not dispense treating of one very interesting article relating to the cessation of the payment of the French troops in specie; have the goodness, my Lord, to cause the Memoir I had the honor to address you in the fall of 1755, to be laid before you again, also my letter of the 30th of October, 1756, to Count d'Argenson. You will see the difference it makes for the troops to be paid in French coin or in paper of the country, and the means I had proposed last year to M. de Machault as well as to Count d'Argenson to continue the payments in specie, without however having the trouble of sending any from France; a very advantageous means, besides, for the King's interest, since they would save not only the expense and risks attending the transport of silver, but even advancing the necessary funds one year. The Marquis de Montcalm having made the same representations, it could not be supposed that I was alone in my opinion. The critical moment is arrived; the funds are exhausted; the battalions of La Reine, La Sarre, R. Rousillon, Languedoc, Guyenne and Bearn no longer receive their pay in French coin since the first of September, and the two battalions of Berry, respecting which I have had the honor to write you, my Lord, a letter in detail on the 15th of August last, which I beg you to cause to be laid before you again, have not been able to get their pay due since the 11th of April, the day they embarked, except in paper of the Colony.

We cannot doubt that the Court has paid attention to all our representations, and, being perfectly aware of the time the funds would be exhausted, if it has not judged proper to transmit some new ones, that it has at least issued provisional orders equivalent thereto. But we must believe and are persuaded in fact, that the letters which determined an object so important, have been lost on the passage, like the list of the promotion of the Colonial Staff and the Ribbons and Crosses of St. Louis granted to the two corps.

By paying in specie, the King intended to procure for the expatriated French troops an advantage, and it was real. With coin the officer procured all the necessities of life cheaper, either by purchasing them in the Colony, or by causing them to come from France, by means of some merchants' bills of exchange which he could procure for specie without any discount, and could not obtain with the country bills of credit, except by submitting to delays and discounts which are scarcely compatible with the small fortune of the soldier. To afford you, my Lord, a clear idea of the difference, suffice it to inform you that the bills of exchange drawn this year by the Treasurer of the Colony, for value of the bills of credit and notes which constitute the currency of the country, have been, as has been proved for some years, viz. payable in three terms, one-fourth in 1758, one-half in 1759, and the remaining fourth in 1760; which, in negotiating these bills necessitates a discount of 18 per cent on one-fourth, of at least 12 per cent on one-half, without speaking of the first term for one-fourth which falls due only next June. By what fatality does it require that the pay of the officers should diminish in consequence of the prolongation of the sojourn of the troops in Canada? And that, by a concatenation of circumstances which succeed each other, which concur therein, and one after another render themselves so much the more sensible. Things have reached the point that such pay can no longer be regarded as advantageous; on the contrary, it is at present nowise proportionate to the excessive dearness of every commodity, which is daily increasing and will advance higher, whereby the officers are, after having exhausted the King's allowance, reduced more and more to means so much the more difficult and burdensome, inasmuch as their resources are in another hemisphere. In regard to the soldier, I propose no additional pay; his allowance in Canada is only too good whilst that of the officer is insufficiently so.

These considerations, the zeal of the troops, their usefulness in a country they defend so well, the multiplied successes which have crowned their valor and labors, are titles to which we hope the King will not refuse an indemnity for the disadvantageous differences the officers have already sustained, at divers periods, in their pay, and in the last place, on account of the change in the nature of the payments and of the dearness of articles indispensable to life, which the scarcity afflicting the Colony, joined to the war, carries to an excessive rate. Whether his Majesty, when granting that indemnity, will determine to make it by an augmentation of salary, or, what would, perhaps, be still better, in the form of an annual gratuity, I am of opinion, my Lord, that one-tenth increase of the actual pay of each officer, might be the rule to follow in this regard. This tenth, which is the very least that can be granted, would give about 300<sup>l</sup> to each Captain, and so in proportion to all the officers of the superior or inferior grades, as well of the troops as those which compose the General Staff. Should this augmentation not render the officers' lot as advantageous as you appeared to me, my Lord, to desire, when I took leave of you, it will place them at least in a condition to support with less regret and trouble the excessive expenses, extraordinary fatigues and other disagreeablenesses they necessarily experience in a country so rude and so bare of resources as Canada.

I have had the honor to inform you, my Lord, that all the scourges are at one and the same time afflicting this poor country, which is on the eve of being of itself destroyed, if measures as prompt as they are just, be not adopted for its relief. Upon the troubles of war has supervened an epidemic disease which has been introduced by the ships that brought the soldiers. It has already committed great ravages, and apprehensions are entertained for the consequences. To these two misfortunes is superadded the most frightful famine, the horrors of which we are suffering for several months past, capped as it has been by an ungrateful harvest. This misfortune might and ought to have been anticipated. The harvest of 1750 had been bad; the number of mouths was considerably increased; 'twas notorious that additional reinforcements in men were demanded for 1750, and that the number of Indians which were to come down from the Upper countries would be considerable; nor were people ignorant of the English prisoners and Acadian refugees. Under these circumstances a bargain is made with a contractor who was to enter on duty on the 1st of January, 1750; that contract as well as the conditions and prices, of which we are still ignorant, was kept secret until the vessel had sailed. 'Tis reported that this contractor, who the year preceding was the butcher employed to furnish meat to the troops, had sent to France for immense quantities of flour and . . . , seventeen ship loads of which were to come to him alone; not a bit of it, only three of them have made their appearance, and they are not loaded exclusively for him. The extreme want of provisions that prevails, and the delay in the arrival of the first ships, prevent the Marquis de Montcalm opening the campaign, the first operations of which he cannot commence before the middle of July, and he is obliged to terminate it with the capture of Fort William Henry. At the very beginning of the winter, each inhabitant of Quebec was restricted to a certain quantity of [bread]; this was further diminished in the month of April and finally in July, some persons were reduced to four ounces. People were consoled by the hope of the arrival of the contractor's flour and an abundant harvest. The one and the other have failed, and the troops, like the inhabitants, are exposed to perish of hunger before the winter is over. When September came, there was no means to dissimulate. This melancholy condition had then to be looked straight in the face. 'Tis only at this moment that the Marquis de Montcalm has been called; it became necessary to reduce the soldier and his authority was required. This General, who is directed by no motive but zeal for the King's service and the preservation of the Colony, has been obliged to consent to this reduction and to other arrangements without example and unknown elsewhere. As I am aware that he renders you an account of them, my Lord, I cease here the recital of facts, but I cannot refuse to my zeal the taking respectful leave to invite you to converse with M. de Moras, verbally, on our melancholy situation. Ignorance exists as to its true cause which it is not proper for either the Marquis de Montcalm or me to attempt to instruct him on, the rather as our representations would not probably reach him. The remedies must be powerful and prompt, for if unfortunately a British squadron blockade the entrance of Virginia<sup>1</sup> early in the spring, all would perish here of hunger and misery, and it would be beyond our power to oppose the most trifling surprise on the part of the enemy. If all the King's subjects served him with the same zeal and disinterestedness as we, his possessions, his service and the glory of his armies would not be thus compromised. These are sad truths, my Lord, which I consider it my duty to deposit in your breast. Were it suspected here that I give you the least hint of them, I should be regarded with a very sinister eye, and the mission I have been given in charge would suffer thereby. I am easy on that head. I aspire only to the happy moment when, with the King's permission, I shall be at liberty to return to France, and be no longer an idle spectator of things so monstrous as those which are passing before our eyes.

I have received, my Lord, the two packages of cartouches which I had demanded last year, and which you had the goodness to have sent to me; I thank you for them. I have already commenced distributing them among the Majors. None of them has had the precaution, on coming to Canada, to bring printed muster-rolls (controles de revue), and up to the present time they have been obliged to furnish them to me in writing. Besides the trouble of making them up, they use paper of various sizes and such as they can procure here, and when they send them to me, the most of them are informal and such as I am obliged to have made over again. Although I am aware that 'tis the duty of the corps to supply themselves with these sorts of blanks, I shall be personally very much obliged to you, my Lord, to have the goodness to have sent me next spring, by three different ships, three packages of them of 200 sheets each. This will be sufficient for one year and something more.

I am, with profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

P. S. I had caused to be addressed at Brest some printed blank muster-rolls, but they are nearly exhausted. Dare I beg of you, my Lord, to give orders that 300 sheets of them per battalion may be sent to me, and 60 for two battalions, in two packages, by two different ships. We have no printing press here, and I have too much writing to be able to have these abstracts made by hand. I sent some to Louisbourg in 1755.

DOREIL.

ARTICLE FIRST—Concerning Quebec.

The town is at present sufficiently provided with cannon, but it is highly necessary that it should have a proportionate quantity of shot. Seventeen iron mortars arrived this year, 4 of which were of 12-inch, 5 of 8, and 8 of 6-inch, and only a few shell came, the most of which have not the necessary vent. A requisition was made last year for four Cominge brass mortars and for four mortars of 12-inch 4li. diameter, with conic chamber capable of containing 11 @ 12<sup>lbs</sup> of powder; they have not been sent; 'tis certain, however, that had we mortars of this description, no ships could anchor in the basin of Quebec.

The mortars which we received were intended for sieges and for the forts; this was the reason that they were required to be brass, as they were easier of transportation; they are of iron, and 5 and 8 inches; some of them had their trunnions broken in France, the thickness of the metal is lessened nearly an inch at this point. They had to be fastened to their carriages with iron bands, which renders the transport of them difficult; it is, moreover, impossible to elevate them, as they are immovable.

Although there are none in Canada who can manufacture shell and shot, some might, however, have been made at the forges of St. Maurice; but that establishment can scarcely supply the metal necessary for the castings needed for the service in the Colony. Therefore 'tis useless to think of it; should the King order it, however, 'twould be necessary to send from France some moulders in clay and sand for the shells.

3rd.

Men have been employed in putting in order the batteries as well on the river side as on that of the country; and the guns are mounted on their carriages and placed in battery. The greatest part of the plank in store has been used for the construction of the platforms and for the city gates and posterns. The General had given that business in charge to M. de Léry in the absence of the artillery officers.

A small wharf has been built in the direction Pointe à Quarcy<sup>1</sup> for the reception of three pieces of cannon which bear on the basin, until the projected battery at that point be erected. This is so necessary that there is reason to believe that the Engineer will set about it as soon as circumstances will permit.

5th.

It is absolutely necessary to send to Quebec by the first ships the munitions demanded in the list, marked N<sup>o</sup>

Artillery at Montreal.

This town is wholly bare of any, yet 'tis capable of serving as a general dépôt. It would, therefore, be desirable that a good arsenal, a handsome armory, a workshop with large powder magazine be located there. All the platforms are to be remade, and as 'tis fortified only against a coup de main, a great many small guns are required there.

At the Beautiful river.

The artillery of Fort Duquesne is always the same. That post is too small to be able to sustain a siege, but 'twill oblige the enemy to make some preparations and to open trenches. Should the King desire to secure his possession on the Oyo, 'twill be necessary to have a respectable fort there to deprive the English of all desire to go thither.

Of Niagara.

This fort is sodded (en gazon); 'tis reported good; it has thirty pieces of cannon, 12 of which are 12<sup>o</sup>. Its artillery is mounted on campaign guns; in other respects 'tis pretty well provided.

Of Fort Frontenac.

It is in itself very bad and 'twill never be possible to make anything good of it without vast expense. 'Tis the arsenal for the vessels on Lake Ontario, on which account it is well provided, particularly as 'tis not probable that the English will be able to get up an attack on that side, so long as they will not be in possession of Choueguain. Frontenac is the entrepôt of the Upper countries around the lakes.

Of Carillon.

By the return of the artillery at this post, it may be seen that 'tis well provided. As the fort is not yet finished the batteries are, for the most part, merely temporary. 'Twill always sufficiently annoy the enemy, who cannot possibly besiege it without the Colony concentrating succors there.

St. Frederic

Has as much artillery as it needs, but the place is by nature such as not to confer honor on the Commandant and officer of artillery who will be stationed there, should it ever be attacked.

Of St. John.

The equipage of the field train is being repaired here so as to be fit for use, should the Marquis de Vaudreuil judge such to be necessary either for offensive or defensive operations. But 'twill be observed that 'tis impossible to make any attack until shells and a part of the other munitions of war required, be received from France.

Ministerial Minute on a Scheme to attack Quebec.

CANADA.

His Majesty has been informed last winter of the advice received by Count D'Affry,<sup>1</sup> his Ambassador in Holland, on occasion of a plan pretended to have been furnished the English to surprise Quebec.

A Canadian named Du Souchet, and known in Holland by the name of La Salle, was suspected of having furnished that plan.

Which consisted of sending up the river, as far as Quebec, a great number of Indian canoes having on board some Regulars dressed like Indians, who were to seize in one night some of the principal posts of the place. The expedition was likewise to be sustained by 6 men of war.

Though this plan appears undeserving of any attention, at least as submitted, his Majesty considered it his duty to order advice thereof to be sent to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, with directions to find out if the individual reported to be the author of it had correspondents in the Colony, as 'tis pretended he boasted of having such, to the Minister of England in Holland.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil's answer, annexed, demonstrates more and more that the project, supposing it ever to have been presented, would have been really impracticable.

The information furnished by that Governor confirms that already received in regard to the man named La Salle.

Moreover his Majesty has, in like manner, been instructed that the information which had been given him against this individual by the man named Mesnil, sent hither with the details thereof, was soon disproved, at least in part, since La Salle, instead of crossing to England as Mesnil has assured he intended to do, took the road to Petersburg, where he is at present. He has even found means to introduce himself to the Marquis de L'hôpital and to insinuate himself into his confidence.

In regard to Mesnil, he is still in the Bastille, whither his Majesty had ordered him at the time of his committal.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.

Montreal, the 13th of August, 1757.

My Lord,

I have received the letter you have done me the honor to write me on the 11th of April, with the detail annexed by you thereunto of information you had received respecting the enemy's plans. I have carefully examined it. The plan submitted to the English Ambassador residing in Holland, for attacking Canada this year, is so ill conceived that it would be impossible to execute it, at least from the sea.

In fact, my Lord, it would be impossible for the English, in consequence of the care I take, to find a number of Indians, such as they would require, to put on board 50 @ 60 canoes with the same number of Regulars dressed like them. For such a purpose they would require Mikmaks or Abenakis, who alone are accustomed to make their appearance in the River St. Lawrence, and these two nations are positively, even in time of peace, at war with the English. Besides, our Canadians who are settled at the mouth of the river are certain, from experience, that no other nation ever appeared there except Mikmaks and Abenakis, whose attire even differs from that of our other Indian nations; they could not have failed to take umbrage at those of the enemy.

1st They would not have understood their language. 2nd. They would not have recognized any of them, from which moment the project of the English would incontestably have aborted.

For the same reason it would not have been any easier to surprise the inhabitants of Quebec. 'Tis the invariable custom with Indians, when they arrive, to present themselves to the Commandant, who is always able to speak to them of the quarter they came from, and who is acquainted with what transpires there. The English Indians could not escape this custom; they would then at once have been recognized as enemies.

The six English ships which would have followed these Indian canoes, could not have made their appearance simply at the mouth of the river without my being informed of it, and then all the Militia along the banks of the river would have taken up arms. The orders I had given would have been executed at the same time, and the enemy would have very quickly discovered that he had gone on a wrong expedition.

How would it have been possible for those Indians, or the Regulars who would accompany them, to seize, at night, by consent or force, the principal posts of the town of Quebec at the hour appointed and set fire to the powder magazine and some houses? For, supposing that those Indians should comport themselves so as to deprive us of all suspicion, they could not leave their designated quarters without the Commandant of Quebec being notified of the circumstance, and without their being even arrested by the patrols he has out by my orders.

How could a mine be made to blow up the Royal bastion without our knowledge? That's absolutely opposed to common sense.

As for the attack by land, I perceive in it sufficient similitude and conformity with the reports of prisoners.

1st 'Tis certain that Lord Lawdun's plan was to render himself master of Carillon and St. Frederic at the opening of the navigation. All his preparations were made and nothing desirable remained but the breaking up of the ice, when my brother burnt all the outer establishment around Fort George, the barks, galleys, barges, bateaux, and generally the provisions of all sorts, clothing, arms and field implements destined for an army of about 15,000 men.

2nd That General had sufficiently meditated cutting off our communication with Fort duquéne, and for that purpose had caused some 500 bateaux to be constructed at a fort opposite and about 100 leagues distant from Fort Machault, but he has not been able to keep his plan a secret; I have been informed of it by the Delawares of Theoga, whom I have attached to me, although settled among the English and who never had the least connection with the French. You will have observed, my Lord, by the letters I have the honor to write you on this subject, that I have broken up that plan by the attention I paid to having Indian parties constantly in that quarter, who have even carried consternation into the rural settlements and obliged the English to abandon them.

3<sup>d</sup> I was likewise preadvised that Lord Lawdun was to dispatch a considerable party of English and Indians to attack Fort Duquène, but that project did not succeed any better for him; he derived no other advantage from it than some scalps, but they cost him very dear, as you will have seen by the reports I have had the honor of rendering you of whatever occurred of interest in that quarter; I even hope they will not get off so cheap.

The author of that project has been very easily recognized, my Lord, by the portrait of him which you have drawn for me; he is one Dusouchet, who was a clerk of the India Company at the Quebec office. The estate of M. de la Gorgeandière has been obliged to pay a sum to that Company on account of the malversations of the said Dusouchet, who went to France in 1751; he sojourned sometime in Paris where he had himself called the Marquis de Rivet; he spent some money there which had been intrusted to him by an individual of this town, and, doubtless, having no further resource nor expectation of playing any new tricks at Paris, he withdrew to Holland where he has imposed on the English Ambassador by entertaining him with chimerical projects; but his imperfect knowledge of the Colony will soon make him be found out as an impostor, and, I think, in the end, the English will have him hanged.

As for the rest, my Lord, I have known that the said Dusouchet has no correspondents at Quebec, the Island of Orleans, Fort Saint Frederic or in any other part of the Colony.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

CANADA.

His Majesty is already informed that the Marquis de Montcalm was, pursuant to the Marquis de Vaudreuil's orders, to attack Fort Lidius or Edward, after having reduced Fort George or William Henry.

Such was the plan of the expedition laid down in the Marquis de Vaudreuil's instructions to M. de Montcalm, and the attack of Fort Lidius was the object of a special letter he wrote him on the seventh of August, in consequence of the information he had received that General Loudon had gone to Acadia.

Copies of that letter and of the instructions transmitted by M. de Vaudreuil are annexed hereunto.

M. de Montcalm's reasons for having confined himself to the capture of Fort George are, the fear of wanting provisions, the necessity of sending back the Canadians to save their crops and the difficulties of reducing Fort Lidius, which was defended by a strong garrison, and within reach of prompt succors.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil submits in his letter, which is also annexed, some observations that do not accord with those of the Marquis de Montcalm.

He appears much pained that Fort Edward had not been attacked, persuaded, as he is, that it would have been taken.

The destruction of that fort would have been, in fact, highly important. As long as it will stand, 'twill not be possible for any peace to exist on that frontier. 'Twill facilitate whatever expeditions the enemy will wish to execute there, and more than that, whatever diversions they will like to set on foot in case they will attempt the attack of Quebec.

Could it have been destroyed like Fort George, the enemy would have been obliged to make Albany the entrepôt of their expeditions, where 'twould have been easy even to force them to keep on the defensive, since nothing would have prevented our attacking that place or making other attacks in that quarter.

Extract of the letter written by the Marquis de Vaudreuil to the Marquis de Montcalm, the seventh of August, 1757.

I am confident that this courier will join you at Fort Lidius; circumstances are more favorable for your laying siege to it; you know that General Lawdon is at Alifax with all the troops, and he is so much the less to be feared, as he is blockaded by Count Dubois de la Motte's squadron, which intercepts all his succors.

Should we fail to reduce Fort Lydius this year, we may give it up, as we shall never again have such a fine opportunity. Indeed, General Lawdon and all the Regulars will occupy it next campaign, and then, far from it being in our power to assume the offensive, we shall be constrained to confine ourselves to the defensive, and consequently it will be the same expenses and the same movements in the Colony over again.

You hence perceive, Sir, that tranquillity depends directly on the reduction of Fort Lydius; nothing ought to be an impediment to you in that regard, even though the Canadians should not return soon enough to save their harvest, we shall not want provisions, and besides, 'twould be better for them to be a little short than to be obliged next year to see themselves at the same trouble to guard their frontier.

I communicate my thoughts to you, Sir, with so much the more pleasure, as I am fully persuaded that you will receive them as evidence of my attachment, &c.

N° 3. Instructions for the Marquis de Montcalm, Marshal of the Camps and Armies of the King.

Our success last campaign in the reduction of Forts Chouaguen and the continual incursions of the Indian Nations we had collected together at the Beautiful river, on several English forts and on the rural settlements, justly warranted us in supposing that General Lawdun was occupying himself particularly with the Lake St. Sacrament quarter, and that he would succeed in completing the great preparations he had commenced the last year at Fort George, to enable him to attack Forts Carillon and St. Frederic with a considerable army, before our rivers were navigable and we should be able to send from the Colony the necessary forces to defend these two forts, especially as our situation in regard to provisions was so critical that we could not victual them.

Such were the considerations which led us to dispatch a detachment of about fifteen hundred men, Canadians and Indians, under the orders of M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor of Three Rivers, in the month of March, when the enemy would be least on his guard, to destroy his preparations and reduce him to the absolute necessity of restoring them before he could be able to undertake anything against our frontier.

This expedition succeeded so far that Fort George remained totally isolated, and its sloops, galleys, barges, bateaux, storehouses and other establishments were reduced to ashes by the flames.

We have not lost sight of that event which gave us the advantage over the enemy, but we have not been able to profit by it in consequence of the scarcity of provisions, before receiving our first despatches from the Court; the different advices we receive therefrom, joined to the report of English prisoners, and to the circumstances in which we are placed, prove to us that it is vastly the interest of the Colony to act offensively against Fort George.

For which purpose we have ordered a levy of provisions in all the parishes of our government, where we have had the inquiry for them made as exact as it was easy through the good dispositions of our Canadians, in consequence of the confidence with which we have assured them, and we ourselves feel, that the supplies the Court designed for this Colony, and we urgently demanded in our last despatches, will not fail to reach us.

The forces we destine for this important expedition, the command whereof we confide to the Marquis de Montcalm, will consist of about eight thousand four hundred men; viz' two thousand five hundred Regulars; twelve hundred of the Marine detachment; three hundred Canadians and seventeen hundred Indians, exclusive of a company of bombardiers, a company of pioneers, the recruits we sent to Carillon from Quebec, and the Indian Nations we are daily expecting from the Upper countries.

This army will be completely collected at Fort Carillon between the fifteenth and eighteenth of this month; the Marquis de Montcalm will find there also a suitable train of artillery for the siege of Fort George, and all the other preparations relative to this expedition.

We doubt not but that the portage road has been constructed, and the artillery and bateaux transported thither, having given our orders accordingly to M. de Bourlamaque, and successively to Chevalier de Levis and to M. le Mercier, but in case the whole be not done, the Marquis de Montcalm will not lose an instant in completing all these works, so that nothing may delay his departure with all his forces for Fort George.

We leave him to entrust the command of Fort Carillon to such officer as he will think proper with the number of men he will consider necessary.

We observe to the Marquis de Montcalm that the Fort George expedition is the most essential object we could have in view for the benefit and security of this Colony. We have communicated to him all our reflections in the conferences we have had together on this subject; we have taken pains to hand over to him an army capable of not being intimidated by the enemy, whatever its situation may be, and with that view have selected the best men in the Colony.

We leave the order of march of this army to the Marquis de Montcalm, but we recommend him not to divide it.

We have handed him the sketch of the distribution we have made of the Marine troops and of the Canadians, as well as of the Indian Nations.

We have attached to them officers of the Marine whose experience is known to us; therefore 'tis for the good of the service that such arrangement be carried out.

We have appointed M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil to march at the head of the Colonial troops, Canadians and Indians under the Marquis de Montcalm's orders at his request; we have reason to hope that these Indians will keep the word they have given us, and that they will not separate until after the expedition.

We likewise hope that the Marquis de Montcalm will not delay making himself acquainted with the real state of the enemy at Fort George; but whatever reports prisoners or English deserters may make him, he will not postpone his march. And supposing that he perceives, beyond a doubt, on his arrival at Fort George, that the enemy's force is superior to his, he will make such manœuvres as he will judge best to endeavor to force them from their position and to fight them with advantage.

Should the Marquis de Montcalm succeed in reducing Fort George, by force of arms, or in case the enemy surrender by capitulation, he will grant terms more or less favorable, according as circumstances will require.

He will pay particular attention to the careful preservation of all sorts of provisions, artillery, arms and warlike stores, and will cause the best measures to be adopted for the safe transportation of the whole to Fort Carillon.

We will not doubt, should the Marquis de Montcalm be successful in the first instance, but Fort Lydius will be intimidated to the degree that 'twill offer only a feeble resistance; therefore, the Marquis de Montcalm will leave some troops at Fort George, and consider nothing more pressing than to present himself with his army before Fort Lydius and lay siege to it, unless it be evident that the forces of the Colony would be compromised by this second expedition. He perceives as fully as we, that so long as Fort Lydius stands, the English will always possess means to threaten our frontier, whilst, should that fort be razed, they would be forced to abandon that project, and by a necessary consequence, all their ambitious projects against this Colony would vanish.

Fort Lydius being reduced, the Marquis de Montcalm will execute what we have prescribed to him in relation to Fort George, regarding the provisions, artillery, arms and warlike stores; he will have Fort Lydius and its dependencies burnt to the foundations, and will treat Fort George in the same manner, as soon as he will return thither.

In regard to the Indian Nations, he will then permit them to depart and to divide themselves into platoons, to each of which he will attach officers, cadets and soldiers belonging to the detachment of Marine troops, and some Canadians, for the purpose of laying waste the English settlements, either in the vicinity of Orange or Corlar.

But in case the Marquis de Montcalm perceive it really impossible to reduce Fort George and be under the absolute necessity, in consequence of the too great superiority of the enemy's forces, to retire under Fort Carillon, he will occupy the most favorable position there to prevent the enemy making any progress; we warn him beforehand that 'twill not be in his power to avoid sending back about the end of the month of August, the Upper country Nations and the greatest part of the Canadians, to have our crops saved.

The Marquis de Montcalm will be at liberty to assure the officers belonging to the detachment of the Marine, that we shall pay most particular attention to the reports he will be pleased to make of the manner they will distinguish themselves under his orders.

As for the rest, we shall rely entirely on the Marquis de Montcalm's knowledge, prudence, experience and zeal, in all what concerns the important mission we have confided to him, and in all the cases we cannot foresee.

We are well assured that nothing will escape his foresight, and that he will adopt the best measures to protect himself against repulse.

He will inform us of everything of interest that will occur, and on our side we shall diligently communicate to him all the news which will relate to the situation of the Colony and our expedition.

N° 4.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.

Montreal, the eighteenth of August,

One thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven.

My Lord,

I flattered myself with reason that the success of M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil's campaign on Lake St. Sacrament, would determine that of my expedition against Fort George, which was the more important to this Colony, as on it and the reduction of Fort Lydius, depended the peace of our frontier.

The success of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Marin and Corbière's detachments, organized by M. de Rigaud, supplied M. de Montcalm with a confidence equal to that I had always felt.

But, my Lord, his expedition has terminated by the reduction of Fort George, on the ninth of this month, he transmitted to me by M. de Bougainville, one of his Aids-de-Camp, the Relation of that affair, whereby you will be informed of the order of his march, his arrangements and operations up to the moment the place surrendered.

I must, however, my Lord, report to you divers facts which are omitted or badly reported in that Relation and of which I have been informed by the Marquis de Montcalm's letters.

At nightfall, on the second of August, some barges appeared; our Indians had nothing more pressing than to go in pursuit of them, and however alert the English were in throwing themselves ashore, our Indians took three prisoners who reported that twelve hundred men had just arrived at Fort George and that all the English Militia were to arrange themselves in battle array at the discharge of the signal gun, in order to come to meet us.

'Tis certain, my Lord, that, instead of scouts, could M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil have succeeded in obtaining permission to proceed forward with a strong detachment of our troops, Canadians and Indians, not a single Englishman would have entered Fort George; 'twould have been fortunate for us to defeat the twelve hundred men in question, because Fort George would then have been incapable of resistance; but 'twas not even until after many entreaties that M. de Rigaud had permission to go and join Chevalier de Levis on the Fort Lydius road.

On the third of August the Marquis de Montcalm decided on summoning Lieutenant-Colonel Monro, the Commandant at Fort George, who answered him like a soldier. (This is omitted in the Relation.)

It was not until that day that they began making fascines and saucissons; our Canadians were not those who made the fewest.

Therein they displayed their natural genius, and proved that their good will and zeal for the King's service, were equivalent to experience at this description of work.

The Canadians and Indians fired the whole day into the intrenched camp; some detachments of the enemy sallied out of it, but were obliged to return very quick with loss. Our Canadians and Indians took two hundred oxen and a hundred sheep under the cannon and musketry of the enemy whom they, thereby, obliged to burn their outworks.

M. de Rigaud was ordered to attend to the safety of the army, with our Canadian volunteers, four brigades of our troops and Canadians, and a party of our Indians.

The Canadians and Indians whom the Marquis de Montcalm had retained by him, constantly covered the workmen and continued firing. The justice is due them that if they had annoyed the besieged less, the work of the night of the fourth and fifth would not have been so considerable.

The affair of the seventh is badly reported. Three hundred men made a sortie from the intrenched camp; M. de Villers attacked them with a small number of Canadians and Indians and called for a reinforcement, holding the enemy in check and securing unto himself the liberty of entering and carrying the intrenchment.

But notwithstanding all his entreaties he could not obtain any reinforcement. There is no doubt but M. de Villiers, had he had a strong detachment of Canadian troops and Indians, would in an instant, have carried the intrenchment; but he had no other success than to kill sixty Englishmen and to take two prisoners in the stead of the two deserters already mentioned.

Our Canadians contributed at least as much as the Regulars to accelerate the works constructed over a little swamp for the passage of our artillery.

Our Indians posted themselves within sight of the embrasures of the fort, and took such good aim that the gunners abandoned the guns; were it not for this, 'twould not have been possible to work at the swamp.

The dread the English entertained of our Indians, who were excited to such a degree that they would not have yielded to the grenadiers the honor of being the first to mount the breach, did not contribute less to the reduction of the place, than the celerity of our works and the circumstances, which were most favorable for us.

At the moment Lieutenant-Colonel Monro asked to capitulate, our Indians handed to the Marquis de Montcalm a letter they had intercepted, wherein the Commandant was advised that Colonel Johnson had arrived at Fort Lydius with two hundred Indians and two thousand men, and that an additional reinforcement of Militia was expected. As it was not possible that Colonel Johnson had any Indians with him, this letter was looked on with suspicion.

The most essential articles of the capitulation are :

1° That the garrison of Fort George shall march to Fort Lydius with the honors of war; and not serve for eighteen months either against his Majesty or against his allies.

2° That all the French, Canadian, and Indian prisoners taken on land since the commencement of the war in North America, shall be surrendered at Carillon within three months.

It is very unfortunate, my Lord, that the soldiers belonging to the garrison of Fort George, had, by their own fault, put some of our Indians in the condition to insult them. Had the Indians not been furnished by the English with rum, with a view to appropriate their plunder to themselves, they would have remained quiet.

The Marquis de Montcalm took, alone, the precautions he considered proper; he consulted only his own judgment, and perhaps the occurrence would not have happened had he condescended to devolve on M. de Rigaud, the Missionaries, Officers and Interpreters the care of restraining the Indians; but he was so prejudiced, that he placed confidence in himself alone; as he wrote me as early as the sixth of that month :

“The Officers, Interpreters and Missionaries are in general Republican spirits, and I have “the misfortune that the Indians appear to have confidence only in me.”

I have ransomed, on the King's account, the English who are in the hands of our Indians, whose obedience I cannot but commend. They wished to justify themselves, and one of their reasons is, that they have not had the same liberty to pillage as the troops who entered the fort.

The Marquis de Montcalm has written to Lord Lawdun and General Webb on the subject of this little incident; it appears that he sent back to Fort Lydius the prisoners who remained in his power.

I am making arrangements, at present, to send back also those whom I have delivered from the Indians. I shall neglect nothing in order that the English may execute, on their side, the articles of capitulation.

I am fully persuaded, my Lord, of the satisfaction you will feel in informing the King of the reduction and total destruction of Fort George; mine would have been complete had such reduction been followed by that of Fort Lydius. The instructions I had given the Marquis de Montcalm, will prove to you the desire I had that such should have been effected, and I hope that you will recognize therein the zeal which animates me for his Majesty's service and the glory of his arms.

I have no reproach to make myself on this head; I even wrote to the Marquis de Montcalm, on the seventh of this month, to make him more easy and to impress upon him still more the importance of this second expedition; you will perceive, my Lord, that I took pains politically to reassure him in regard to provisions, so that he might act without the least uneasiness.

He had only about six leagues of a very fine road before reaching Fort Lydius, and I am confident that the reduction of the first fort would have inevitably drawn down that of the second.

I would have only wished that the Marquis de Montcalm had presented himself; he had everything according to his desire, and was sure at all events of his retreat.

The Marquis de Montcalm wrote me that he learned from eleven deserters that the Provincial Militia and Cavalry had left Fort Lydius; that Colonel Johnson had likewise returned from it, and is it natural to suppose, after the precipitate retreat of these Militia, at a time when they did not know even of our being on the march to attack them, that they would have offered any great resistance?

The worst we had to apprehend on going to Fort Lydius, was, to be obliged to turn back

But whatever had happened, our Indians were too much excited and too well disposed to abandon the party, and ultimately, could the enemy's camp protect itself against their attacks?

It cannot be objected that it would have cost us provisions; this objection would have been of very trifling weight, especially when we consider the pile of them we would have been able to collect at Fort Lydius.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant.

VAUDREUIL.

M. Bigot to M. de Moras.

Quebec, 3<sup>d</sup> November, 1757.

My Lord,

Read to the King,
21st January, 1758.

I have received the letter you honored me with on the 27th July. You have appeared satisfied with last winter's campaign on occasion of Fort George on Lake St. Sacrament, but not with the expenses incurred in Canada. Those incurred in building forts and works both on the Beautiful river and at other posts, cost the King many millions,* without my being able to know whether the money be honestly laid out; it is expended by orders of the Commandants, whose judgment must be relied on. As to the expenses incurred under my eyes and by my authority, I do my best to maintain order therein, and by that means produce a diminution of them; but I shall not succeed in that, since we must continue to purchase in the Colony this year and in the beginning of spring, our supplies of merchandise for the posts. The British took, in the ships La Superbe and La Renommée, one thousand tons belonging to Sieur Gradis, to our serious injury. The dearth will occasion the King additional expense, without my being able to avoid it.

Besides, the number of rations for the King's account has considerably increased, and, instead of ten thousand persons whom I had calculated were rationed throughout the whole of last year by the King, I estimate the number to have been between 14 and 15 thousand, including the posts, regard being had to the last augmentation of troops and of Indians, who coöperate with us. They are more numerous in summer, but as they are less in winter, I reduce them on the average to that number. This alone forms an item of about 5 millions.

For the rest, a part of the expenses (which have been immense this year, inasmuch as the bills of exchange have nearly doubled those of last year), has been caused by the preparations made for the siege of Fort Williams Henry and the arrival of 2 or 3 thousand Indians from the Upper countries; their sojourn and return have cost considerable sums.

I hope, however, that the expenses will not amount so high next year, as I do not anticipate such vast movements. Should circumstances draw us into them, I have the honor to assure you I would not regard the cost, but solely the glory of the King's arms, and I shall always contribute as much as will be in my power, both in advice and the execution of my charge, to render them glorious in this Colony. I study that much more than economy, although this latter object greatly interests me, and I am persuaded that you will approve my mode of thinking.

I have the honor to be with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), BIGOT.

Captain Pouchot to M. de Paulmy.

Montreal, this 3rd 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1757.

My Lord,

I arrive from Niagara where I have been relieved by the Marquis de Vaudreuil. I may say I have finished that place, according to the plan I had the honor of transmitting last fall, on the 15th 5<sup>ber</sup>. There remain to be sodded only a small portion of the interior parapet; the épaulement from the gate to the covert-way along the river, and both the traverses of the place of arms, salient from the half moon.

It will be essential, my Lord, to sod the scarps and counterscarps of the ditches, in consequence of the nature of the soil which, notwithstanding its hardness, wastes extremely the moment 'tis exposed to the air.

I would have wished much, my Lord, to be able to transmit to you a plan of the present situation of that place; I could never find a moment to draw it, in consequence either of the details attached to the command for the Indians, or the assiduity those works required, as I was alone to superintend them.

I am astonished, my Lord, at being able to bring them to their present perfection, with the few men I have had for so many different operations as were necessary to be executed. I have had them done with all the economy of a gentleman cultivating his farm, and I dare assert that I have saved more than fifty thousand écus, according to the estimate of connoisseurs.

I have made some changes in the location of the buildings on the plan I had the honor to transmit you last year. There are now two large barracks, one church, one powder magazine, one store for provisions and merchandise. Barracks will have to be built in the course of the winter to lodge one hundred men additional. I can assert, my Lord, from all I have seen, that that fort influences extremely all the bordering Nations. 'Tis not for me, my Lord, to praise my work. The Marquis de Vaudreuil and the M<sup>te</sup> de Montcalm will have the goodness to render you an account of it, which, I dare believe, will be of advantage to me. They have not allowed me to remain ignorant of the favor the King has been pleased to grant me. Might I hope from your goodness, my Lord, that you will be pleased to procure me an augmentation of it. I am fortunate enough to be in a peculiar position, which may procure for me some exception to what his majesty has proposed to do, and when I desire the commission of Lieutenant-Colonel, 'tis to procure for myself the advantage of serving his Majesty still more usefully, and my time is passing, my Lord, for I am 46 years of age. You have had the goodness to promise me in Paris that you would be favorable to me; I dare hope for your confidence.

My Lord, when I assumed the command at Niagara, the Marquis de Vaudreuil wished me to engage the Five Nations to observe neutrality. I dare flatter myself that I have, by my proposals to, and treatment of, them, contributed not a little to embroil them with the English, and to make them decide on waging war against the enemy. I do not pretend, my Lord, to detract from the merit therein of M. Chabert Joncaire, a Colonial officer, who is much beloved by the Senecas.

I have been in the same position in regard to the Loups who were become very cold since last year. I dare say that I had gained their confidence as well as that of all the Nations with which I have had to treat. The number of parties, prisoners, and scalps I have had are solid proofs thereof. They have principally infested New Jersey and Pennsylvania which have been laid waste by them.

I applied myself, my Lord, throughout the whole of my mission, to be in a position to render an account of the state of the country as regards the frontier of the English; of the disposition of the Indians, and of the advantages that can be derived from them, as well as of the arrangements for the safety of those parts.

I ardently desire, my Lord, that the knowledge I have acquired may merit your approbation and the honor of your confidence.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Captain in the Bearn.

<sup>1</sup> Captain Pouchot, whom Mensei styles the French "Maute," was born at Grenoble in 1712, and entered the service as a volunteer Engineer in 1733. In the following year he was transferred to the regiment of Béarn. He soon attracted the notice of M. de Maillebois (supra, p. 577) by his acquirements, and was set to work at the intrenchments of Borgo-forte, and at those of Ferrara on Mount Baldo. He was next employed in fortifying and laying out roads in Corsica, and served in Italy, Flanders and Germany. In 1744, he was appointed to reconnoitre the Tyrol road, of which he prepared a map; and in 1746 intrenched the camp of Tournay. He was, in return, promoted to a Captaincy and decorated with the Cross of St. Louia. M. Pouchot accompanied his regiment to Canada, and was for the most part employed on the Lake Ontario frontier. He acted as Engineer at the siege of Oswego in 1756, and planned and superintended the erection of Fort Niagara in 1757. In 1758, he distinguished himself at Ticonderoga, and though recommended for a commission of Lieutenant-Colonel, was only rewarded with a small pension, as he had no friends at Court. In 1759, he sustained a siege of 19 days at Niagara, and capitulated after a loss of 117 out of 450 men, when he was conducted prisoner of war to New-York, where he was detained until November, when he was exchanged, and joined M. de Vaudreuil at Montreal on Christmas eve of 1759. In 1760 he made another gallant defence at Fort Lewis, which was situated on an island a little below Ogdensburgh, and reduced by General Amherst after about a week's siege, when Captain Pouchot, with his little garrison, was sent by way of Oswego to New-York, whence he returned to France 8th March, 1761. Here, instead of rewards, he encountered most base calumnies, and whilst enjoying some repose in the bosom of his family at Grenoble, learnt, with some astonishment, that an order was made out to commit him to the Bastille. He presented himself at once to the Minister, and by his frank and honest bearing removed all suspicion. Sometime after, Captain Pouchot was sent to Corsica where he was suitably employed. Whilst reconnoitring a post on that island, he was killed by some Corsicans lying in ambush, on the 8th of May, 1769, in the 58th year of his age. Eloge prefixed to M. Pouchot's Memoires sur la dernière Guerre de l'Amerique Septentrionale. — Ed.

Quebec, 4th 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1757.

My Lord,

My last letters were of the 18th and 25th 7<sup>ber</sup>. Nothing of much interest has since occurred in this Colony. We have remained, on both sides, in a state of inactivity. Our troops have begun to defile from the camps of Carillon, St. John and Chambly, on the 20th 8<sup>ber</sup>; they will all have arrived in their quarters in the forepart of November; we shall have four battalions in the government of Montreal and four in that of Quebec. Chevalier de Levis will be at Montreal; M. de Bourlamaque here. As for me, my Lord, I shall divide my time between both these towns. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, who is at present here, and who will return shortly to Montreal, has seemed desirous of my remaining sometime at Quebec during his absence, so that he might have a chief man there in the sad circumstances in which we find ourselves through want of provisions.

M. de Bourlamaque, whom I cannot too highly praise, has closed the campaign at Carillon. That officer, who is extremely zealous, writes me that he will not leave for a few days after the troops. He will remain with the garrison and some workmen to try and finish the works necessary for their quarters and for the security of some external stores.

Chevalier de Levis continues always to aid me in my necessity, with as much zeal for the King's service as friendship for myself.

I have been to make the inspection on the North shore. I have handed the Marquis de Vaudreuil, in consequence, a Memoir of what I thought, in case the English would wish to make an attack on Quebec. If the arrangements I propose are well followed, I believe 'twould be desirable they should come there; and I annex to this letter my opinion, in a few words, in cipher, on a separate sheet.

M. Doreil has the honor to transmit to your address an exact return of the strength of our battalions on the 1st of 8<sup>ber</sup>. You will see that our companies are only 39 strong, one with another; that the two battalions of Berry have lost considerable; therefore, estimating the reinforcements necessary to complete the regiment of Berry on its original footing; our battalions on their ordinary standing, we shall require 500 men, and 750 more to place them on the footing of the augmentation ordered. There is a great fatality this year in the transmission of reinforcements and provisions; besides, the Marine troops are not completed, and have taken preference of us for their augmentation.

We have received news from Louisbourg by Sieur de Pontleroy, Captain en 1<sup>re</sup> of the Corps Royal, who is come with a commission of Engineer-in-Chief of New France, in place of Sieur de Lery, who died two years ago. His presence here will be of great utility, if he performs his duty as he appears to me to wish, and if he be allowed to do it, which I do not warrant. He reckons on belonging always to you and to write you on whatever concerns himself. If he have no better advantages than Sieur de Lery, his place (which will furnish him considerable work, and perhaps also some little bickerings, notwithstanding the good dispositions I perceive in him to avoid them), is not worth him more than 2,000<sup>l</sup>, one hundred écus lodging money, and 30 cords of fire-wood.

This Engineer left Louisbourg on the 27th 7<sup>ber</sup>; he has reassured us for this year against all attack on Isle Royale on the part of the English, the more especially as there was a squall on the 25th, which wrecked some English ships, and must have caused great damage and inflicted injury on their fleet. You will be advised of it from Louisbourg. No exact account had been received when this Engineer left. Will not the English winter their troops at Halifax and in New England, in order to be beforehand with us next year, if they can?

We have recently had news from Louisiana of the month of April. Everything is quiet there.

Our latest dates from Fort Duquesne, of the 7th 7<sup>ber</sup>, confirm the good dispositions of the Indians, the continuance of their forays, which spread desolation throughout the English Colonies. Sieur de Liniery, a Colonial Captain in command there, writes me that the different parties brought him in recently 200 prisoners or scalps. The same is nearly the case at Niagara, according to the letters of M. Pouchot, who commands there. That officer, having finished the fortifications and buildings which were to be erected at Niagara, returns to his regiment and is relieved by Captain Vassan, of the Colonial troops. We have only one solitary Commandant belonging to the Regulars on the frontier this winter—Captain d'Hebecourt, of the regiment of La Reine, who will be in command at Carillon, where the garrison will, for the greatest part, consist of our troops. My esteem for that officer and my confidence in his activity and intelligence, led me to select him. Besides, he is conversant with the manner the Indians are to be managed, and some of these are coming and going throughout the winter at that post.

Although the English have only a few Mohawks and Mohegans on their side, some occasionally make their appearance and take scalps. We had four soldiers killed by one of their parties a few days before the close of the campaign.

The Onnontagues pretend that bateaux are building night and day at Corlar; that Colonel Johnson is urging on this work. M. de Pouchot gives almost the same intelligence, and adds that the Indians of the Five Nations have told him that it was proposed to surprise one of our forts, by means of the Indians of the Five Nations who would come there under pretext of trading. It must be observed that the Five Nations appear generally disposed in our favor since we have been successful; but the English, who are nearer to them than we, have a great many partizans and emissaries among them. However that be, the Marquis de Vaudreuil sent off a canoë immediately to advise all the Commandants of the posts to be particularly on their guard, and as there are Colonial officers who know more about field service than of the precautions to be taken to avoid a surprise of a post, I have also written to them. Our garrisons there are very weak, but the scarcity of provisions and difficulty of transportation do not admit of their augmentation.

We have at present in the direction of Corlar a war party of 300 men, commanded by Sieur de Belhetre, a Colonial officer. Two hundred belong to our domiciliated Indians; the remainder are officers, cadets, Canadians and soldiers. This detachment, which left Montreal in the forepart of October, will not return before the end of November; it proceeds by Lake Ontario as far as the River Choueguen, which it will ascend, in order to penetrate into the English possessions. It will traverse that of the Five Nations, and an officer belonging to that detachment will be sent with Belts and Strings of Wampum to invite their young men to follow us, in order to strike the English. Should that detachment not effect anything considerable, at least it will run no risk. We shall have more reliable news of what is going on in that quarter, and its march might well derange the projects of the English, should they have any.

You know, my Lord, that it had been agreed that the Regulars should be paid, in Canada, in silver coin. The failure in the transmission of specie causes their not being paid except in paper since the 1st of September.

The ship La Liberté has brought us clothing at the end of three years, for all the Regulars, even on the footing of the augmentation; therefore, we have nothing to wish for, on that head, between this and 1761. I hope we shall have returned to France before that time. A portion of the cloth required for distribution among the officers on paying therefor, has arrived at the same time. I write on all these various points to M. de Moras, by agreement with M. de Bigot, Intendant of Canada, and I content myself with annexing to this despatch a memorandum of my demands and representations. Our campaign hospitals have been very well administered this year, and this good administration is due to the confidence M. Bigot has been pleased to repose in Sieur Arnoux, Surgeon-Major of the Regulars; the Montreal and Quebec hospitals have always been very good, thanks to the attention of the Hospital Nuns who have charge of them.

We would have nothing to desire, were it not for the frightful scarcity of provisions occasioned by the intercepting of the succors and a bad harvest. This Colony is lost unless France make powerful efforts to procure us, very early in the season, salted and other provisions, by having them conveyed at least to a certain latitude. 'Twould be well, also, were some seed wheat to arrive at the end of April, there would yet be time to sow it in the government of Quebec, and in order to be adapted to that purpose, it should be Northern wheat, as the French grain does not succeed in this quarter.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil is come to Quebec to hold a general Court-Martial which had been ordered in February, 1756, to try the Colonial officers who had surrendered Fort Beausejour and the pretended Fort Gaspareaux to the English in 1755. Although the affair was not mixed, as the Marquis de Vaudreuil showed me an order empowering him to call to it some of the principal officers of the Regulars, Chevalier de Montreuil, Adjutant-General, Sieur de Trevis, Commandant of the second battalion of the Regiment of Berry, and Captain d'Aiguebelle, of the Grenadiers of the Regiment of Languedoc, took seats at it. The unanimous finding has been to send them back acquitted. In the case of Fort Beausejour, regard was principally had to the fact that the Acadians have forced the Commandant to capitulate to save their lives. They had formerly taken the oath of allegiance to the English, who had threatened to have them hanged for violating it. In regard to Gaspareaux, a large stockaded inclosure, with only one officer and nineteen soldiers, it could not be considered a fort capable of sustaining a siege; accordingly the English burnt it and preserved only Beausejour, which they placed in a better condition than it was in when we occupied it.

This, my Lord, is all that is to be communicated to you. The sheet in cipher, hereunto annexed, will detail to you what I think on the next campaign. As I write you by the last vessels, this is probably all until the end of April, when we shall transmit our earliest despatches by way of Louisbourg.

I am with respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant.<sup>1</sup>

Memorandum of the Representations and Requisitions made to M. de Moras.

Document annexed to the letter presumed to be from M. de Montcalm to the Minister, and dated Quebec, 4th 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1757.

You know, my Lord, that when the troops of the Line were sent to this Colony, orders had been given that they should be paid in silver. They ceased to be so paid on the 1st 7<sup>ber</sup>; the allowance which had been made to them in the preceding campaign has been stopped on this one. I request you to call for the communication of the Memoir of my representations on that occasion. I had addressed it on the 4th of 9<sup>ber</sup> of last year to M. de Machaut. I see, with pain, that according as the prices of all sorts of provisions increase, the allowance granted to the officers diminishes. 'Tis, nevertheless, the King's interest not to hazard sending any more specie, and to pay them in paper, but would it not be more just, my Lord, to indemnify them for that alteration in the mode of payment, and for deducting the allowance determined on at first during the campaign, by allowing them supplementary pay, in form of a gratuity. The pay of a Captain, which amounts to 2760<sup>l</sup> might be raised to one thousand écus; the same proportion to be observed for the other grades.

The ship La Liberté having brought wherewith to renew the clothing of our troops at the end of three years on the footing of being complete, including the augmentations, and to furnish uniforms to a certain number of officers, at the cost price in France, I requested M. Bigot to ask you for a supplement for what regards the officer, in order that each may share that advantage, otherwise the officers cannot be obliged to wear the uniform regularly. I have also requested that Intendant to apply to you for something to renew, on the footing of an establishment, what is called the soldier's small equipment, such as belt, cartouch, powder-horn, etc. I have likewise asked him to request of you an immediate supply of shoes. They cost ten francs a pair, and the country, besides, would not supply enough of them.

French Attack on the German Flats, 1757.

Summary of M. de Bellêtre's Campaign; 25th November, 1757.

M. de Bellêtre with his detachment of about 300 of the Marine troops, Canadians and Indians, arrived notwithstanding all the obstacles of the season and the greatest scarcity of provisions, at the River à la Famine, where he met seven or eight Nontagués who, on a message which he gave them in the General's name, expressed delight in uniting with him.

He continued his route and after inexpressible fatigues and suffering, reached the vicinity of the Oneida village, whither he sent four influential Indians as bearers of the General's word.

He continued his march as far as the River Corlaer, and had the satisfaction of examining five English forts abandoned, by command, for that erected, since the reduction of Chouaguen, on the site of old Fort Bull.

The Indians when informed that there was a garrison of 350 men in a fort named Kouari, situate on the said river about a quarter of a league from the village of the Palatines, did not fail to exhibit fear, but M. de Bellêtre having told them that their Father dispatched a picked detachment, so well selected, only to strike a blow of some interest, they recovered their courage and evinced a lively ardor, except some young warriors and aged men who gave in, already fatigued by a weary march.

The four Indians sent to the Oneidas returned with the six warriors of that tribe, who joined our detachment, and told M. de Bellêtre that they had no other will than that of their Father.

11th November. At three o'clock in the afternoon M. de Bellêtre, preceded, as was his custom, by scouts, crossed the River Corlaer with his detachment, partly swimming, partly in the water up to the neck. He encamped at nightfall in the woods, a league and a half from the first of the five forts that covered the Palatine settlements.

12th At three o'clock in the morning he gave his detachment the order of march and attack, so as to surround the said five forts and the entire Palatine village, consisting of sixty houses.

Though M. de Bellêtre knew that the English got notice the day preceding, yet, in order that the courage of the Indians may not receive the least check, and to show them that he would not rashly expose them, he liberated an Indian of the Five Nations whom he had until then detained under suspicion. But this Indian could not injure M. de Bellêtre, because he commenced at the same time to attack the five forts and the Palatines' houses.

At sight of the first fort he determined to take it by assault. The enemy kept up the most active fire of musketry, but the intrepidity with which M. de Bellêtre, with all the officers and Canadians of his detachment, advanced, coupled with the warwhoop of the Indians, terrified the English to the degree that the Mayor of the village of the Palatines,<sup>1</sup> who commanded the said fort, opened the doors and asked for quarter.

M. de Bellêtre lost no time in repairing to the second, the third, the fourth and fifth, which were not less intimidated than the first by his intrepidity and the cries of the Indians. They all surrendered at discretion and were entirely burnt.

During this time a party of Canadians and Indians ravaged and burnt the said 60 houses of the Palatines, their barns and other out-buildings as well as the water-mill.

In all these expeditions about 40 English perished; they were either killed or drowned. The number of prisoners is nearly 150 men, women and children, among whom is the Mayor of the village, the Surgeon and some Militia officers. We had not a man killed; but M. de Lormier, an officer, was wounded in the right side by a ball, and three or four Indians slightly.

The damage inflicted on the enemy is estimated, according to the representations of the English themselves, to wit:

In grain, of all sorts, a much larger quantity than the Island of Montreal has produced in years of abundance.

The same of hogs.

3,000 horned cattle.

3,000 sheep.

All these articles were to have been sent, in a few days, to Corlaer.

<sup>1</sup> JOHAN JOST PETRIE is supposed to have immigrated to this country in 1710, and to have moved to the German Flats in 1720. His is the first name in the patent of that tract, where he was one of the leading men. He remained in Canada a prisoner until the close of 1758, and died before the breaking out of the war of the Revolution. He was one of the co-patentees of the tract called Henderson's purchase, in the present towns of Columbia and Warren. Benton's History of Herkimer County, 176. — Ed.

1,500 horses, 300 of which were taken by the Indians and the greater number consumed for the support of the detachment.

The property in furniture, wearing apparel, merchandise and liquor, might form a capital of 1,500,000 livres. The Mayor of the village alone has 400,000.

The French and Indians have acquired as rich a booty as they could carry off. They have in specie more than 100,000 livres. One Indian alone has as much as 30,000. There was likewise plundered a quantity of Wampum, silver bracelets, &c., scarlet cloth and other merchandise, which may form a capital of 80,000 more.

All this damage could not be done short of 48 hours. M. de Bellêtre made provision to be always able to resist the enemy, who, as has been observed, were to the number of 350 men in the said Fort Kouari, about a quarter of a league from the field of battle.

In fact, on the 13th, at 7 o'clock in the morning, 50 Englishmen, accompanied by some Mohawks, left the said fort, but as soon as they were perceived, our Frenchmen and Indians went to meet them double quick, and forced them to swim across the river, after receiving several discharges of musketry. The number that perished cannot be estimated. At noon, the same day, M. de Bellêtre gave orders to his detachment to commence their return march.

On the 15th he sent an Oneida, who is much attached to the General, with some chiefs from the Sault and St. Francis, to bear his message to the Oneidas, by which he communicated to them the success he experienced; invited them to persevere in their good sentiments and not to fear the English. Our Oneida delegate rejoined M. Bellêtre at the River Au Sable, and told him that the Five Nations had sent three Belts to the Oneida villages, which they wished him to take as a present to the General. By these they demand assistance to resist the English, being about to experience their resentment, inasmuch as they refused to allow four of their chiefs to enter Fort Kouari, having fired several shots at them. This had obliged the Oneidas to withdraw their women and children from the lake side, hoping their Father will protect them.

Topography of the Country between Oswego and Albany

Itinerary from the the mouth of the River Chouëgen, in Lake Ontario, to Lake Oneida; then up Vilcreek to the summit level, which is the source of the River of the Moack, or des Agnès, by which we can descend to Corlar or Chenectedi, whence Albany or Orange can be reached.

The entrance of the River Chouegen is easy; the harbor is formed of a cove. The English had a fort on each side of this river, by which this entrance was defended.

From Chouegen to the Great fall is an ascent of four leagues. In this space the navigation is intricate, the river rapid and encumbered by large rocks. Good pilots, familiar with the shoals, are requisite to be able to pass through it. Bateaux must be unloaded at the Great fall, where a portage occurs of about 40 to 50 paces. The bateaux are dragged along the ground.*

* From Chouëgen to Fort Bull is estimated to be about 36 leagues. The ordinary bateau load is only 14 to 1,500 weight. It takes five days to ascend the river from Chouegen to Fort Bull, and three and a half from Fort Bull to Chouegen. The river of the Five Nations rises in little lakes near which, about six leagues from its entrance into the River Chouegen, the Indians of the Five Nations reside. That river divides into two branches. That from the right rises in the lake of the Senecas and Cayugas; that from the left beyond the lakes of the Onontagués.

It is estimated to be about four leagues from the Fall to the mouth of the river of the Five Nations, which mouth is called the Three Rivers; its navigation is good. About a quarter of a league before coming to the Three Rivers, there is, however, a current, where precaution is requisite.

From the Three Rivers to Lake Oneida is computed at 8 leagues; the navigation is good; the river is about 60 paces wide; it is passable at all times with loaded vessels. This river is the outlet of Lake Oneida. There is neither fall nor rapid at its entrance.

Lake Oneida is twelve leagues long by about one league wide. Its navigation is beautiful and practicable at all times, unless there be a strong contrary wind. It is best on the right of the lake, which is on the north side.

From Lake Oneida we enter the River Vilerick,* which empties into that lake, and ascend nine leagues to Fort Bull. This river is full of sinuosities, narrow and sometimes embarrassed with trees fallen from both banks. Its navigation is difficult when the water is low. It is, however, passable at all times with an ordinary bateau load of 14 to 1,500 weight. When the waters of this stream are low, an ordinary bateau load cannot go by the river further than a league of Fort Bull. It becomes necessary then to unload and make a carrying place of the remainder by a road constructed to the Fort, or to send back the bateau for the other half load.

Fort Bull, which was burnt in 1756 by a detachment under the orders of M. de Lery, was situated on the right bank of this river near its source, on the height of land.

From Fort Bull to Fort Williams is estimated to be one league and a quarter. This is the Carrying place across the height of land. The English had constructed a road there over which all the carriages passed. They were obliged to bridge a portion of it extending from Fort Bull to a small stream near which a fort had been begun though not finished; it was to be intermediate between the two forts, having been located precisely on the summit level.

Fort Williams was situated on the right bank of the River Moack or des Agnès, near the source of that river on the height of land. It was abandoned and destroyed by the English after the capture of Chouëgen.

Leaving Chouëgen, there is a road over which the English used to drive horses and cattle. It follows the border of the left bank of the River Chouëgen. The Five Nations' river is passed at a fall near its outlet into the River Chouëgen, after which the road proceeds along the edge of the right bank of the Five Nations' river to the village of the Onnontagués, whence it proceeds across the country to the village of the Caskarorins and Oneidas† whence we can go to Forts Bull and Williams; also to fort Kouary without being obliged to pass the said two forts. The path or road taken by M. de Belhêtre in his expedition against the village of the Palatines may be also used. He went from the mouth of the River de la Famine ten leagues below Chouëgen; ascended this river for the distance of four leagues, and leaving it on the left, followed the path leading to Oneida lake, which he left on his right, and came to the summit level at Fort Williams.

The country through which he passed is fine, there being but few mountains. The soil is soft only in the latter part of the season. He forded three rivers, the waters of which were very high during the four days he was going from the River à la Famine to Fort Williams, a distance estimated at 24 to 30 leagues.

* The river of the Killed Fish flows also into this lake; the English used it formerly; they abandoned it because there was a portage, and have preferred Vilerick which they have cleared.

† The road goes to the Great Oneida village, about two leagues from the lake. A picket fort, with four bastions, had been constructed in this village by the English. It was destroyed by the Oneidas in observance of their promise given at a Council held between them and the Marquis de Vaudreuil. Each of its sides might have been one hundred paces. There is a second Oneida village, called the Little village, situated on the bank of the lake. There is no fort at the latter.

From Fort Williams the Moack river is navigable. Bateaux carry the same load as in the River Vilcrick to the portage at the Little Falls, which is about two leagues below the village of the Palatines and Fort Kouari.

From Fort Williams to Fort Kouari, situated on the right bank of the Moack river, is estimated to be 12 leagues. The road follows the right bank of the river which is the South side.

Leaving Fort Williams, there is a road that joins that by which horses and cattle pass from Fort Kouari to Chouagen. The road is bad for about four leagues after leaving Fort Williams. The road is marshy. The road is passable for sleds in winter and during the summer, and it can be easily passed on horseback at all times, though in some places there is a great deal of mud. After these four leagues, carts can easily go as far as Fort Kouari. After having traveled three leagues on this road, which is five leagues from Fort Kouari, we come to the Forks of two roads one of which, to the left, leads to the Palatines' village by fording the Moack river.

Continuing along the high road, which is on the right bank of the River Moack, to reach Fort Kouari, a creek is met that must be forded. Here was a grist-mill that has been burnt. One league before reaching Fort Kouari another small stream is encountered, over which there is a bridge. This stream is fordable at almost all seasons. On this creek was, also, a saw-mill which has been burnt.

Fort Kouari is situate on the right bank of the Moack river, on a small hill on the scarp of that river. It is a large three-story stone house with port-holes at each story and likewise in the basement, for the purpose of cross-firing. There are some small pieces above. The house is covered with plank and shingles. It was built as a store and dépôt for Chouëgen. It is surrounded with a ditch of about 30 feet from it. This ditch is 6 feet deep and seven wide. The crown of the ditch inside is planted with palisades in an oblique form; they are well jointed one to another. Behind these is a parapet of earth to fire from over the palisades. The four angles of this parapet, which is at the back of the ditch, form, as it were, four little bastions that reciprocally flank each other. On the West side is a house apart from the large one. It backs against the parapet of the palisades, and serves as a barrack and guard-house. There are two doors to the large building; the one at the North is a small swing door. It is used only in going to the river for water. At this side of the house there is no ditch; only palisades fixed in planks set in the scarp of the right bank of the river, to support the earth. The large gate of the house is on the South side; it is folding but not ironed. To go outside the palisades and ditch through this large door, you must leave the house to the left and turn to the Eastward where there is a passage. The ditch has not been excavated at that point. The earth serves as a bridge and road. There are palisades to the right and left, on both sides of the way, the whole width of the ditch. Outside the ditch is a folding gate. There is no other barrier nor chevaux-de-frise in front. The nearest house outside the fort is about 150 paces. Opposite this fort in the river is a small cultivated island, which can be reached at low water by fording.

From Fort Kouari to that of Cannatchocary, is four leagues. Some twenty houses are located at a distance one from another, within the space of one league of this road, which is through a flat country. After making this league, we go up a mountain that occupies two hours to ascend and descend. The country throughout the whole of this space is covered with wood.

After descending, two houses somewhat distant one from the other, are in the league, which is to be traveled to get to Cannatchocari.

The inhabitants of this country are Palatines or Germans. They form a company with some who dwell above the Fall on the other side of the river, which is the left bank. This company consists of about 60 men. The road from the one to the other of these two forts is good for all sorts of carriages.

Fort Cannatchocari is situated at the border of the Moack river, on the right bank. It is a square of four bastions of upright pickets (joined together with lintels), fifteen feet high, about one foot square, with port-holes inserted from distance to distance, with a stage all round to fire from.

This fort is one hundred paces on each side. It is not surrounded by a ditch. There are some small pieces of cannon at each of its bastions, and a house at each curtain to serve as a store and barrack. Five or six families of Moack Indians reside outside the fort.

From Fort Cannatchocari to Fort Hunter is about 12 leagues; the road is pretty good; carriages pass over it; it continues along the banks of the Moack river. About a hundred houses, at a greater or less distance from one another, are found within this length of road. Some are situated also about half a league in the interior. The inhabitants of this section are Germans, who compose two companies of about 100 men each.

Fort Hunter is situated on the borders of the Moack river, and is of the same form as that of Cannatchocari, with the exception that it is twice as large. It likewise has a house at each curtain. The cannon at each bastion are 7 and 9-pounders. The pickets of this fort are higher than those of Cannatchocari. There is a church or temple in the middle of the fort; in the interior of the fort are also some thirty cabins of Moack Indians, which is the most considerable village. This fort, like that of Cannatchocari, has no ditch; there's only a large swing gate at the entrance.

Leaving Fort Hunter, a creek is passed at the mouth of which that fort is located. It can be forded and crossed in bateaux in summer and on the ice in winter. There are some houses outside under the protection of the fort, in which the country people seek shelter when they fear or learn that an Indian or French war party is in the field.

From Fort Hunter to Chenectedi or Corlac is seven leagues. The public carriage way continues along the right bank of the Moack river. About 20 to 30 houses are found within this distance, separated the one from the other, about a quarter or half a league. The inhabitants of this section are Dutch. They, with some other inhabitants of the left bank of the Moack river, form a company about 100 men strong.

Chenectedi or Corlac, situated on the bank of the Moack river, is a village of about 300 houses. It is surrounded by upright pickets, flanked from distance to distance. Entering this village, by the gate on the Fort Hunter side, there is a fort to the right which forms a species of citadel in the interior of the village itself. It is a square, flanked with four bastions or demi-bastions, and is constructed half of masonry and half of timbers, piled one over the other above the masonry. It is capable of holding 2 or 300 men. There are some pieces of cannon in battery on the ramparts. It is not encircled by a ditch. The entrance is through a large swing gate, which lifts up like a draw-bridge. By penetrating the village in attacking it from another point, the fire from the fort can be avoided.

The greatest portion of the inhabitants of Chenectedi are Dutch. -

From Chenectedi to Albany or Orange is estimated to 6 or 7 leagues.* The road is excellent for all sorts of carriages; the soil sandy and the country covered with open timber. There are only a few hills. A league and half from Chenectedi, there is a house on the road which is a tavern. A league and half farther on, that is to say half way, another house is met, which is also a tavern.

Orange is situate on the right bank of the River Orange, otherwise called Hudson. It is not fortified on the forest side except by an inclosure of walls or pickets, without a ditch, which is flanked at certain distances; the river defends the entrance on the other side. It is calculated to be smaller than the inclosure of the town of Montreal. In the interior of Orange is a fort, a sort of citadel, capable of containing 300 men; here are some cannon.

This is all that relates to the right bank of the river. Let us pass to the left bank, which is the north side of that river, starting likewise from near its source at Fort Williams.

Leaving Fort Williams by the left bank of the River Moack, the village of the Palatines is estimated to be 12 leagues. The river is fordable near Fort Williams whence a path leads to the interior, half a league from the shore, parallel with the river whose borders are so marshy that nothing but hay can be had from them.

This path leads over hills and small mountains and can be traveled only a-foot or on horseback. Eight leagues must be traversed by this path before reaching the forks of the high road that comes from the other side, or right bank of the river. After having traveled this high road a quarter of an hour, a small creek is found, called Rassedot. It can be forded. There were two houses on the left bank of this creek which were burnt, and nothing but their ruins remain. Having passed this creek, the high road is followed for a distance of four leagues to the village of the Palatines. All sorts of vehicles travel this road.

The Palatine village† was situated on the left bank of the Moack river, not directly opposite Fort Kouari but about half a quarter of a league above it. You go from this village to the fort by bateau; the river can even be forded in several places.

The Palatine village which consisted of thirty houses has been entirely destroyed and burnt by a detachment under M. de Belhêtre's orders. The inhabitants of this village formed a company of 100 men bearing arms. They reckoned there 300 persons, men, women and children, 102 of whom were made prisoners and the remainder fled to Fort Kouari, except a few who were killed whilst fording the river.

From the Palatine village to the Little Falls, still continuing along the left bank of the river, is estimated about three leagues. In this distance there had been eight houses which have been abandoned. The inhabitants of these houses compose a company with those of Fort Kouari at the opposite side of the river.

The portage at the Little Falls is a quarter of a league, and is passed with carts. There is a road on both sides of the river, but that on the left bank is preferable, being better.

From the portage at Little Falls, continuing along the left bank of the river, there is only a foot path which is traveled with difficulty on horseback. Three leagues must be made over this path to arrive at the Canada creek where we meet the high road that passes from the termination of the Little Falls portage, along the right bank of the Moack river, where there is a ford above Fort Cannatchocari, opposite the mouth of the Canada creek. There is also a ferry boat at this place to put carts across when the river is high.

† It requires a day to descend the river with bateaux from Fort Bull to the Palatine village and three to return; and to go down from the Palatine village to Corlac requires [ a day and ? ] a day and a half to return.

After fording Canada creek, we continue along the left bank of the Moawk river and high road which is passable for carts for 12 leagues to Colonel Johnson's mansion. In the whole of this distance the soil is very good. About 500 houses are erected, at a distance one from the other. The greatest number of those on the bank of the river are built of stone. Those at a greater distance from the river in the interior are about half a league off; they are new dwellings built of wood.

There is not a fort in the whole of this distance of 12 leagues, and but one farmer's house built of stone that is somewhat fortified and surrounded with pickets. It is situate on the bank of the river three leagues from where the Canada creek empties into the Moack river.

The inhabitants of this country are Germans. They form companies of 100 men each.

Colonel Johnson's mansion is situate on the border of the left bank of the River Moack; it is three stories high; built of stone, with port-holes (crenelets) and a parapet and flanked with four bastions on which are some small guns. In the same yard, on both sides of the mansion, are two small houses; that on the right of the entrance is a store, and that on the left is designed for workmen, negroes and other domestics. The yard gate is a heavy swing gate well ironed; it is on the Moack river side; from this gate to the river is about 200 paces of level ground. The high road passes there. A small rivulet, coming from the north, empties into the Moack river about 200 paces below the inclosure of the yard. On this stream is a mill about 50 paces distance from the house; below the mill is the miller's house where grain and flour are stored, and on the other side of the creek, 100 paces from the mill, is a barn in which cattle and fodder are kept. One hundred and fifty paces from Colonel Johnson's mansion, at the north side, on the left bank of the little creek, is a rise of ground on which is a small house with port-holes, where, ordinarily, is kept a guard of honor of some twenty men, which serves, also, as an advanced post.

From Colonel Johnson's house to Chenectedi is counted seven leagues; the road is good; all sorts of vehicles pass over it. About twenty houses are found from point to point on this road.

The Moack river can be forded, during summer, a league and a quarter west of Chenectedi. Opposite Chenectedi the traverse is usually in a ferry boat and bateaux.

The inhabitants of this country are Dutchmen. They form a company of about 100 men, with those on the opposite side of the river below Fort Hunter.

Between Chenectedi and the mouth of the Moack river, where it discharges into that of Orange, there is the Great fall which prevents the passage of bateaux, so that everything on the river going from Chenectedi to Orange, passes over the high road that leads there direct.

From Orange to New-York is counted 50 to 60 leagues. Sloops from New-York ascend to Orange. There is also a high road from one to the other of these towns on the left bank of the river. The country is thickly inhabited on both sides. The inhabitants of Orange are, also, mostly Dutch like those of Chenectedi.

From Orange to Boston is considered about 60 leagues. The road thither is across the country. From Boston to New-York is reckoned the same distance following the road along the seaside.

New-York, situate on the left bank of the Orange river, near its mouth at the sea, is located on a tongue of land forming a peninsula. It is fortified only on the land side. Opposite New-York is a large island, very well inhabited and very wealthy. All sorts of vessels of war and merchantmen anchor between the town and that island.

NOTA.—In the whole country of the River Corlac there were nine companies of Militia, under the command of Colonel Johnson; eight only remain—that of the village of the Palatines being no longer in existence, the greater portion having been defeated by M. de Belhêtre's detachment. Colonel Johnson assembles these companies when he has news of any expedition which may concern the Moack river.

In the latter part of April, 1757, on receiving intelligence by the Indians that there was a strong detachment ascending the River St. Lawrence and entering Lake Ontario, he assembled these companies and went to the village of the Palatines, where he was joined by another body of 11 @ 1,200 men, sent him by the Commandant of Orange; this formed in all a force of 2,000 men. He entrenched himself at the head of the Palatine village, where he remained in camp fifteen days, and did not retire until he received intelligence that the French detachment seen on the River St. Lawrence, had passed by and taken the route to the Beautiful river.

This was the detachment of 500 men that had been sent last year to reinforce the Beautiful river, and had left Montreal in the latter days of the month of April.

Militia of Canada; 1758.

Inconveniences in the Constitution of this Militia, and means whereby advantage may be derived therefrom in the next campaign. January, 1758.

The Militia of Canada is well adapted to bush fighting, to navigating rivers and lakes, to summer or winter marches. Nevertheless, since the year 1756, when the war began to be waged in America on the European plan, much advantage has not been derived from that Militia for the following reasons:

1st Up to that time those Militiamen, ordered out only for parties of short duration, or for voyages, of long continuance 'tis true, but which required continual action, did not know what it was to remain six months assembled in a body, and often in camps of observation and consequently stable. Whence it follows that in our armies, disgust takes possession of them; and the craving after their homes, crops, harvest, induces them to plead sickness. It becomes necessary to send them back home, or they desert.

2nd When they enter on the campaign, the King furnishes them with an outfit, viz, shirts, coat, pantaloons, stockings, &c. Now, they leave this outfit at home to wear it on their return, persuaded that they will be absent only, for a short time, and in warm weather. Besides, they carry along with them only their worst musket in the expectation that when with the army, the King will of necessity be obliged to have it mended or to supply them with another.

This imposes a serious expense on the King, a twofold waste of arms, a matter so precious, and in addition to this, those Canadians who have only a shirt and breeches on their bodies, fall sick when the cold sets in, and even from the cold alone of the summer nights. Then they become a burthen instead of being useful.

3<sup>o</sup> They are without tents; and have no other covering than cabins made of the bark of trees, a very good shelter when the war excursions or parties continue at most a month, insufficient against the inclemency of the weather when the campaign lasted six months. 2nd cause of sickness.

4th As nobody watches to see that they cook whenever the operations of the war permit, they feed on pork almost raw, which was still admissible in the ancient mode of waging war in the country, and this is now a 3rd cause of sickness and of the uselessness of these Militia.

5th In fine, 'tis not arranged that they respect their Militia officers. The air which nourishes the Indians; their example; those extensive deserts; everything inspires, everything offers Independence. Neither order, nor subordination exists, therefore, among those Militia. How, then, derive advantage from them? where are they to be relied on? how infuse into their service that activity which is still more necessary when we are inferior in force?

What is the remedy for these abuses?

To correct their source, 'twould be necessary to alter their constitution; this would be consequently the work of peace. The following is the remedy which the season of war allows and permits:

1st To make an exact census of all the farmers and to divide them into three classes; effective, middling, bad; in fact, the M<sup>l</sup> de Vaudreuil told me that he would make this census this winter.

2nd To order that all the effective make the next campaign in toto, in manner following:— it being well understood that those who will remain at home, shall do the sowing and harvest of those on duty:

1° To order that all the Militiamen commanded to march, shall leave home well equipped and well armed;* to review them for the first time at the first place of muster, a second time at the last entrepôt on the frontier, a third time on their joining the army; to chastise severely and even corporally those who will not be clothed in a manner to support the vicissitudes of the seasons, or who will have bad muskets.

2° To divide all these Militiamen into three corps, one of which will be incorporated into our battalions for the campaign; the second into those of the Marine;† the third will form the distinct corps of Militia.

By this means, 1° Those who will be incorporated will quarter with the soldiers; being well clothed, tented and fed like them, they will fare well; the officers and sergeants of the companies will see to their conduct—to their service; consequently less desertion and more subordination. Besides, by this incorporation, each company will possess effective soldiers, excellent marksmen, good canoemen and good axemen. Each company would be furnished also with a certain number of tools, for which the officers would be responsible. Thus, 'tis plain the service would proceed rapidly, each detachment being entirely formed, and having everything necessary for the war of the country.

2° The Militia corps being less numerous, 'twill be less difficult to place good Militia officers at its head, who will be invested with the same authority as officers have over soldiers. Order, discipline and sanitary police will be more easily established in it.

* On returning from the campaign, they or their families shall be presented by the King with the accustomed equipment, or shall be allowed the discount according to the fixed price.

† The Minister need not fear that the farmers will not agree with the soldiers. As the soldiers pass their winters with the farmer, they know and love each other. Indeed, attention would be paid to attaching the Militiamen to the battalions that have wintered among them.

3° Orders will have to be issued that the farmers not in the first draft, shall have by them an equipment, a good gun, one pound of powder, 2 pounds of ball, ten days' provisions in biscuit and pork, with a certain number of bateaux, and their rigging and some kettles per parish, so that they may be ready to march at the first call. Captains of parishes will receive orders to make an inspection twice a week throughout all the houses, and those who will not have munitions and provisions shall be severely punished.

(In such cases, the civil officers, priests, monks, women, children and all people, must perform the work of the field. The wives of the chief men and officers ought to show the example.)

4° That the Governor-General be authorized to give Royal commissions to the Militia officers who will have greatly distinguished themselves, or else some sort of mark of honor; to the Militiamen who will have performed some brilliant action or will be wounded, a gratuity; to those who will be lamed, some trifling pension.

Such is the only means to render the Canadian Militia useful; the crisis is urgent, and if the Minister approve the preceding arrangements and wish them put into execution, he must transmit his orders relative thereto and precise, to the Generals.

Baron de Dieskau to Chevalier de Montreuil.

Bath Springs, in England,
The 26th January, 1758.

My dear Chevalier,

I have just learned that the Ministers have been indisposed towards you on my account, namely, because you did not have me removed after having seen me wounded at the foot of a tree. Whereupon I have just written to the Marquis de Paulmi that you have been the victim of the greatest injustice; that you had been absolutely unwilling to quit me and that I had been under the necessity of making use of the King's authority, to order you in his name to retire, for the purpose of conducting the retreat; that shortly after, two Canadian soldiers came apparently from you, who wished to remove me, one of whom was killed right out and fell on my legs, and, fearing lest the same misfortune should overtake the other, I ordered him to retire, which he did. I have wrote you all this from New-York, in answer to a letter you did me the honor to write me on this subject; but I have learned from M. Doreil that none of my letters written at New-York had reached their address. I am vexed, my dear Chevalier, at a report so false, but this letter ought to set you at ease.

I have the honor, &c.

(Signed), The Baron DE DIESKAU.

Montreal, 15th February, 1753.

My Lord,

I have the honor to transmit to you, annexed hereunto, the following copies :

1<sup>o</sup> The speeches of the Deputies of the 5 Nations to the late Marquis de la Galissonnière, dated 2nd November, 1748, and their declaration in the presence of two Notaries, that in former times there had been no Whites in this entire Continent, but that within a hundred years some had settled there, both French and English; that they formed a trade with the one and the other to procure guns, blankets and other commodities unknown to them before that time; that they had even seen, with pleasure, Traders establish themselves in their vicinity; but that they had not ceded to any person their lands; which they esteem to be always theirs, and derive from Heaven; that in proof that the 6 Iroquois Nations are not subjects of England, the English had, in their last war, and in the one preceding, continually solicited them to take the hatchet up against the French, which they had constantly refused and will again reject, as they desire to cultivate peace equally with the English and French.

2<sup>o</sup> Of a Council held in 1750, by the late Marquis de la Jonquière with some Cayuga deputies, wherein they say that the Nations inhabiting the Beautiful river have been placed there by God, who located the whites at the other side of the sea; that they, the Cayugas, have remained neutre during the war, that they see clearly that the English are seeking only their destruction; seizing all their lands and are soon in their midst.

3<sup>o</sup> Another Council holden in 1751, by the late M. de la Jonquière with the Nontagués on the behalf of the 5 Nations, in presence of the deputies of the Upper country and the domiciliated Nations, wherein the Nontagués attribute to the English the murder of 18 of their warriors. They also say that they have summoned the English to retire from the other side of the mountains, so that the lands of the Beautiful river may be free to their exclusive use since the Master of Life had placed them there.

4<sup>o</sup> Some speeches of the Abenakis of Saint Francis to the Governor of Boston's deputy in 1752, wherein they reproach the English with having always attacked them and killed their people; that it depended only on themselves to have peace; that they have not yet sold the lands they are living on; that they wish to retain the possession of them; that their ancestors did indeed allow the English on the seaboard as far as Snonakonato; but that they do not wish to cede them an inch of the territory they inhabit; forbid them killing a single beaver or taking a single stick of timber off those lands; request the Governor of Boston to have those punished who have been surveying such lands, which they hold from God; that they have allied themselves with the King of France from whom they have received Religion and every description of help in their necessities; that they love that Monarch, and are strongly attached to his interests.

5° The minute of the speeches of, and my answers to, the Senecas who came in 1755, in company with M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire, knowing that the English were desirous of taking him.

6° Of my answer to the speeches of the 5 Nations, which I received the same year, wherein you will see, my Lord, that they assure me of their neutrality; that they did acknowledge to me they had accepted the hatchet from the English; that I made them appreciate my kindness in not punishing them; that the Indian nations in the alliance of the King, my master, would have made them suffer the penalty due to their crime had they not been restrained by me; that I had reproached them with their past conduct, their speeches to General Braddock; that they are the authors of the death of M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil and of the other officers who were killed at Lake Saint Sacrament; that they should suffer the fate they have long deserved on the very first fault they would commit.

7° The minute of the speeches of, and my answers to, the Nontagués and Senecas speaking in the name of the 5 Nations, from the 25th July, 1756, to the 20th August following, that is to say, after the surrender of the forts at Choueguen.

8° The minute of the Grand Council which I held with the deputies of the 5 Iroquois Nations in the month of December of the same year, 1756.

I am, my Lord, with the most profound respect,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Paulmy.

[ Département de la Guerre, Paris. ]

Quebec, 19th February, 1758.

My Lord,

I profit by the return of a courier sent to Louisbourg to have the honor of writing to you. I did not receive any letter, last year, from the Minister of the Marine. I have just received two from M. de Moras dated the twenty-seventh of May and third of August. I annex hereunto copy of my answer, which will inform you at the same time of what I have written him, and of the most minute details concerning the Colony. You will see there, my Lord, that Captain D'herbecourt, of the regiment of La Reine, who is in command this winter at Fort Carillon, has been obliged to be very alert, and that Chevalier de Levis has put down, by his firm tone, a species of riot which broke out at Montreal on occasion of the reduction and change of the food. From the feeble tone used towards the farmers and Colonial troops, I doubt if the letters from the Colony admit the service he has rendered.

The surprisal of the Palatine village, sixteen leagues from Corlar, is a consequence of the detachment which was on the march from the very beginning of October and whereof I have had the honor to speak to you in my despatch of the fourth of November.

Hazard has been played to excess in the Intendant's house; happily, he does its honors magnificently; that is still better than if our officers had led a life of disorder. He appears pained at not having, on that occasion, deferred to my representations, and gives strong assurances that it will be a different case next winter. My condescension, in this regard, has been founded on the principles of conciliation, whereof I have already had the honor to write you in my despatch of the twenty-fifth of April of last year.

I did not care to write about it to the Minister of the Marine. I avoid, as much as possible, whatever would have the air of complaint or reproach against an Intendant who appears well intentioned towards the Regulars and is cousin of the Marquis de Puisieux.<sup>1</sup>

Doubt not, my Lord, my zeal and application in whatever can interest the King's service. I dare hope that you will be pleased to second my representations respecting the allowances of our officers and mine in particular, and those of Messrs de Levis and de Bourlamaque, who, though subject to less expense, are not at ease in the matter of appropriations. For myself, my Lord, attentive not to incur any superfluous expense foreign to the commission with which I am honored, my debts prove the justice of my representations. M. de Machault said to me, on leaving, I shall place you in a position to live there, and will make up for the smallness of your allowances, if they are insufficient.

The letters from Louisbourg do not give us any particular information in regard either to that quarter or Acadia. The Indians whom we shall have there, are always making some little incursions. The English are fortifying themselves at Fort Beausejour.

We have had, this winter, some letters from Lord Lowdon on the capitulation of Fort William Henry. He does not consent nor refuse to execute that capitulation. The Marquis de Vaudreuil and I have just answered him in the same style and in a proper tone. This is a matter of little interest to write to you on, but I have the honor to inform you of the most trifling details.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. The Marquis de Vaudreuil has just received an order from the King dated the sixth of August, referring to an ordinance rendered for the Colonies in 1744, forbidding games of chance, enjoining him and the Intendant to see it enforced.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Moras.

Quebec, 19th February, 1758.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to inform you by my last letters dated the 4th November that I had not received any of yours. I profit by the first opportunity by Louisbourg to announce to you the receipt of those you did me the honor to write me, one dated the twenty-seventh of May in answer to my correspondence of the year 1756 with M. de Machault, the other dated the third of August in acknowledgment of the receipt of my despatch of the twenty-fifth of April. In the first you vaunt the valor of the Canadians, you read me some lessons respecting the conduct to be observed towards them and the Indians. You kindly add, that 'tis not in regard to myself, but that private accounts make mention of the harshness with which some of our officers treat the one and the other. I have taken very good care not to show that letter; 'twould have afflicted our officers who are but too well persuaded, and not without cause, that people in the Colony are, through a spirit of low jealousy, occupied only in running them down; those imputations are false. Those accounts which you mention to me, have been written, my Lord, by persons as ill-instructed as they are ill-intentioned. I appeal to the Marquis de Vaudreuil and to M. Bigot who have appeared to me pained by your letter, and who, both the one and the other, have assured me, that they would undeceive you. The Canadians and Indians are well pleased with the few of our officers who have been with them, and M. Pouchot, Captain of the regiment of Bearn, who has been in command at Niagara, is regretted by the latter.

As for what regards myself, personally, I shall not alter my conduct. The Canadian, the simple farmer, respects and loves me. As to the Indians, I dare believe I have seized their genius and manners. I am indebted for their confidence perhaps more to my success than to my feeble talents; but in the present moment I dare assert that even in the Upper countries, my name will make as much impression as those who are believed to be the idol of those people. They hold for principle to consider as much the war chief as the chief of the cabin. In respect to Canadian valor, no one renders it more justice than I and the French do, but a nation so much accustomed to brag, will glorify itself long enough before I shall ever entertain the unfortunate confidence of M. de Dieskau. I will not employ them except in their sphere, and shall endeavor to support their bravery by the advantage of the woods and of the regular troops. By this expression I mean, the Land and Marine force, which I esteem to an equal degree.

The recruits arrived this year are partly of the bad class. They require severity and frequent examples. I fear desertion during the campaign. You have seen by my letters of the month of November, the strength of our troops and that the augmentation for those of the Line could not be made for want of clothing. Sickness having disappeared, the loss of the winter is a trifle.

I cannot give you any information yet concerning the next campaign; the operations will depend on the prompt arrival of provisions and of the good or bad bearing of the enemy. The article of provisions makes me tremble; notwithstanding the reductions in the rations the scarcity is greater than we should have believed. I quit Quebec to rejoin the Marquis de Vaudreuil at Montreal, after having arranged with M. Bigot as to what regards the wants of our troops. I shall be always well pleased with his zeal for the service, his indulgence and resources. But he cannot fail being often embarrassed, and is to be pitied in having so difficult a duty assigned to him. Be pleased to assure his Majesty, once for all, as I shall not have the honor of writing to you any more on the subject, that whatever course may be pursued in regard to me, I shall always reject whatever may be injurious to his service, and that I shall have increasing moderation and patience, of which I daily furnish proofs. I shall propose what I may consider useful; shall endeavor to do my best in the execution of what will be concluded on, and to supply, at the risk of being disapproved, should success not follow, any deficiencies in obscure and sometimes capitious orders.

My Lord, according to your letter, his Majesty will not reconsider the suppression of the allowance granted to the officers of the regular troops during the campaigns of 1755 and 1756. I merely represent to you that 'tis a pity their allowance diminishes in proportion as the high price of provisions increases. To be paid in paper instead of specie, as M. de Marchault had agreed with M. de Secheller, causes a considerable diminution in their pay. I have already had the honor to write you in my letter of the fourth of November of last year, and to propose to you to continue to have them paid in paper, which will be advantageous to the King, who will not have to risk any more specie, but at the same time to advance the pay of Captain, now two thousand seven hundred and sixty livres, to one thousand écus, and the rest in proportion. The Lieutenants, more to be pitied, can no longer live on their pay. Let not their pay be compared to the small allowance of the Colonial officers, who possess resources in embarking in trade and speculations, and in expecting a share in the trading posts and in the custom of deriving advantage from their forays with the Indians.

As to what regards myself, my Lord, M. de Machault had assured me that the King would aid me and place me in a position to live in a becoming style. The necessity of securing influence, of responding to the honor of being the Commander of a body of more than two hundred and fifty officers, of living with those of the Colony in order to foster that union so much recommended, the honor of commanding the one and the other in camps, where I must show them that if I set them the example of frugality on the march and in the campaign, I know how to live with dignity in fixed camps. These motives obliged me to incur for my table an expense nearly equal to that of the Governor-General. Nevertheless, his pay is far greater than mine, and his emoluments and means beyond even his pay. If you, my Lord, do not come to my aid, and if I serve some years longer in the Colony, I shall be under the necessity of selling the patrimony of my children. M. Bigot has been so good as to authorize the Treasurer of the Marine to advance me twelve thousand francs, which I owe him, and the farther I go the deeper will I be indebted to him.

The Marquis de Vaudrenil will assuredly have informed you of the success of the detachment of Lieutenant de Belhête, of the Colonials, who has surprised a village about sixteen leagues from Corlar, inhabited by some emigrants from the Palatinate. Distant forays, without being ever decisive in the main, or as considerable as the accounts from the country represent them to be, have always a marvelous effect in increasing the confidence of the Canadians and Indians, and the terror in which the English hold them.

Although forts are always carried, according to the mode of speaking in the country, sword in hand, valeur intremette, in this instance 'twas the surprisal, burning and sack of a large village, open at all points, convenient to trading with the Five Nations, and the carrying off all its inhabitants. The fort of Quaris,<sup>1</sup> within a quarter of a league of it, with a garrison of three hundred men, has been left unattacked, which could not be otherwise.

We have actually two parties in the field to keep the enemy busy and to obtain intelligence of his movements—one towards Fort Lydius, under the command of M. de Langray Montegron, a Colonial officer, and another in the direction of Corlar, is composed only of some Indians from La Presentation. This is all that [can] be done, owing to the scarcity of provisions.

The English have come repeatedly in very considerable numbers to Carillon. Captain de Hebecourt, of the regiment of La Reine, whom I have left there in command during the winter, has always been very attentive in providing exclusively for the preservation of his fort and guarding against snares that were set for him. Therefore, the expeditions of the English have resulted in taking one unlucky soldier prisoner. Its garrison has been very alert, and I have been well content with it on account of the exactitude of the service, although it showed some little mutiny on the delay of some equipments due to them. M. de Hebecourt's position was critical; he extricated himself therefrom with much firmness and prudence. Under pretext of conducting a contractor sent by the Intendant to Carillon, I forwarded to him, without any show, a detachment consisting of a sergeant and some reliable soldiers.

The reduction of the ration and the change of food have not failed to excite a ferment. The bon ton and good example have provided for everything at Quebec. Some difficulties have occurred at Montreal, where the people are less docile. This spirit was gaining among the Colonial troops, and even the soldiers of the regiment of Bearn, who are in garrison, evinced some slight disposition to be affected by it, but I owe it to truth and to Chevalier de Levis to state to you that the public is somewhat indebted to him on that occasion, and although we have no authority in the matter of discipline over the Colonial troops in garrisons, the tone he used towards them caused them to return immediately to the path of duty, and has restrained ours. Everything is in the greatest tranquillity for more than two months, and the troops are waiting patiently without a murmur, for better treatment.

I am with respect,

My Lord,

Your most, &c.

Montreal, 20th of February, 1758.

My Lord,

I profit by the departure of the courier for Louisbourg, by whom I have received a letter from M. de Moras, who expresses the satisfaction the King is graciously pleased to entertain of my services; for this I am indebted to the report you have been pleased to render his Majesty. Permit me to return you my most humble thanks therefor. I shall not cease to afford, on all occasions, new proofs of my zeal. I am persuaded that the Marquis de Montcalm will not leave you in ignorance of the services I have had an opportunity, this winter, of rendering in the district of Montreal, by causing both the troops of the Line and those of the Marine, to observe a strict discipline, by obliging with prudence and firmness the one and the other submit to all the reduction of provisions that has been considered necessary. I have commenced by showing the example by partaking of the same meats as the troops.

As my letter is exposed to the risks of the sea, I shall not enter into any more minute details on the article of provisions, nor on the actual condition of the Colony, as I am persuaded the Marquis de Montcalm, by means of his cipher, will not leave you to wish for, or in ignorance of, anything. As to what regards myself, my Lord, I beg you to assure his Majesty that I shall omit nothing in order that the troops confided to my care, may maintain themselves within their duty, and patiently endure all the incidents of the war. I shall observe, as I have always done, the greatest harmony and union with the Marquis de Vaudreuil and the Marquis de Montcalm. I hope that my example will continue to cause the same to be observed in both corps of troops. I must not omit stating to you, my Lord, how much reason I have to be satisfied with the friendship and confidence the Marquis de Montcalm evinces towards me on all occasions.

The Marquis de Montcalm will have the honor to communicate to you the iterated representations he has made to the Minister of the Marine, respecting the situation the subalterns of the Regular troops are reduced to. As everything is three times dearer than when they arrived in the Colony, it is impossible for the Lieutenants to live on their pay. He consequently prays M. de Moras to have it increased, or to have them allowed the same comforts they have enjoyed in the first campaigns.

Permit me, my Lord, to submit to you the same representations for myself. The position I occupy obliges me to maintain a certain state in order to secure that consideration I ought to possess in this Colony. I have not to reproach myself with having incurred any improper expense, and should suspect myself of having failed in the King's service did I not live as I have done, observing, nevertheless, the greatest economy, which does not save me from being this year ten thousand francs in arrear of the pay the King allows me, and next year 'twill be worse, because none of the provisions I have brought from France remain. I beg you, my Lord, to have the goodness to attend hereunto. I have no fortune but his Majesty's bounty which I shall expend with great pleasure in his service. I assure you that all I desire in the way of money is, to owe nothing when quitting this country. It would be very painful for me to leave more debts than I should be able to pay.

Permit me also, my Lord, to remind you of the favor I had the honor to solicit from you in my last letters, namely: to procure for me the grade of Major-General (Maréchal de camp). The Marquis de Vaudreuil asks and desires it for me; Count d'Argenson had promised it to me, if I remained in America two years. They have expired. I flatter myself that I have merited it by the occasions I have had to afford proofs of my application and zeal. Nevertheless, 'twill be to you alone, my Lord, I shall be indebted for this favor. I beg you beforehand to be pleased to be persuaded of my entire gratitude.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil transmits to M. de Moras two maps and two memoirs drawn up by me, having applied myself since I am in America, to the study of the country. I expected to have the honor to send them to you, at the same time, but as this opportunity is not sure, and as the despatches are forwarded only by a man who is going a-foot to Louisbourg, it has been impossible for me to trouble him with them. The Marquis de Vaudreuil having requested me to hand them to him, as M. de Moras asked him for them, being anxious to have some information on that subject, I shall have the honor to transmit them to you by a more certain opportunity which will be afforded by the sailing of the first vessels.

I beg you, my Lord, to be pleased to continue your kindness to me, and to honor me always with your protection.

I have the honor to be with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Chevalier DE LEVIS.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Paulmy.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 23<sup>d</sup> February, 1758.

My Lord,

You ought to receive, at the same time, a letter I have had the honor to write you on the nineteenth, the day before my departure from Quebec. On arriving, I have learned that M. de Moras had demanded of the Marquis de Vaudreuil a detail of the various counsels holden with the Five Nations since and including those held in the time of M. de la Gallissonnière, in order to improve the independence of those nations in respect to the English, who always affect to speak of them as their subjects.

In M. de la Gallissonnière's time, the Governor-General had read to the Deputies of the Five Nations, in a Council, a letter from the Governor of New England who styled them subjects. It shocked them so much that they immediately made their protest which was received by a notary and they affixed their seals, or totems to it, and you may have seen by the account of their embassy in December, 1756, which I had addressed to you with my despatch of the twenty-fifth of April, 1757, that they fully maintain that independence.

The Minister of the Marine demands, at the same time, some reflections on the manner of regulating the limits of New France. Chevalier de Levis has furnished the Marquis de Vaudreuil a map he drew up on the report of divers officers, Indians or prisoners, adjoined to some observations of M. Pouchot. The latter has prepared a map which M. de Vaudreuil sent to M. de Moras. I would have been much pleased to be able to transmit it to you at the same time, but I arrived yesterday and the courier starts to-morrow; you will have it by the first opportunity, and I shall be able to add some notes to it. For the present I content myself with annexing hereunto my ideas generally on that subject.

As M. de Vaudreuil has not communicated any of his to me, nor to Chevalier de Levis, though he had asked the latter for his map, my ideas may conflict with his. Therefore I content myself with communicating them to my Minister, as a tribute I owe him. He will be kind enough to read them in connection with a map of Canada, and make such use of them as he will deem proper for the King's service, as I write them only to him.

One of our parties commanded by Sieur de Langy Montegron, an officer of the Colony, who had been towards Fort Lydius, has just arrived with twenty-five English scalps and three prisoners. It appears, by the report of the latter, that the English are transporting a vast amount of provisions from Orange to Saratoga. Had we some provisions this would be the opportunity to keep up large parties on that route.

I am with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

The paragraphs within brackets are in cypher in the original.

[To regulate the limits, France must have at least possession of what England calls Acadia as far as the Isthmus, and re-take Beausejour; she must have the River St. John; at least leave the River St. John in the joint occupation of the Abenaki and Mikmak Indians.

Lake St. Sacrament to France, at least neutral, not to be at liberty to erect forts on Wood creek. England will never renounce Fort Lydius. I believe it to be on her territory; to engage her to do so, Carillon must be abandoned.

Lake Ontario, Lake Erie to France; the English cannot erect forts on these lakes, nor on any rivers emptying therein. The height of land, the natural boundary between France and England as far as the Ohio; thereby the Apalachies become the boundary for England; the Ohio to belong to France, as well as Fort Duquesne, unless a better fort can be made, and one better located, for Fort Duquesne is good for nothing and is falling. To maintain the Five Nations independent and the Indians towards the River Susquehanna called Delawares, (Loups) and that neither France nor England have no power to erect forts among those people.

Notwithstanding our success, peace is desirable for New France or Canada, which must be reduced at the long run, considering the number of English and the difficulty of transporting provisions and reinforcements. ]

M. de Paulmy to M. de Montcalm.

Versailles, 26th February, 1758.

I have the honor to inform you, Sir, that having repeatedly represented to the King that the state of my health did not permit me to support the labor I had to undergo in the present circumstances, his Majesty has been graciously pleased to accede to my respectful representations and has instructed me to advise you that for the future you are to address yourself to Marshal de Belle Isle<sup>1</sup> on all matters appertaining to the War Department. Although that Minister is very well informed of your distinguished services and of the merit of those officers under your orders, I have, nevertheless, felt a pleasure in bearing testimony thereof to him and of rendering the most favorable report of them to the King during my administration ; as for the rest, the King has not as yet disposed of my office of Secretary of State, and as soon as his Majesty will have nominated thereto, you will be advised.

I leave to Marshal de Belle Isle the duty of corresponding with you on the objects relative to the mission entrusted to you, and confine myself to acknowledging the receipt of the letters you have done me the honor of writing to me on the 24th April, 23rd May, 11th and 25th July, 15th August, 8th, 18th and 25th September last.

I feel great pleasure in congratulating you on the brilliant success of your last campaign, and cannot too strongly assure you of the satisfaction his Majesty has expressed thereat when I submitted to him the contents of your letters.

As I have not received the return you announced to me in your letter of the 15th of August, 1757, of the favors which in your opinion ought to be conferred on the officers of the Regulars who have made the campaign, I could not receive his Majesty's orders on that subject.

Commissary Magallon had been destined last year to go and relieve Commissary de la Grive des Assizes at Louisbourg, but was unable to proceed on the voyage having fallen sick on his way to Brest, and I could replace him afterwards only by Sieur Bernier, formerly Aid-de-Camp to M. de Dieskau, whom the King has appointed as assistant to Sieur Doreil in quality of Commissary of war and to whom I confide this letter.

I am duly sensible of the personal sentiments you are so good as to express towards me in your letter of the 11th of July on my Uncle's retirement. I pray you to accept my thanks in return, to continue to me the honor of your friendship and to be well persuaded that I deserve it, by the sentiments I have devoted to you and the most perfect attachment with which I have the honor to be, &c.

Montreal, 10th April, 1758.

My Lord,

The Marquis de Vaudreuil having sent a courier to Louisbourg in the last days of February with orders immediately to dispatch a vessel to France, I have profited by that opportunity to write you in date the nineteenth and twenty-third of February. I have the honor to send you the duplicates, as Captain de Boishebert of the Colonial troops is going in a few days, if the River St. Lawrence be open, for the River St. John, thence to proceed to Louisbourg with a party of six or seven Canadians, Acadians or Indians of Acadia. M. de Drucourt, Governor of Isle Royale, will receive with great satisfaction the reinforcement which had been already sent him last summer. I should have wished that corps of troops had been ordered to move on the ice so as to reach its destination earlier.

We continue in the same condition ; great scarcity of provisions, much suffering among the people, patience and good will among the soldiers who continue reduced to live scantily (de cheval) and to have only half a pound of bread; great impatience to receive the supplies of provisions which we are expecting from France, and an apprehension on my part that though they arrive in abundance, and the harvest be good, we shall suffer from scarcity next winter. I should write too much to render this paradox intelligible. Furnishing supplies for the public service by contract, is ordinarily better than by the government (en regie), but both are subject to great abuse should those in office not be sufficiently clearighted or disinterested. I have spoken sometimes of it, and even represented it in writing, with the wisdom and moderation necessary in the person who has only a subordinate authority, derived from a different department from that wherein he is made to serve and who would desire uninterrupted good.

Since my last despatch of the twenty-third of February, our parties continue to carry on a marauding war with success. Sieur Wolfs, formerly sergeant in Bentheim, and now a seconded officer, attached to the land forces, has been with some Abenakis, scattering terror nearly as far as Machasouset, a dependency of the Boston government, by burning divers settlements and killing all the cattle there; and Capt. D'hebecourt, of the regiment of La Reine, who commands at Carillon, having been informed, on the thirteenth of March, that the enemy had a detachment in the field, which was estimated by the trail to number about two hundred men, sent a like detachment of our domiciliated Indians, Iroquois and Nepissings, belonging to the Sault St. Louis and the Lake of the Two Mountains, who had arrived on the preceding evening, with some thirty Canadians and several Cadets of the Colonial troops, under the command of Sieur de la Durantaye, of the same troops; Sieur de Langy, one of the officers of the Colony, who understands petty war the best of any man, joined the party with some of the Lieutenants of our battalions, who are detached at Carillon. The English detachment consisted of two hundred picked men, under the command of Major Roger, their most famous partizan, and twelve officers. He has been utterly defeated; our Indians would not give any quarter; they have brought back one hundred and forty-six scalps; they retained only three prisoners to furnish live letters to their father.

About four or five days after, two officers and five English surrendered themselves prisoners, because they were wandering in the woods, dying of hunger. I am fully persuaded that the small number who escaped the fury of the Indians, will perish of want, and not have returned to Fort Lydius. We have had two Colonial Cadets and one Canadian slightly wounded, but the Indians, who are not accustomed to lose, have had eight killed and seventeen wounded, two of whom are in danger of dying. The Marquis de Vaudreuil takes great care of the sick; has made presents in the name of the Great Ononchio (that is, the King), to the families of those who have been slain, and the dead on this occasion have been covered with great ceremony; the Indians are content and very anxious to avenge their loss. Lieutenant de Fouriet, of the la Sarre regiment, and Sieur d'Arenne, proposed to be employed in the regiment of Languedoc, have distinguished themselves on this occasion.

The live letters, or, to use a more correct expression, the prisoners, do not as yet furnish us anything decisive regarding the project of the English. I believe, however, that they will undertake an expedition against Isle Royale. We have not had any news from the Upper Countries, viz', from Forts Du Quesne and Niagara, since the first days of January. They are making great efforts in that direction to detach the Nations from us. The Captain of the Colonial troops, commanding at Fort du Quesne, does not succeed, it seems to me, as well with our Indians as M. Dumas, his predecessor. Captain Pouchot, of the Bearn regiment, who has long commanded at Niagara, was accomplishing wonders among the Five Nations and Delawares. The Marquis de Vaudreuil admits it, and has frequently told me that he wished him still there. Why did he recall him? Why does he not send him back? Many officers, exempt from suspicion, have proposed to him to send Captain Pouchot back, as being one of the officers best qualified to manage the Indians. I hope, however, our good fortune will remedy all things. Continually occupied with the business entrusted to me, I shall omit no effort to assure its success in as much as in me lies, and I have to congratulate myself on the manner Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Levis and de Bourlamaque second me, not only on all occasions demanding action, but also on those where it becomes necessary to infuse into the depositaries of the King's authority, those resolutions which appear to us the most proper for his service.

I am with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

My Lord,

I have handed to the Marquis de Vaudreuil a map and Memoir on the subject of the French and English frontiers, which I have drawn up on the best informations I have been able to procure during my sojourn at Niagara. I had laid down, in my voyages, the course of the river from Montreal, Lake Ontario as far as Lake Erie; therefore it has an appearance of truth which correctly represents the country and is not contained in any other maps. As I have not been on the English frontier, I laid that down according to their best maps, which I again corrected on such reliable information as I have obtained. It is in sufficient detail, however, to show the interest we ought to take to prevent the English interposing obstacles in the way of the Iroquois and Loups who form a barrier. That country, my Lord, would be well worth being seen by experienced eyes, which has not as yet been the case; the well known Carrying place of Niagara is an evident proof. The most recent accounts thereof describe it as the most rugged of Alps, whilst 'tis only a rise of ground (rideau) a little more elevated than that of Bellevue; below and above are very fine plains, as can be seen on my map.

The detail of Lake Erie, which is entirely unknown; it is, perhaps, [as] navigable for large vessels as Lake Ontario. The resources of those countries, once known, would furnish opportunities of avoiding long routes and expenses, exclusive of enabling us to occupy more more decided points for the security of the country.

If you have the goodness, my Lord, to signify to me that this essay might please you, I shall set about perfecting that work in order to accomplish all the objects which will possibly be required of it.

I hope, by my zeal, to deserve the kindness you have promised to honor me with, my Lord, on the recommendation of M<sup>de</sup> de Meillan. Since our arrival in this country I have had the good fortune to be always pretty usefully employed. I constructed the Frontenac intrenchments, completed Fort Niagara and the siege of Chouaguen. Capt<sup>n</sup> in the Bearn regiment.

Permit me to annex hereunto some Observations adapted to the position of the affairs of this country.

General Observations on the Frontiers of Canada.

[ By Captain POUCHOT. ]

Acadia being, so to speak, a separate portion of the main-land, events may decide its limits or its recovery in toto.

The English must have little inclination to settle the districts North of their Colonies only so far as they are convenient to the sea. They would not settle in the interior of those countries, which are mountainous, cold, consequently of little value unless they could thereby excite our jealousy, which they will not fail doing as much as they will be able; moreover, there are very few Indians in those parts with whom to trade.

The English, once masters of the heights of land, and with posts on Lake St. Sacrament, are in a position to excite continual alarms in the Colony, by being conveniently situated to repair thither in force. But they will attempt to establish in that quarter only posts of war, the country not being fit for cultivation.

The Provinces in their rear, belonging to the Five Nations and Delawares, are very populous.

The outlets they possess by the River des Armes<sup>1</sup> and the Canestio<sup>2</sup> will tempt them always to come and settle on the South shore of Lake Ontario; the country being very fine and fit for cultivation they will make large settlements in it.

Placing the Five Nations and Delawares in their rear, they would be masters of them and would attract the other Nations by their commerce.

We should soon be driven from our isolated posts.

The outlets of the English on the Beautiful river furnish nearly the same reasons. 'Tis only to be observed that fewer Indians are among them than among us, and that their road is long and difficult, but they would compensate themselves in return by profitable settlements.

The lower parts are not so dangerously menaced at present; being at a great distance from their settlements, the English can throw only war posts in advance there. We have equal advantage to dislodge them, either from Canada or from Louisiana.

Montreal, 18th April, 1758.

My Lord,

I have the honor to address you a Bulletin of the most remarkable occurrences in our continent since the sailing of the last ships. The operations of our campaign are dependent on too many circumstances to admit of any prognostications on that point. The prompt arrival of the provisions required from France is the most interesting to us. If the soldier received horse flesh at Prague, he at least always had a pound and a half of bread; he has learned to live here on half a pound, and bore with it the more patiently, knowing that his superiors, who indeed, for money, have never wanted for any food except bread, were reduced to a quarter of a pound per day.

Were nothing else required than to be continually occupied with the business entrusted to me, to enforce its success, I would dare answer for it, my Lord. I am even well seconded by Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Levis and de Bourlamaque, either in executing it or in determining the decisions to be adopted by the depositories of the King's authority. Mine is merely subordinate, and I possess only the means of representation, adding thereto a little more or a little less address to prevail on my superior to appreciate what I consider useful for the service, and what knowledge I possess, having had the advantage of serving under your orders. My Lord, the greatest attention is required in this Colony to maintain the Indians in the favorable dispositions our successes have placed them in. The English leave nothing undone to detach them from us. The Governor of Philadelphia<sup>1</sup> has recently showered on the deputies of the Five Nations, Delawares and Chasanonns, carresses, presents, belts and medals; one of the deputies immediately came to inform us thereof, to bring us and to trample under foot the medal he had accepted from the English. Let us prevent them making any progress on us; let us continue to devastate them by our parties; let us not undertake any vast operation, except with prudence and great appearance of success. 'Tis after a check, or what would even only bear some resemblance thereto, that the English would be more eloquent in distributing belts and presents among people naturally giddy and inconstant.

Retain for me and my son your benevolence. Let Count de Gisors<sup>2</sup> be so good as not to forget one of his servants who interests himself particularly in his glory, and sees with satisfaction that worthy son treading in the footsteps of his father. This is all I ask of the one and the other, and to be persuaded of the respect with which I am,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

Bulletin of the Most important Operations during the winter of 1757-8.

Although the rigor of the season and the scarcity of provisions, caused by a bad harvest, have forced us to economise, in order to save wherewith to enable us to wait for the supplies expected from France and more abundant crops, and to oppose any attempts of the enemy, should he wish to operate early, we have harassed him all winter by numerous parties which have succeeded each other continually.

M. de Beletre, Captain of the Colonial troops, burnt in the month of November, 17 leagues from Corlac, a village which was very wealthy in consequence of its trade with the Five Nations; those who escaped the fury of our Indians have been brought, women and children, prisoners, to the number of 150. Several parties of our Indians and also of the Five Nations have been to strike a blow towards the same Corlac, and to burn divers settlements.

M. de Langry, an officer of the Colonial troops, surprised, in the month of February, a detachment of 50 men in the neighborhood of Lydius. M. Wolff, a Lieutenant of the troops from France, has been with the Abenakis to burn some settlements near Massachusouet.

The English have had all winter the design to surprise and bombard Carillon, and have made their appearance before it several times. Captain d'Hebencourt, of the regiment of La Reine, who has been appointed, after the campaign, Commandant of that post, and the garrison have been very alert, and the incursions of the English have always been bootless. Sieur d'Hebencourt being informed that they had a party of 200 men in the field, profited on the 13th of March, by the fortunate arrival, on the preceding evening, of 200 Iroquois or Nepissings from Sault St. Louis and the Lake of the Two Mountains, with Sieur Durantaye and several Colonial Cadets, who were joined by Sieur de Langry, a very intelligent officer, some Lieutenants and sergeants of our battalions, whom zeal alone had induced to march thither. The English detachment, composed of picked men and of 12 officers, under the command of Major Roger, their best partizan, has been totally defeated. The Indians have brought back 146 scalps; few prisoners—merely some to furnish their father with live letters—an expression used by the Indians to designate prisoners. The remainder will have perished of want in the woods. A few, including two officers of Bleknis' regiment,<sup>1</sup> voluntarily surrendered themselves prisoners at our fort at Carillon, at the end of five days, their guide having died the night before. We have lost in that action 8 Indians, and have had 17 wounded; also two Cadets of the Colony and one Canadian. The dead have been covered with great ceremony; presents have been made to the families in the name of the King (the Great Ononchio). The Governor-General will reward the bravery of our Iroquois by a promotion and presentation of some gorgets and medals to those who have distinguished themselves; they will be thereby more encouraged to revenge the loss they have suffered.

We have at present eight small parties in the field. We shall doubtless learn from the prisoners they will take, what are the enemy's movements, which will determine the others in the forepart of May. We cannot doubt that the English, who received some reinforcements this fall, have in North America, with their Highlanders, 23 battalions from Old England, very complete; our forces are greatly inferior to theirs. The courage of our troops and of the Canadians, the assistance of our Indians will make up for numbers.

M. de Boishebert, a Captain of the Colonials, is about setting out with six or seven hundred Acadians, Canadians or Indians, for the River St. John, thence to proceed to Louisbourg, which the English always seem to menace. We are expecting news from the Beautiful river, where the English leave no stone unturned to detach from our alliance the Delawares (Loups) and Chaouinons, Indians who are desolating Virginia and Pennsylvania.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Paulmy.

Montreal, 18th April, 1758.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to write you by way of Isle Royale on the nineteenth and twenty-third February, and tenth of this month. The Marquis de Vaudreuil is dispatching a small vessel to France, by which opportunity I have the honor to address you triplicates of my former letters and duplicates of the last. Their contents will inform you of everything relating to this Colony up to this date.

Since the tenth of April, the date of my last despatch, duplicate whereof is hereunto annexed, we have had some news from Niagara and are in constant expectation of intelligence from the Beautiful river. I notice great efforts on the part of the English to detach some of the Indian Nations from our alliance. I was not without some uneasiness on that head. The Governor of Philadelphia has held a large meeting at which he lavished caresses, belts of wampum, presents, medals and gorgets, exaggerated our want of provision and merchandize. One of the Deputies of the Five Nations who attended that meeting immediately came to inform us of it, and to bring us his medal and gorget. Sieur Chabert, an officer and Interpreter, has been sent to the Five Nations and Delawares with considerable goods, armorers and smiths, whom the King is to maintain in their villages in order to provide for their wants. The negotiations of this officer, who has been brought up among the Indians and adopted by the Five Nations, will it is to be hoped, retain them, and that our good fortune will prevail over the constant and well directed efforts of the English.

M. de Levis transmits to you, my Lord, a very large and very handsome map. The Lake St. Sacrament part ought to be tolerably exact; and so ought the vicinity of Choueguen and Corlar, though he has not been in those parts, his work in this particular is the result of information carefully collected from several Colonial officers and intelligent Indians who have been there and of conversations with recent English prisoners, as to what relates to Lake Erie and the Beautiful river that part can hardly be more exact in ordinary maps. Captain de Pouchot of the Bearn Regiment, has drawn another in which the environs of Niagara, the country of the Five Nations and of the Loups will possibly be laid down with still greater exactitude than in that of Chevalier de Levis. I ought to send it to you from him, but defer doing so until the last ship, because if the map which Chevalier de Levis sends you should happen to be intercepted, that of Sieur Pouchot would serve as a duplicate.

I do not send you any return of the actual condition of our battalions. The loss they have incurred this winter has not been considerable. Discipline is becoming relaxed in spite of my care and severity. The recruits arrived last year are a collection of bad boys. The soldier to be subsisted under actual circumstances, must necessarily be dispersed among the farmers. There he lives in quasi independence, out of sight of officer or sergeant. The Canadian settlements are not contiguous like the houses in the villages of France; they are at a great distance, one from the other. I have had sixteen soldiers belonging to our battalions tried this winter either by the ordinary tribunals or by court martial. Three of them have been shot for desertion, two condemned to the galleys for mutiny against their sergeants; the rest for theft. The Colonial troops have not furnished fewer painful, but necessary examples.

Our troops live in the greatest concord with the Canadians and Indians. Our officers conduct themselves with politeness towards the one and the other, and if there have been any trifling complaints against young officers, I have followed the maxims of our Generals, when we were serving with the Spaniards. The slightest appearance of wrong on the part of our officers is immediately punished with great severity. Our soldiers appear to relish the sojourn in this Colony. Many marriages continue to be contracted; several have taken up lands to clear, without marrying, and without being discharged from military service. I freely facilitated all the arrangements which the political interest of the Colony exacts. We cannot leave here too many soldiers of our battalions; we would carry them back bad for Europe, and shall leave them very good for America.

Thanks to the difficulties I have opposed thereto, we have had but two officers married, Captain de Bellau, in the Guyenne regiment, who has married a daughter of M. de Ramzay, town Major of Quebec, a young lady of condition who will have property, and Lieutenant de la Mitière, of the regiment of Languedoc. He is a young officer who has no property in France; is well liked by the Indians whom he often accompanies on an expedition, and has easily learned the Iroquois. The Marquis de Vaudreuil proposes to transfer him, some day, with his rank, to the Colonial troops.

Captain Dupuy, serving with (exploitant) one of the companies of the Languedoc regiment which are prisoners, died this winter.

I send back to France Lieutenant de Godonecke, of the regiment of Berry, whom I retain in prison since the month of December. He is, without doubt, a bad boy of whom his parents wished to be forever rid by sending him to the Indies.

Sieur de Clairville, who arrived last year to be Lieutenant in the regiment of La Reine, will also go back at the opening of the navigation. He had lost an arm in a glorious manner in a sea fight. As he is a man of condition, who returns only because he could not serve in this Colony with the loss of one arm, I have given him a letter, my Lord, for you, in which I beg you to grant him his retreat to the Invalids. As he is young and well able to serve, I shall be much obliged to you to be pleased afterwards to detach him in order to serve (exploiter) with a company of Invalids. This officer came to America through an ill-directed zeal. Here, more than anywhere else, it is necessary to be well supplied with all one's members to serve as a soldier.

I shall have the honor to propose to you, at the close of the campaign, the names of persons to fill these vacancies.

Will you permit me, my Lord, to inquire whether the experiments have succeeded which were to be tried with the alimentary powder. If not attended by any inconvenience, why not send some of it here. In winter expeditions we could make use of it occasionally for the Canadians and soldiers; for every novelty is difficult of introduction among Indians, who are a superstitious race. Should any misfortune happen to them, they would say 'tis a Medicine they are getting; a term in their language equivalent to charm in ours.

A number of the Upper country Indians, who came last year to the expedition against Fort William Henry, died of the small-pox on their way home. The English had it. This is a real loss to us, and will cost the King considerable in consequence of the expenses it will occasion at the posts to treat them, cover the dead and console the widows. Fortunately, they have always declared, in the different Councils held at Michillimackina, Detroit, &c., that the English had thrown that Medicine on the Indians, which they might have turned aside had they been willing to believe the French General and not plunder the baggage of the English.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.

Montreal, 21st April, 1758.

My Lord,

I spare no pains to break up the negotiations of the English with the Indian Nations that are attached to us. Those of the Five Iroquois Nations whom I have intrusted to give me information of their proceedings, have reported to M. de Noyan, Commandant at Frontenac, Colonel Johnson's message to the said Five Nations, as follows:

"Brothers. You must not expect peace as yet; the King of England wished to make proposals therefor to the King of France, but all the English Lords are opposed to it, saying, 'Now we have discovered the passage of the vessels which are carrying succors from France to Canada; we have captured many of them this year, among others, those which were carrying the despatches of the General to the Court of France; that is the surest means of reducing Canada.'"

To prove to the Indians the truth of these advances, Johnson opened a large store to them, where they, indeed, saw nothing but French goods; he proved still more conclusively to them the reality of the fact, by a number of barrels of Cogniac Brandy which he gave them. He also said to them:

"The General of Canada supposed that he did me serious damage, in taking and pillaging the Palatines and burning their village; killing them and taking them prisoners matters very little to me. The loss we have experienced at Isle Royale affects me more, although we captured three ships which were carrying despatches from your Father to the Court of France. I admit that this does not indemnify us, but we shall blockade the passage so closely this spring that not a single French ship will escape us. I am making arrangements for going to see you all at an early day, with thirty horse loads of goods, for I know you are in great necessity, your Father being unable to relieve you."

Two young Onondagas who are much attached to me, hearing these words, resolved secretly to go and meet Johnson to make him return; they overtook him, and at once accosted him, saying, "Where are you going, brother?" "I am going," answered Johnson, "with these loads of provisions and goods to visit all your villages." "'Tis well; but our gratitude requires of us to forewarn you, that possibly you will fall into the hands of Ononthio, who is coming with a numerous army on your road." "Though that be," replied Johnson, "what care I?" My two faithful Onondagas then said to him, "Brother, you must needs be desirous of dying, or else you do not believe us; once more, return back quick, for we assure you that our Father's scouts were on the River à la Grosse ecorce<sup>1</sup> when we left our village expressly to warn you." Johnson, however cunning he be, was less so than these two Indians; he made them presents and abandoned some kegs of Brandy, which they drank with other Indians who joined them, whilst Johnson was returning home.

I am, with most profound respect,
My Lord,

Your most humble and
Most obedient servant,
VAUDREUIL.

M. Doreil to Marshal de Belle Isle.

Quebec, 30th April, 1758.

My Lord,

The exact and consecutive correspondence of the Marquis de Montcalm greatly abridges mine. He reports to you the situation of this Colony; the military events and different details of the service. I am therefore saved from doing so. Yet I do not believe, my Lord, that I am interdicted from the honor of writing to you by every opportunity. Here is one which I profit by. 'Tis a small vessel that the contractor is sending to France. I forward the duplicate of my letter by way of Louisbourg.

The navigation is hardly open. The winter has been long and the more severe, as the scarcity has always been on the increase. At Quebec we have been limited, since last summer, to four ounces of bread a day. The people have been restricted to two ounces since the first of this month. The troops dispersed among the farmers throughout the country, have suffered, but less than those in the towns. 'Tis to be feared that at the end of such misery, we shall have to suffer from serious sickness. Conceive, my Lord, with what impatience we are waiting for the first ships from Europe. We hope the Court will have adopted such measures as the circumstances require, for the conveyance of powerful succor to us. We are all crushed by the horrible dearness of all sorts of articles. What was worth 20<sup>s</sup> when we arrived, now brings a pistole.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Montcalm, de Levis, de Bourlamaque, de Montreuil and I, who by position, are obliged to live decently, and with establishments proportioned to our rank, have been all necessitated to demand an advance of nearly one year's pay.

I have estimated, pretty closely, the strength of our battalions on the 1st of May, 1758, when on sending you, my Lord, the return of 1st S<sup>ber</sup>, 1757, I had the honor to observe to you that I calculated that about 500 men would be wanting to complete them according to their ancient footing. Here is the memorandum of their actual number of effectives :

La Reyne, .....	465	} .... 3,781
La Sarre, .....	499
Royal Rousillon, .....	508
Languedoc, .....	474
Guienne, .....	508
Berry, 2 nd batt <sup>n</sup> 409; 3 rd batt <sup>n</sup> 402, .....	811	}
Bearn, .....	516

The complete ought to 4,230; it consequently lacks 449 men, and 1,250 would be required to carry the companies of the six battalions which first arrived to 50 men.

We have actually only one hundred men in the hospitals of Quebec, Montreal and Three Rivers. This number will, 'tis to be feared, be increased on the return of the fine weather.

The Marquis de Montcalm remained here until the 20th of February. I followed him immediately to Montreal, whence I am returned about a month. He doubtless informs you, my Lord, that the recruits and new companies of La Reine and Languedoc arrived last year, are a collection of very bad boys who have infected the battalions. Up to this time, nearly twenty soldiers have been tried either by Court-Martial or the ordinary tribunals, and a prodigious number punished by discipline, particularly corporal. We had had but one instance of such during the first two years. Those men are, besides, but very little to be relied on in war. The Colonial troops have likewise been obliged to have many of those new comers punished. We hope, my Lord, that the recruits this year, if any be sent, will be better. Our battalions, reduced by the loss of veteran soldiers, stand in great need of them.

Surgeon-Major Arnoux is making his arrangements for the field hospital of the army. I reckon on everything being prepared within eight days. I shall then dispatch it, in order to be ready beforehand at Carillon for the troops; they can hardly be put in motion until after the first supplies of provisions will have arrived. 'Tis to be hoped we shall soon hail the arrival of some vessels.

Assistant Staff-Surgeon Badelard, who arrived last year, and whom I have attached to the second battalion of Berry, has behaved very ill up to the present time. I should have done justice had I suspended him and struck his name off the King's staff. The Marquis de Montcalm has even requested me to do so, on the just complaints presented to him by the officers of that battalion. I have neither [disapproved nor] approved his conduct; let him make the campaign, after which we shall order him back to France, should he not alter his conduct. I have recently been obliged to consign him to the quarters occupied by the battalion to which he is attached. We have still Sieur Emery, who does not behave any better than he has hitherto done. All the rest behave tolerably well, especially Sieur Dezés. I have reason to congratulate myself, my Lord, that I have made him Assistant Staff-Surgeon, subject to your pleasure. I look for its approval.

Although I am persuaded that M. de Montcalm reports to you our minor successes this winter, I do not consider that I can, in duty, my Lord, omit saying a word thereupon. In general, everything has succeeded with us and has been unfortunate for our enemies.

Last January, Captain Robert Roger, a great partisan, came roving in the neighborhood of Carillon with a detachment of 70 men. The artillery of the fort drove him away pretty quick. In his retreat he burnt a pile of timber and charcoal, took a wood-cutter prisoner (who afterwards escaped from him), and killed 18 oxen or cows, which he could not remove; they were found in the woods and have served to subsist the garrison. He had caused to be attached to the head of one of the oxen a letter addressed to the Commandant of the fort, the contents whereof were an ill-timed and very low piece of braggadocio.

Some days after, one of our detachments, composed of Canadians and Indians, commanded by M. de Langy, a Colonial officer, defeated in the vicinity of the English Fort Lydius or Bouart,<sup>1</sup> a party of 50 rangers; killed 23, whose scalps were brought in by the Indians, and took 5 prisoners. 'Tis almost certain that the remainder, dispersed through the woods, have perished of hunger or of wounds received in the action.

Towards the end of February, this same officer, at the head of another detachment of Canadians and Indians, again repaired to the environs of Fort Edward. The Indians being unwilling to continue the proposed route, his expedition was reduced to making one single prisoner; but 3 or 4 Indians who remained behind, fell in with a convoy of 30 sleighs loaded with provisions, which they plundered and dispersed, taking 4 scalps. They would have had greater success, had one of them not been dangerously wounded.

March 13. Robert Roger, the partisan, returning with 200 men to try and strike a blow in the environs of Carillon, was discovered by some Indians sent out by M. d'hebecourt, who came in all haste to advise him of the fact. This officer immediately dispatched a detachment of 200 Canadians and Indians who had arrived the evening before from Montreal. This detachment stopped Rogers' march and utterly defeated him. The Indians brought back 144 scalps and some prisoners; among the latter were two officers. There were 12 in the party. Robert escaped almost naked, with some fifteen men and two officers. There is reason to presume that he will have perished of cold and hunger in the woods, inasmuch as three days subsequently, the two officers, after having wandered in a vain effort to escape, came to surrender themselves prisoners at Carillon, having left two men dead of fatigue and hunger within two leagues of that place. This action has been brisk, and our detachment has performed wonders in it. We have had two Cadets dangerously wounded, four Indians killed and 16 wounded.

We continue constantly to have some detachments since that time in the field; one commanded by M. Wolfe, a partisan officer of the land forces, has burnt some houses towards Orange, and set out again afterwards. Another has also burnt some houses and taken scalps in the vicinity of Corlard; this has led 80 Iroquois belonging to our mission of La Presentation to go out in the same direction.

Everything is in a favorable condition in the district of Fort Duquesne and the Beautiful river.

The English are heaping presents on the Iroquois of the Five Nations, in order to endeavor to gain them over; they have not succeeded up to the present time.

You perceive, my Lord, that notwithstanding the scarcity, the King's arms continue to be sustained here with advantage. I send up prayers for the future and for a glorious and early peace.

Most obedient servant,

Lieutenant de Clairville of the Regiment of La Reyne, who arrived last year, and M. de Godonnesche, sous-lieutenant in the Regiment of Berry, return to France in the ship which bears this letter. They are sent back for different cause, of which the Marquis de Montcalm doubtless has the honor to inform you.

M. Daine to Marshal de Belle Île.

(Quebec), 19th May, 1758.

My Lord,

Nothing is more melancholy or more afflicting than the actual condition of this Colony, after having passed a part of last autumn and winter on a quarter of a pound of bread per person a day, we are reduced, these six weeks past, to two ounces. This country has subsisted, up to the present time, only by the wise and prudent economy of our Intendant, but all resources are exhausted and we are on the eve of the most cruel famine, unless the succors which we are expecting from our monarch's bounty and liberality arrive within fifteen days at farthest.

I am at a loss for terms to describe our misfortunes. The supply of animals is beginning to fail; the butchers cannot furnish a quarter of the beef necessary for the subsistence of the inhabitants of this town, though they pay an exorbitant price for it; without fowls, vegetables, mutton or veal, we are on the eve of dying of hunger.

To make up for the want of bread, beef and other necessities of life, our Intendant has ordered 12 or 1500 horses to be purchased; these he has had distributed among the poor of this town at a rate much below what they cost the King. He is now having distributed among the same poor, a quarter of a pound of pork, and half a pound of cod fish a day, but that cannot last long. The mechanics, artisans and day-laborers exhausted by hunger, absolutely cannot work any longer; they are so feeble that 'tis with difficulty they can sustain themselves.

We have not yet any news from Europe, and are ignorant of the projects of the English on this continent. We have learned only by 2 Indians belonging to the Five Nations, who have been to trade with the English near Fort Bull, that Mr. Jeanson, who was there, had told them that we were without provisions and would not receive any succors from France this year, in consequence of the measures adopted by the Court of London to intercept them; that a formidable fleet would blockade the river, and that none of our ships would be able to pass; that they had last fall captured three of them from us richly laden; that as regarded themselves, they enjoyed abundance of everything and were preparing to visit their village for the purpose of conveying rich presents thither, and that the Indians should not want for anything if they would abandon the French.

These two Indians who have been a long time particularly attached to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, fearing that the presents would shake the Nation, represented to Mr. Jeanson the danger he would run by going to their village; that a considerable party was lying in ambush, waiting for him, and that he would be cut to pieces with all his people. This speech made such an impression on the English General, that he no longer thought of making that journey.

Annexed are two small Relations or narratives of the most interesting events that have occurred since the departure of the ships last year. The damage inflicted on the English in horned cattle, sheep and horses, has been greatly exaggerated in the relation of M. de Bellestre's campaign of the 25th November, 1757. Fully one-half of it at least must be deducted. Still greater exaggeration has been committed in the items of furniture, clothing, merchandise and liquors, which are made to amount to fifteen hundred thousand livres; the same is the case in regard to the loss of Indian corn in the Palatine village.

A party of Canadians and Indians, under the command of Sieur Lorimer, junior, a Colonial officer, defeated 40 English, whom the Indians scalped, and took three prisoners near Fort Couary<sup>1</sup> and within 3 @ 4 leagues distance of Corlac; two of these prisoners are officers. They report that they have captured three of our ships of war belonging to Count du Bois de la Môte's fleet; that the King of Prussia has gained 2 battles from the Austrians in the course of the month of November last; that Marshal de Richelieu having caused a portion of the French troops to evacuate the Duchy of Hanover, has gone at the head of 80 or a hundred thousand men to the relief of the Queen of Hungary; that the Parliament of England has not approved the capitulation agreed to by the Duke of Cumberland for the capture of that Duchy; that consequently that Prince resigned all his offices to the King, and that M. de Ligonier<sup>2</sup> has been appointed in his place to the command of the English troops, and finally that the people of that kingdom have demanded the head of the General<sup>3</sup> who superintended the affairs of Isle d'Aix, for not having seized Rochefort, which, 'tis said, was at his mercy, that place not being guarded.

<sup>2</sup> JOHN, 1st Earl of Ligonier, was born in 1679, and entered the service at an early age; he greatly distinguished himself as a soldier under the Duke of Marlborough; rose to be Colonel of the 4th regiment of Horse in 1720; Brigadier-General in 1735; Major-General in 1739. He next served in Germany; was created Knight Banneret on the field of Dettingen in 1742; was appointed Lieutenant-General in 1743; commanded the brigade of Guards, in 1745, at the famous battle of Fontenoy; was taken prisoner at Lauffeldt in 1747, and afterwards created a General, and in 1748, Lieutenant-General of the Ordnance. In 1749, was appointed Colonel of 2d or Queen's Dragoon Guards, and in 1753 Colonel of the Royal Horse Guards Blue. He became Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Great Britain in October, 1757, and was raised to the Irish Peerage by the title of Viscount Ligonier of Enniskillen; in November following, was appointed Colonel of the 1st Foot Guards, Master-General of the Ordnance, and created Field-Marshal. He was advanced to the dignity of an English Baron in 1763, and in 1766, when he ceased to be Commander-in-Chief, was made an English Earl, with a pension of £1500 for life. He died in 1770, at the age of 91. A monument in Westminster Abbey records the various actions in which he bore a distinguished part. Chatham Correspondence. — Eo.

<sup>3</sup> Sir JOHN MORDAUNT, K. B., was Colonel of the 47th regiment of Foot in 1741, and of the 18th Royal Irish in 1742; became Major-General, and Colonel of the 2d Light Dragoons, in 1747; Lieutenant-General in 1748; Colonel of the 4th regiment of Horse in July, 1749, and in November following was transferred to the 10th Dragoons. He was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the expedition against Rochefort, in 1757, and being unsuccessful was tried by a court-martial and acquitted. He became a General in the Army in 1770. Army Lists; Beatson. He represented Cokermonth in the House of Commons; was Governor of Sheerness until 1779, and Governor of Berwick from that time until his death in 1780.

19 May. We are still without any news from Europe, although the wind be from the North-east, which is very favorable for the entrance of vessels from France into this port.

Our situation becomes more and more unfortunate and we are actually, my Lord, on the eve of perishing of hunger. Bread will cease to be furnished to the public on the first of June.

I forgot to inform you, my Lord, that the same prisoners have stated that there were four ships of war and one frigate at Alifax, which were about sailing in the beginning of March on a cruise at the mouth of the River St. Lawrence and to intercept the succors we are expecting. This news has appeared to me undeserving of any attention, because it is impossible to dispatch any vessels from that port at that season. We have every reason to think that the succors we are awaiting for the subsistence of this Colony, are retarded only because the Court has been obliged to arm some ships of war as a convoy. This is a necessary precaution, without which none, 'tis to be feared, would be received.

19th May. Eight ships have arrived from Bourdeaux under the convoy of the King's frigate La Sirenne; five of these vessels are freighted with flour on the Contractor-General's account; a small English prize loaded with flour has also arrived; the whole amounts to eight thousand barrels or thereabouts. I am unable, my Lord, to express to you the joy diffused by the arrival of these ships, among the inhabitants of this town; they are at length reassured of their fate. We are in hourly expectation of four others which sailed with these.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil was impatiently expecting this relief, in order to put his plans into execution.

We learn this moment from Louisbourg that M. de Boissier arrived there with five ships of war. Count Desgouttes had gone ahead of him with one vessel and a frigate.

There are now in the roadsteads of Isle Royale eight English cruisers; two others, we are assured, will soon sail from Alifax.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Quebec, 19th May, 1758.

M. d'Hugues to Marshal de Belle Isle.

Carillon, 1st June, 1758.

My Lord,

Though I doubt not that the Engineers of Canada and other persons have sent your Excellency the plan of Fort Carillon, with remarks on its situation and approaches, permit me, I request you, to address you those I have myself made on this frontier, that is, if your occupations, so precious to the State, permit you to sacrifice a moment to the ideas of an officer who, trying to instruct himself, would employ every moment of his life to the advantage of the public weal and render himself worthy of the honor you have done him in granting him your powerful protection. My Lord, in the course of the last campaign I have understood how useful it is to a zealous officer employed in the Colony to be acquainted with some Indian language, so as to be able to lead those people to battle; wherefore I have applied myself, at the commencement of my wintering, to the Iroquois language, which I have learned in a short time, so as to be able to serve as interpreter to that nation for the service of the fort, in which capacity I have acted for several months during the absence of persons commissioned for that duty. Yet, it was out of my power, my Lord, to obtain permission from M. de Vaudreuil to organize during the winter any detachment against the enemy, although that was the sole motive which induced me to ask for leave to winter near the English. I have even been refused permission to march at the head of some Indians, whose confidence I acquired, and who asked me to lead their war party.

I have learned, my Lord, by the example of several and by my own, that there is no anxiety in Canada to employ the French in such a manner as to furnish them occasions for distinguishing themselves, these favors being reserved for the children of the soil.

Fortune could not enter into the views of those who serve in this Colony; therefore have I no other view, my Lord, than to endeavor to procure for myself promotion in military honors. I should be too fortunate were I furnished, on your Lordship's recommendation, with opportunities to afford proofs of my zeal and good will.

Excuse, my Lord, the liberty I have taken to address you this letter and the annexed papers in duplicate, one of the first of May and this of the first of June. The apprehension I feel that none of the letters reached you which I have had the honor to address you last year, has led me to adopt this course.

I have the honor to be with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your Excellency's

Most humble and

Most obedient servant,

D'HUGUES.

Remarks on the Situation of Fort Carillon and its Approaches.

Fort Carillon stands on a rock in a tongue of land formed on the West by the waters of the Falls of Lake St. Sacrament; on the Southwest by the Bay; and from the South to the North it is bounded by the river which leads into Lake Champlain. The fort is to the Southwest of Fort Frederic. 'Tis an irregular square, the defects of which proceed from its having only between forty-five and fifty toises front, instead of 80 or 100 toises at least, which it ought to have been allowed; in that case ground sufficient would have been occupied, whence several gullies whereby the enemy can approach unperceived very near the fort, might be exposed and flanked, and the English barges which would pass the river in front of the fort, might also be more readily discovered and battered at a shorter distance. This would obviate the construction of the redoubt projected to be built for that purpose on the crest of the point Southeast of the fort, which will remedy only one defect at that point and not at the others, where 'twill be necessary to construct for that purpose, besides the ordinary works, advance fortifications which will never be productive of so good an effect and will cost the government as much as the enlargement of this fort; the latter is not impossible, and would afford sufficient room to build all the King's magazine inside, some of which are outside and exposed to be burned by any one man sufficiently bold, whom the enemy may send during the drifting of the snow (poudrieres) so frequent an occurrence in Canada, when a soldier on guard does not see twenty paces in front of him.

The site is very good and susceptible of an excellent fortification; is favorable in so far that the enemy can open the trench only on one side, where, even, he can be deprived of that advantage by removing down to the bare rock the trifle of earth that is lying on it.

The forts in this country are ordinarily constructed only of pieces of timber one over the other, in which cannon effects a practicable breach with more difficulty than in stone; therefore the forts such as are now in Canada have been, and will be taken only by force of shell; this would not be the case had not the bad habit prevailed of building forts too small at points where a place capable of resistance was required. The reason ascribed here for this is, that the troops are not numerous enough to garrison them; this reason could avail in past times only, either because the troops being in fact very few, or a train of artillery never having been seen in the field, 'twas necessary only to protect the place against a surprise.

West of the fort, at a distance of five hundred toises, is a steep hill having several faces; it borders on its left the River of the falls, and on its right forms a very steep curtain which commands a plain of 700 toises that terminates at the Fort Frederic river. The enemy inclined to besiege Carillon must necessarily render himself master of that eminence in order to cover the landing of his artillery in a cove at its foot, being unable to have it brought by land or by another side of the river, as this is the only place along the shore not exposed to the fort. It is this eminence which 'tis essential to secure, and a General desirous of preventing the siege, must have a good intrenchment erected on it, which he must even have continued across the plain as far as the Fort Frederic river. That line, 1000 toises in length, forms the base of the angle on which Carillon stands. This intrenchment of trunks of trees to be felled at the moment they are required, must be fraised with dry branches well lopped and entangled together; the approaches to it ought to be encumbered by that abatis for a distance of fifty toises, observing particularly that no large trunks of trees be piled up at the extremity. Whatever need there be of wood on other occasions, it must be taken from some other quarter, and that side must be left unstripped of the trees which will be found very handy in urgent necessity. This intrenchment, which can be completed in twice twenty-four hours, and well guarded by six thousand men, would cost the party desirous of forcing it, a great many lives, and I even dare assert that, were it well defended, 'twould not be carried by an army three times more numerous than that defending it. This work is already begun on the Northeast of the fort, by an abatis of about 400 toises which was constructed three years ago, when digging a trench (tranché) down to the river of Fort Frederic in order to be able to destroy the bateaux and sloops coming from that direction.

Half a league West of the fort is a considerable Fall of the waters of Lake St. Sacrament. Those going into that lake commence at this point, a portage of half a league to another little fall at the mouth of said lake. This last fall is called "The Portage," and is a very favorable post for an army strong enough to oppose, at all points of disembarkation, the landing of an enemy's force, but also to detach a strong body of troops in order to oppose that portion of this hostile army which may come by land to cover that descent, and cut off all our retreat and communication with Carillon; to effect this it need only occupy the post of the Great Falls; in the case I cite, the post of the portage is, I repeat, a good one, because it is the only place, in approaching by Lake St. Sacrament, where the enemy can land their artillery to convey it, afterwards, to the Great Falls and to bring it thence by water before the fort near that hill I have already mentioned.

Convinced of the absolute necessity that exists in this Colony of solely and permanently securing this frontier, 'tis astonishing that Carillon has not been made a large and strong place, susceptible of a long resistance. I would be still of the opinion to construct, at the mouth of Lake St. Sacrament, in the vicinity of this portage, at the only place where artillery can be landed, a strong redoubt or little fort capable of resisting every attempt to escalade it, on the part of the enemy who, being unable, until after the capture of that little fort, to land any artillery, could not make use of it except at a great distance, and on pontoons which could be sunk, and from which the guns could not be well aimed.

South of Carillon is a large bay extending about nine leagues inland, which conjointly with the waters of the Fall forms, in front of this fort, the river of Fort Frederic. 'Tis by this bay the enemy come often to scout in barges, and some of them are constantly passing, under cover of the night, into Lake Champlain, where they come to intercept our convoys and capture voyageurs' bateaux when passing few in number; six leagues from Carillon, in this bay, is a narrow pass called "The Two Rocks," which furnishes a very advantageous position for another little fort similar to that which might be constructed at the portage.

By means of these two little forts the enemy would be prevented disquieting us in any way in our communication with Montreal, and whenever disposed to come and lay siege to Carillon, would be stopped sufficiently early, in front of these outposts, to afford us time to throw into the principal place all the succors possible and to seize our advantages to enable us to fight his army more safely. To march a train of Artillery in Canada is a matter of considerable trouble and difficulty; therefore this description of redoubts in advance of, and not far from a strong-hold, especially when located at the mouth of a lake and at the only place for landing, would stop, for a long time, an army of this country. By these obstructions, a General might lose the best time of his campaign, which cannot be long in this climate, and would not be able, in one summer, to reach the walls of Montreal as he can do, having Carillon only to take, especially should he arrive there before we had time to oppose him with an army which, in this country, cannot assemble as diligently as in Europe, where there are no contrary winds to be dreaded in ascending lakes and rivers.

Fort Carillon once taken, Fort Frederic would not stand an instant. The latter is built of stone so as to be incapable of resisting four cannot shot, which would be sufficient to tumble it utterly into ruins. All the country in its vicinity is flat and affords, at every step, an easy landing for the largest guns; even firing a few shot at it from pontoons would be enough to render it incapable of answering, it being all shook. An army of observation could not intrench itself under that fort except with earth, a work affording much poorer defence than the intrenchment I have mentioned, and requiring extremely long and fatiguing labor.

Neither would the enemy meet any impediment to his progress; neither portage, nor fort; for I do not regard as such that of Saint John, which consists of upright pickets; so that he would find himself in the centre of the Colony and master of this entire frontier.

The two little out-posts I propose would be of trifling expense, being fortified naturally by their positions, and could not serve against us for the reason that the enemy cannot retain them as they are at too great a distance from his principal posts and too near ours, whence we could march to retake them before the enemy had time to be aware of the fact and to reinforce them. This could be effected even during the winter.

The guarding those posts ought to be confided to the best troops of the Marine who are little inclined to desertion and regard this country as their home; the Commandant ought also pay attention to have the ice, whenever it would begin to take, frequently broken up in the neighborhood of his post to a certain distance. Hostile parties would not risk themselves too much in leaving in their rear, and so near them, these posts whence they could be cut off, whenever they would come to examine the movements making at Carillon, either for the campaign or for winter detachments, attention being constantly paid to the keeping always at these out-posts some Indians who would go out at the first signal made at Carillon, the moment information would be received of any party of the enemy.

News from Carillon.

Sieur Outelas who marched from Carillon at the head of 29 Nepissing and Algonquin Indians, having discovered a party of thirty men, both English and Indians, Loups and Mohawks, after having uttered the cry of attack, fired and immediately buried the hatchet to the haft in the enemy, who, becoming intimidated by the quickness and intrepidity of our people, took to their heels. Four of them have been killed; two English and two Indians, and six taken prisoners, whereof two are Englishmen and four Indians.

The scouts report that the English are making great preparations at Fort Lydius where considerable troops have already arrived.

From the Beautiful river.

Intelligence has been received that everything is going on well around the Beautiful river; that post has had abundance of provisions from Illinois; that our Canadians and Indians are doing wonders there; that they have killed and taken prisoners several English people. A party of Canadians and Indians burnt a house or small fort in those parts. The details of several small adventures which took place there are unknown at this present time.

We have no additional reliable news from the bay and Missilimakinac.

This is a trifling increase of news, my Lord, the ship having been delayed in order to send it, I have unsealed my letter to annex it.

My health is so poor, for a month past, that I can scarcely write. Pardon me, my Lord, if I employ a strange hand.

MONTCALM.

*M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.*Montreal, 10th June, 1758.

My Lord,

I have the honor to transmit you hereunto annexed, copy

1. Of the proposal made on the 22nd March to General Abercromby by the man named Corrivau and some other Canadians, whom the English continue to detain unjustly as prisoners in New England, to be exchanged for Colonel Schuyler and M<sup>r</sup> Stakes.<sup>1</sup>

2. Of the two letters which General Abercromby has written me on the 24th April.
3. Of the letter I have written to him in answer on the 4th of June.
4. Of that which I wrote on the same day to the Commandant of Fort Edward.

By these documents and those I have had the honor to address you previously, you will, my Lord, be perfectly informed of the steps I have taken, which I renew to engage Lord Loudoun and successively General Abercromby to send me back the King's subjects, according to the terms of article 5 of the capitulation of Fort William Henry.

In regard to Mess<sup>rs</sup> Schuyler and Martin, I claim them on their parole of honor and reclaim them from General Abercromby as the King's prisoners. I do not conceal from him how surprised I have been at the ill-conceived pretext to which he had recourse to take upon himself to release those gentlemen from the execution of their parole.

I can assure you, my Lord, that they cannot injure us, as they had it not in their power to acquire any information whilst they remained at Quebec; I thought it my duty to seize this opportunity to afford new proofs of the generous conduct of the French towards the English, whilst the latter are inhumanly treating the French and Canadians who are in their power. I had it also in view to contradict thereby the reports made to Lord Loudoun respecting our scarcity, which ought to have the better succeeded, inasmuch as that General learned nearly at the same time that the Palatine village had been pillaged, laid waste and burnt.

I flatter myself, my Lord, that you will be pleased to obtain his Majesty's approbation of the manner I have treated so important an affair. I essentially adhered to placing the English evidently in the wrong.

Some time will elapse, my Lord, ere I shall receive General Abercromby's answer, in order to learn the decision he will adopt both in regard to article 5 of the capitulation of Fort William Henry and the parole of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Schuyler and Martin. I shall have the honor to report it to you.

I am with most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

Proposals on the part of Captain Jacques Corriveau, Charles Legrand and J. Parent, prisoners of the King of Great Britain, for their exchange in lieu of C<sup>ol</sup> Peter Schuyler and Benjamin Stakes, prisoners of H. M. C. Majesty, abiding on their parole of honor in New-York.

Said Sieur Corriveau for himself and the two other prisoners abovenamed, having importuned his Excellency General Abercromby to be pleased to grant them leave to proceed to Canada, in the hope of effecting the said exchange.

Sieur Corriveau engages on his arrival in Canada to apply to the government and to do all in his power to effect the execution of such exchange, and should it happen that it cannot be done, or that it will not be in his power to release said Schuyler and Stakes from their engagements; in such case, he promises and obliges himself on the faith and word of honor, to repair to the city of Albany on the first of the month of August next.

In witness whereof he has signed this 22 March, 1758, at New-York.

(Signed), JACQUES CORRIVEAU.

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

Copy of the first letter of General Abercromby to the Marquis de Vaudreuil.
New-York, 24th April, 1758.

Sir,

The King having thought fit that the Earl of Loudoun should return to England, and his Majesty having been pleased to honor me with the command of all his forces on this continent, I inform your Excellency that since I assumed the same, Captain Jacques Corriveau, a prisoner of war, has proposed on his own behalf and that of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Legrand and Parent, prisoners like himself in this province, to be exchanged for Colonel Peter Schuyler of the Jersey Militia, and Mr. Benjamin Stakes, both prisoners of his Most Christian Majesty, at present on their parole in this town. I annex to my letter copy of that proposition, and as Sieur Corriveau appears to me very confident that you will be pleased to accept it, I have thought fit to signify to Colonel Schuyler and M<sup>r</sup> Stakes, that it is not necessary for them to return to Canada until I have received your Excellency's answer.

As there is no mention in the preceding proposal of Captain Louis Martin, of the regiment of Royal Artillery, who finds himself in the same position as Captain Schuyler, I propose to your Excellency to exchange him in the same way for Cadets de Fontenay, Lachauvignerie and Laplante, of your troops, the second of whom, I am informed, is son of the Commandant of Fort Machault.

Should your Excellency approve the preceding proposal, you may be certain that immediately after I shall have received your consent, the six officers abovementioned will be released and sent to Carillon under a sufficient escort for their protection.

I have the honor to be, whilst waiting a prompt answer,

Sir,

Your Excellency's

Most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), JAMES ABERCROMBY.

Copy of General Abercrombie's second letter to the Marquis de Vaudreuil,
New-York, 24th April, 1758.

Sir,

Having learned by a letter written to C<sup>t</sup> Havilans<sup>1</sup> that Captain H. Pringle and Mr. Roche, of his Majesty's 27th Regiment of Infantry, who, it was supposed, were killed at the late action

<sup>1</sup> WILLIAM HAVILAND was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of the 27th, or Inniskilling Foot, on the 16th December, 1752, and sailed from New-York with the expedition under Lord Loudon, June 20th, and arrived at Halifax 1st July, 1757, whence he was ordered to New-York in consequence of the siege of Fort William Henry, on Lake George. In 1758, the 27th formed part of the army sent under General Abercrombie against Ticonderoga, and in 1759 accompanied General Amherst up Lakes George and Champlain, in which expedition Colonel Haviland commanded the van, or front column, of the army, composed of the Rangers, Light Infantry and Grenadiers. On the evacuation of Ticonderoga by the French, he was despatched at the head of these troops in pursuit of the retreating enemy. On the army being divided in 1760, Colonel Haviland, now Brigadier-General, was placed in command of the division designed to proceed against Montreal by way of Lake Champlain. This force amounted to 3400 men, and consisted of a part of the 1st Royals, the 17th and 27th Regiments, the Massachusetts Regiments under Colonels Whitcomb and Willard, Colonel Goffe's New Hampshire Regiment, that of Rhode Island under Harris, five companies of Rangers under Rogers, and a detachment of Artillery under Colonel Ord. He set out from Albany between Major Roger and a detachment of H. M. C. Majesty's troops, were living and prisoners in Canada; as they will be in want of money to support themselves whilst prisoners, I request your Excellency to be so good as to have the enclosed letter forwarded to them, which, as you will observe, is nothing more than a letter of credit for their money to the amount of their pay; I flatter myself that you will be pleased to assist them to have it paid, which I shall regard as a particular favor on your part, and be always ready to acknowledge under similar circumstances.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration,

Sir,

Your Excellency's

Most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Copy of the letter written by the Marquis de Vaudreuil to General Abercromby, Commander of all his Britannic Majesty's forces in New England.

Montreal, 4th June, 1758.

Sir,

I should have had the honor to answer your Excellency's two letters of the 24th of April, on the receipt thereof, did I not desire to have the pleasure of forwarding to you, at the same time, the enclosed letters, particularly those of Captain Pringle<sup>1</sup> and Lieutenant Roche,<sup>2</sup> officers belonging to H. B. M's 27th Regiment of Infantry. These gentlemen are at Quebec. I lost no time in forwarding to them both the letters you have addressed me for them; they are well treated and are not under the least restraint. I have anticipated, in their regard, everything your Excellency could desire, by furnishing them every assistance, and causing whatever money they needed to be advanced to them. I act by these gentlemen as I have constantly acted towards all those whom the fortune of war has placed in my hands.

I cannot conceal from you, Sir, how much I have been surprised on learning that under the pretext of the proposal submitted to your Excellency by Mess<sup>rs</sup> Coriveau, Legrand and Parant, to be exchanged for Colonel Schuyler, of the Jersey Militia, and Mr. Stakes,<sup>3</sup> your Excellency in the month of June, and sailed from Crown Point on the 11th of August; and after successively reducing the Isle aux Noix, St. Johns, Fort Thérèse, and Chambly, crossed over to Longueuil, and entered Montreal with Amherst in September. On the 9th December following, he was appointed Colonel-Commandant of the 4th battalion of the 60th Royal Americana. In February, 1762, he was senior Brigadier-General at the reduction of the Island of Martinico; was appointed Major-General 10th July, and commanded the 4th brigade at the siege of Havana, in August following. In 1767, he became Colonel of the 45th; Lieutenant-General of the 25th, May, 1772; General in the army, 19th February, 1783, and died in October, 1784. Army Lists; Beaton's Naval and Military Memoirs, III, 161, 225, 263, 363; Knox's Journal, I, 15, 31, 117, 373, 377, 392, 402; II, 267, 332, 334, 339, 393, 394, 451. — Ed.

has released them from the execution of their parole and suspended that of Captain Le Martin of the Royal Artillery, who were to return to Carillon on the 10th of May last, at farthest. I should have never thought that the facility I granted to these three gentlemen would have been attended by such consequences, the rather as supposing that exchange to be feasible, your Excellency might have proposed it to me sooner, or at least, on the 22nd March, the date of Coriveau's proposition; I do not penetrate the views you had entertained in waiting until the 24th April; I am, nevertheless, persuaded that Mess<sup>rs</sup> Schuyler and Martin, as well as Mr. Stakes would not have failed, for an instant, in their parole, unless your Excellency had interfered.

As for the rest, Sir, the exchange you propose to me is so little admissible that Sieur Coriveau, Sieur de Fontenay and all the other French, Canadian and Indian prisoners taken on land, from the time your nation commenced the war in North America up to the 9th of August of last year, entirely recovered, from that very day, their liberty, according to the terms of Article 5 of the Capitulation of Fort William Henry.

Now, Corivau and the other prisoners in the same category as he, had no other demand to make your Excellency than to be sent back. Such was the course they ought to have pursued unless they have had no knowledge of the surrender and capitulation of Fort William Henry.

That capitulation was made when your Excellency was commanding in chief in New England. Therefore, you could not plead ignorance of it, especially as it has been generally known to your troops and your Colonists; it has, moreover, made noise enough by the generosity and humanity, of which my nation had at that moment afforded to yours such sensible proofs.

Meanwhile, Sir, as the letters you have done me the honor to write me, would justify the opinion that your nation wishes to act on principles directly contrary to that capitulation, I have the honor to transmit you annexed, copy of:

1st That Capitulation.

2nd The letter I wrote Lord Loudoun on the 2nd September.

4th The letter I wrote Lord Loudoun on the 22nd October.

5th That I wrote on the same day to the Commandant of Fort Edward.

6th The letter Lord Loudoun wrote me on the 8th November.

7th The letter I wrote in answer to Lord Loudoun the 18th January.

8th The letter I wrote on the same day to the Commandant of Fort Edward.

9th The letter the Commandant of Fort Edward wrote me on the 17th of February.

All these documents, Sir, have probably been communicated to you by Lord Loudoun; however that be, the copies I have the honor to transmit you, will leave your Excellency no explanation to ask of me, nor (permit me to add) any pretext for eluding the restoration of the King, my master's, subjects whom your nation unjustly detains, in contempt of the rules of war and of the law of nations.

To avoid repetition, I renew to you, Sir, the letters I wrote to Lord Loudoun, particularly that of the 15th of January, in its entire contents; I beg your Excellency to be so good as give it your most serious attention.

After that, I should consider it superfluous to summon you to send back the subjects of the King, my master; it rests with you, Sir, to fulfil, without delay, your nation's engagements, in such a manner as to prove to me that not a single one of those subjects remains in any part of New England.

It also rests with your Excellency to send off at the same time M<sup>r</sup> Schuyler with those he has carried with him, M<sup>r</sup> Stakes and M<sup>r</sup> Martin. I summon these gentlemen on their parole. The leave I had granted them having expired, I reclaim them of your Excellency as prisoners of the King my master, and I request you to enjoin them immediately to depart.

We are now, Sir, at the opening of the campaign; the satisfaction I demand on just grounds is of the greatest importance to your nation; you could not consider it strange should your conduct regulate my ulterior proceedings, but I shall continue, agreeably to the intentions of the King my master, to use my best efforts so that we may on both sides, carry on hostilities with humanity, and observe, as in Europe, the rules of public law as far as the necessity in which we are mutually placed to make use of Indians, will permit us.

In regard to other exchanges, I shall not reply to your Excellency's propositions until you have executed Article 5 of the Capitulation of Fort William Henry.

Permit me, Sir, to recommend to you the small number of French and Canadians who are in your power since the 9th of August last; I demand of your Excellency for them, the same treatment and comfort which the English in my hands receive and are enjoying.

I do not ask your good graces in favor of all the other prisoners captured previous to the 9th August, because I reckon confidently on their being sent back.

Permit me, Sir, to enclose divers letters herein and request you to be graciously pleased to have them forwarded to their address. I hope they will be more fortunate than those I enclosed to Lord Londoun, which I have not the least doubt have not been delivered, inasmuch as Sieurs de Fontenay and Corivau do not acknowledge to me the receipt of those I had written them.

I shall be always highly flattered, Sir, by a correspondence with your Excellency, and in proving to you that I have the honor to be with the greatest consideration,

Sir,

Copy.

Copy of the letter written to the Commandant of Fort Edward by the Marquis de Vaudreuil.

Montreal, 5th June, 1758.

Sir,

I have the honor of sending to your address herewith a most important package containing my despatches for his Excellency, General Abercromby. I request you, Sir, to have the goodness to forward them to him with the greatest possible dispatch, and to transmit his answer to me in like manner to Fort Carillon.

I am fully persuaded, Sir, that you will extend to the officer who carries my letter, the attention due to his rank, and that you will adopt the most careful measures to assure his return to Carillon, by furnishing him a suitable escort, so that he may be protected against all insult from parties and detachments of Indians whom you employ.

My orders to this officer in going to you are, to proceed by the most frequented route, not to leave it and to have the English flag displayed. You will have the goodness to give orders on your side, to the officer you will detach to bring me General Abercromby's answer, not to turn from the most ordinary route, and to have a French flag hoisted; you may be convinced that he will be well received and sent back to you under a good and safe guard.

If you have letters for any of the English in my hands, you can forward them enclosed to me, and it will afford me a pleasure to have them delivered.

I have the honor to be most sincerely,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. Doreil to Marshal de Belle Isle.

Quebec, 16th June, 1758.

My Lord,

Since the letter I have had the honor to write you on the 16th of last month, a frigate of war and 13 merchantmen arrived here, bringing about twelve thousand barrels of flour. This supply, though very trifling in comparison with the vastness of our wants, has enabled the Marquis de Vaudreuil to order the troops to open the campaign. Since the departure of the battalion of La Reyne, which could no longer be victualled in the town of Quebec, the three of Languedoc and Berry who were quartered among the farmers in the country, whom they were exhausting, have been ordered to march. The four which have wintered in the Montreal government are also in motion. The camp of the army is to be formed at Carillon, on the Lake St. Sacrament frontier. M. de Bourlamaque left Montreal on the 12th, for the purpose of forming and taking the command of it until the arrival of the Marquis de Montcalm, who is to start from Montreal on the 24th. That general officer doubtless informs you, my Lord, of the plan of the campaign, with the details whereof I shall not trouble you. His position will be critical; men and means will be few, and if the reports of prisoners are to be credited, those of the enemy will be considerable. Far from being able to act offensively on that frontier, I shall consider the campaign very brilliant if we are able to maintain our position.

A considerable detachment, which is to proceed by Lake Ontario and the country of the Five Iroquois Nations, to try and prevail on these Indians to take up the hatchet and attack the English in the direction of Corlar, will indeed cause a diversion which will possibly be of use, but 'twill weaken considerably the main army of Carillon, which, according to my feeble understanding, is the most important object. This detachment will be under the orders of Chevalier de Levis, under whom are to be M. de Rigaud, a deputy Governor, brother of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, M. de Longueuil, another deputy Governor, and Lieutenant-Colonel de Senezergues, commanding the battalion of La Sarre. It is to consist of 400 picked infantry, 400 Colonials, 800 Canadians and a large number of Indians. Perhaps it would have accomplished the proposed object equally well, had it been only half as strong. The main army of Carillon, where the enemy can strike a heavy blow, would have been so much the stronger. In spite of my fears, I hope everything from the Marquis de Montcalm's prudence and great talents; he will be efficiently seconded by M. de Bourlamaque, an officer of high distinction.

The twelve thousand barrels of flour which have arrived in no wise relieve the scarcity. They enable us only to march to oppose the enemy's plans; this is the most essential point. Of 36 ships that sailed for Bourdeaux in 3 divisions, 24 are missing, which were all freighted with provisions and other necessary supplies. Not a single vessel has as yet made its appearance from Rochelle, whence many are expected; neither from Bayonne nor Marseilles, from which ports several had sailed. The sea swarms with English privateers, and we have not one. These privateers are supported by men-of-war, and there is hardly a frigate to escort twelve of our merchantmen. All this affords every reason to believe that we shall be worse off the next winter than the last. To crown the misfortune, this year's harvest cannot fail to be bad. Little has been sown for want of seed; and sowing was scarcely completed when the land was inundated with rain, which has continued nearly a month. It is since cold, and now freezes at night so hard as entirely to destroy all the vegetables, which are, so to speak, the sole resource of the people who, since a year, are in want of bread. This, my Lord, is a situation the more cruel, as it is not exaggerated; the result is an advance of prices so horrible as to entail suffering on the most comfortable. We are all in the same category.

Up to this date, only seventy-five recruits have arrived; the Marquis de Vaudrenil has ordered these and such as will still arrive, to be divided half and half with the Marine. The companies of that corps had, nevertheless, been completed last year. He is master. The Marquis de Montcalm and I have not received any order as to the destination of those recruits. We would require more than 1200 men to complete our eight battalions according to the ancient footing, and to bring the companies of the six that arrived first, up to 50. I have had the honor, my Lord, to demonstrate this to you by my previous letters of this year, though I had already done so in those of last year.

Ensign de Boubert of the regiment of La Reyne, who I had the honor to inform you in my letter of the 16th of last May, was detained in prison in this town by M. de Montcalm's order, and is to be sent back to France, cannot be put on board the frigate of war which carries this despatch. I shall have him forwarded by another vessel and as soon as possible.

M. de Rosmorduc, a gentleman of Brittany, Captain en second in the regiment of Bearn, has obtained permission to return to France to attend to some family affairs absolutely requiring his presence. His eldest brother is dead and left him possessor of an income of twelve thousand livres. A marriage long concluded on is, also, in question. The Cross of St. Louis has been accorded to this officer two years ago, although it has not yet arrived and he be not received, he flatters himself that his return to France will not deprive him of that favor, the rather as it is not his intention to continue in the army.

Since the events whereof I have had the honor to render you an account, my Lord, in my despatches of the 26 February, 30 April and 16 May, we have continued to have small parties out, which took some scalps and prisoners; but some of the enemy's detachments made their appearance on our Lake St. Sacrament frontier, and have killed some of our men. The Upper countries are pretty well off as regards the scarcity. Towards the Oyo, our Indians have taken some prisoners and 180 scalps on one single occasion.

I am, with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

20th of June. Since writing my letter, six ships have arrived from France and anchored in the river; they will come up with the first fair wind. They are the Royal fly boat le Rhinoceros, from Rochefort, one of several that started in company; two merchantmen from Bayonne loaded with Indian corn, two merchantmen of Bordeaux and one privateer from the same port armed as a frigate; half munitions of war and half merchandise. All this increases somewhat further our confidence as regards the future.

---

Chevalier de Levis to Marshal de Belle Isle.

Montreal, 17th June, 1758.

My Lord,

The command of a corps of troops about three thousand strong, eight hundred soldiers, including land and marine forces, the remainder Canadians and Indians, which the Marquis de Vaudreuil has just confided to me, has three principal objects.

The first is to induce the Iroquois of the Five Nations to declare themselves; to make them act offensively with me against the English on the Corlac or Mohock river as openly as circumstances will permit.

The second, which appears to me the most essential, is to prevent the reconstruction of Chouaguen and the erection of the different forts they propose to fortify on the rivers thereabouts, to accomplish their ends, according to the advices we have of the movements that are making in the direction of the height of land.

The third is to make a strong diversion towards Corlac or Skenectady, whilst the Marquis de Montcalm will proceed with the greatest body of our forces towards Lake St. Sacrament.

My mission is delicate, important, political and military.

I am menaced by an infinitude of obstacles which I shall have to surmount both for food, having only two months' flour and fat, being unable to carry either bread or biscuit, not even tents to cover us; and also, in consequence of the opposition we shall experience from the Iroquois partisans of the English.

I am accompanied by Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Rigaud, Longueuil and Senezergues, the Commander of the battalion of La Sarre, and Abbé Picquet who has considerable influence among those Nations. I hope, by this help, my good will and my zeal for the King's service, to surmount whatever difficulties will offer.

The Marquis de Montcalm will leave Montreal for Carillon between the 20th and 25th of this month, and I, for my destination, between the 25th and 30th. My detachment will be entirely mustered only at the mouth of Lake Ontario where the Marquis de Vaudreuil has fixed the rendezvous for the Indians of the Upper country.

I do not enter into any detail of occurrences in this Colony, knowing that the Marquis de Montcalm does not leave you in ignorance. On my return from the campaign, I shall have the honor to inform and render you a faithful account of everything.

I have the honor to be with respect, My Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

CHEV: de LEVIS.

Memoir on Fort Carillon, by M. de Pont le Roy, Engineer-in-Chief.

This fort is built on a rock on the left bank of the River of the Falls, commanding its outlet into the River St. Frederic as well as that of the head of the bay.

It is an irregular square, the long sides of which are fifty-four toises of exterior Polygon ; the small twenty-nine. Its revetement consists of squared pieces of oak laid one on the other, bound by traversines fastened to corps morts; its periphery is pierced with embrasures lined with oak timber and directed towards different points of the exterior ground. Only one or two guns can be opposed from the fort against all the batteries constructed by the enemy.

The ramparts are but thirteen or fourteen feet wide, and the platforms consequently so short that the recoil at each discharge makes the gun run off. Should one be dismounted, it becomes necessary to fire those next it, in order to convey another there.

The bastions are casemated and serve for the bakery, cistern, powder magazine and provisions. The casemate under the curtain of the entrance, which may serve to lodge the garrison, is only twelve feet wide by six high, extremely damp, the roof consisting only of beams laid side by side, covered with four or five feet of earth.

The place of arms is only eighteen toises long by nine wide.

The foundation is solid rock ; the buildings for civilians are of stone and two stories high. The roof overtops entirely the parapets of the rampart. The shot and shell directed against these buildings, would prevent, by their explosion, the appearance of the garrison either on the place of arms or on the rampart.

The great number of embrasures excludes the use of musketry, the only means, nevertheless, of defending the place.

On the two fronts which are open to attack, a half-moon has been constructed so high that it entirely covers the embrasures of the curtains.

The covert way is not yet commenced, and part of the counterscarps remain to be built, as well as the parapets of the place on two fronts.

The cistern contains only fifteen thousand quarts of water ; it is filled by the conductor from the place of arms, which has no cistern, a circumstance that renders the water muddy and no doubt unwholesome.

The powder magazine being roofed only by beams laid side by side, covered with earth, is always damp in spring and fall ; the powder has to be removed.

All the store-houses and sheds, necessary for the garrison, are outside the place, encircled by a palisade.

From this description 'twill be seen how little susceptible of defence is this fort ; yet, 'tis the only work that covers Lake Champlain and, consequently, the Colony. Were I entrusted with the siege of it, I should require only six mortars and two cannon.

The above document was written in cipher. — Ed.

Narrative of Occurrences on the Frontier of Lake St. Sacrament, from the 30th June to the 10th July, inclusive. [By Adjutant Malartic.]

Paris Doc. : XV., 25. The want of provisions arresting all the Marquis de Vaudreuil's projects, the troops could not proceed to Carillon until from the 20th to the 30th of June. The Marquis de Montcalm arrived there on that day with the regiment of Bearn. The other seven regiments had landed there some days before. Chevalier de Levis had remained at Montreal with a considerable body, in order to go and endeavor to decide the five Nations, and thence to pass on an important expedition. M. de Bourlamaque, who commanded on the frontier since the 10th of June, had information certain that the English were concentrating an army of 25,000 men between Fort Lydius and old Fort George; that they had made an immense collection of provisions and ammunition; that they had a considerable train of artillery and whatever is necessary for a vast enterprise. This information appeared confirmed by the detention of Sieur Vols and a detachment accompanying him, when carrying despatches to the English General commanding the frontier.

1st July. The Marquis de Montcalm dispatched M. de Bourlamaque at day-break, with the regiments of La Reine, Guyenne and Bearn, to occupy the head of the Portage; he proceeded himself with those of La Sarre, R. Rousillon, Languedoc and the second battalion of Berri to the Falls, on both sides of which he encamped, and left the third battalion of Berri at Carillon, to guard the fort. The troops established their camp, and carried their baggage. Some Indians who came in from scouting, said the English were making a road which joined that of the Mohawks behind the mountains. M. de Langy, who had been farther than they, assures the contrary. At 7 o'clock a detachment of 30 men was embarked on board two barges, to cruise on the lake.

2nd At five o'clock in the morning two musket shots were heard, followed by the cries of Indians, which caused the regiments to seize their arms, and they were ready to proceed forward when the captain of the guard sent word that M. de Massdac, his lieutenant, who had been sent out with a picket of six men, being in search of his hunting knife, and having discovered a feather, promptly retired behind a tree which saved him from a shot fired at him by an Indian, who was ready to pounce upon him tomahawk in hand, when he returned the fire, which the Indian evaded by falling upon the ground, who then fled only when the officer had cried out, Amoi, volontaires! M. de Bourlamaque went to reconnoitre the mountains bordering on the left flank of the camp; ammunition was carted, and a company of 24 volunteers by battalion was organized under the command, at the Portage, of M. de Bernard, Captain in the regiment of Bearn, and, at the Falls, by M. Duprat, Captain of the regiment of La Sarre.

3rd The scouting barge discovered nothing; the troops went in the night to Carillon for provisions. Timber and planks were collected to build a bake-house, and a detachment of 48 men, soldiers of the Marine or Militia, arrived under the orders of M. de Raymond. M. Bourlamaque encamped some twenty Indians in advance; a drunken Abenaki killed one of his comrades and fled.

4th Transported some things; M. de Bernard went scouting with a part of his company on the right shore of the lake to within 5 leagues of the camp, whence he returned without having seen any trail of the enemy. Worked at an intrenchment at the head of the bridge which is over the little rapid. The Marquis de Montcalm came to visit the camp and went back in an hour after. M. de Raymond joined us with his detachment, and was posted on the border of the rapid. At 7 o'clock in the evening M. de Langy embarked with 178 volunteers to reconnoitre the enemy's movements.

5th Service as usual. Transported the artillery furniture; began baking in the three ovens. At two o'clock in the afternoon, heard a shot from the mountain to the left of the Bearn camp, and a white flag was seen hoisted and lowered, which is the signal furnished to the Lieutenant who was detached thither, signifying that he discovers some barges or bateaux on the lake. One hour afterwards, a part of M. de Langy's detachment returned to report that, having started in the morning from the Bay of Ganaouské, he had been seen from Fort George, whence 60 barges were sent in pursuit, which followed pretty closely for awhile and then fell off; that Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Langy and La Roche had remained with their canoe three leagues from this to watch them. M. de Bourlamaque immediately detached Captain de Trepezec, of the Bearn regiment, with three pickets of 51 men each, some volunteers and Militia, the whole numbering 300, to the Bald mountain to observe the enemy's movements and to oppose their landing. M. de Langy, who arrived at the moment, assured that the enemy was approaching close after him. Captain de Germain, of the regiment of La Reine, was sent at 5 o'clock with three pickets between the mountains and the lake to support our advanced guards and to prevent the enemy establishing themselves there. All our troops had orders to be on the alert, and ready at the first call.

On the 6th, at one o'clock in the morning, a dozen shots were heard in the direction of our advanced posts. The brigade rushed to arms; a quarter of an hour afterwards, it received orders to dismiss. We learned that the English had fired on a corporal and the relief; that they had collared the corporal and one of the sentinels, supposing them prisoners, but the latter had freed themselves, repulsing them with the bayonet, and that the shots the others had fired, forced them to retire. At daylight the flag was seen to be frequently lowered and hoisted; many barges were discovered crossing from the north to the south and appearing in search of a place fit for landing. The scouting barge returned with word that it had perceived over 1,500 of them. At 7 o'clock M. Germain's detachment came back. M. de Bourlamaque gave orders that the baggage be removed, the tents struck, and the march commenced at 8 o'clock. He remained with the rear guard, with the companies of grenadiers and volunteers, in order to receive news from M. de Trepezec. Receiving none, he had some shots fired at the barges which were approaching, and then followed us without our being troubled in our retreat. On arriving at the Falls, the Marquis de Montcalm posted us on the right of the La Sarre brigade at the foot of the heights, withdrew the brigade of R. Rousillon from the right bank, caused the bridges to be broken up and ordered a halt. Sent to Carillon for some bateaux to embark the baggage, which was embarrassing the soldiers. At 3 o'clock M. de Raymond, Mess<sup>rs</sup> St. Ours and Lanodiere passed in front with a detachment of the Marine and Canadians. At four o'clock we heard several shots which we judged were fired at M. de Trepezec's detachment. A quarter of an hour afterwards we saw some soldiers wading, and M. de Trepezec arrive mortally wounded; he told us that he had lost his way through the fault of his guide, and that wishing to reach the Falls, he had got into the midst of a considerable party of the enemy; that after having defended himself some time, 50 or 60 men escaped; that the remainder were killed, taken or drowned. At  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 5 we took up our march to Carillon; at 7, arrived at the entrance of the clearing, where we arranged ourselves in the order of battle, and passed the night in bivouac.

7th The drum beat la generale at daybreak; some soldiers took provisions; the three brigades posted themselves at 7 o'clock at the entrance of the wood where they commenced an abatis at which they vigorously continued the entire day, encouraged by the presence of the Generals. This abatis embraces the whole of the ground between the River of the Falls and the ravine which borders on the reserved timber that stands on the margin of Lake Champlain. At 5 o'clock in the evening, the ground was equally divided between each wheelbarrow; it made 127 paces for each. Permission was given to erect some tents and to boil the soup behind the abatis. We had orders to sleep in bivouac; the guards, to line the abatis, to patrol frequently outside and to keep the fires burning. The troops of the Marine and the Militia were posted at the opening. At 5 and 7 o'clock the detachments designed for the expedition to Korlak, arrived and encamped in the rear of the three brigades together with the volunteers.

8th The generale was beat long before day. M. de Levis arrived with M. de Senezergues. At 5 o'clock, each battalion set to work to strengthen the abatis, 150 paces in front of which the guard were posted, to protect the workmen. At 9 o'clock, a body of troops was discovered on the summit and at the foot of the mountain, on the right of the River of the Falls, whence they were examining our position, and fired a few shots at us. Bernard's volunteers gave them a few shots in answer. Chev. d'Arenes, Lieutenant of that company, had his arm broken on that occasion. Our Generals made a tour of inspection of the abatis, which they found in a pretty good condition and made arrangements for the defence. At  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 12, the regiment of La Reine and Bearo were going to construct some epaulements to protect themselves from the heights, when a heavy firing was heard on the left; a moment after at the centre, and next at the right. The discharge of a cannon from the fort, announcing the arrival of the enemy, brought every man to his post. The companies of grenadiers and guards came in again without losing a single man. The battalions lined the abatis, three deep, having their grenadier companies and pickets in line of battle in their rear, ready to march wherever needed. La Sarre's brigade, commanded by M. de Bourlamaque, responded by some effective firing, to a column that had shewed itself; the R. Rousillon and Guyenne regiments, to two which attacked the centre where the M<sup>te</sup> de Montcalm was posted; and those of La Reine, and Bearo, to a fourth which had an anxiety to attempt the right commanded by Chev. de Levis. Several barges deployed from the river of the Falls, to come and land some people and to turn our left; M. de Poularié with his grenadier company and Bernard's volunteers, went down to the bank of the river to fire at them. A few cannon shot were fired from the fort, which, after sinking two, made the others retreat up the river whence they made no further appearance. The fire was pretty brisk on each side, though a little more active on ours. The attack and defence was sustained with incredible valor. The enemy's columns, though refreshed by the reinforcements they were continually receiving, and often combining to make common efforts, to attempt the right, the centre and the left, were not making any progress and experienced everywhere an obstinate resistance, sustained by the bravery of the troops and the attention of the Generals to send the grenadiers and pickets to the exposed points. Chev. de Levis posted himself apropos with the regiment of La Reine behind that of Guyenne, where the enemy in force was appearing desirous of making an impression; he checked them and sent out some soldiers of the Marine and Militia, who went to fire on the enemy's left flank. At 5 o'clock, the fire began to slacken; some soldiers were allowed to go out who took some prisoners; at 6 o'clock, the enemy made a new attempt with no better success than the first. Perceiving at 7 o'clock that they had not made any progress, they bethought them of a retreat, leaving their best marksmen to cover it. Fatigue and our small numbers, prevented us offering any opposition. Firing was forbidden, because 'twas perceived that the fire we were receiving, proceeded only from a few men in ambush behind some trees, who were waiting for nightfall to retreat. The loss of the enemy is estimated at five or six thousand men, in killed or wounded; and ours at 300, including 38 officers. The M<sup>rs</sup> de Montcalm had wine and beer conveyed to the field of battle, to refresh the troops who stood in great need of it; he and Chev. de Levis passed in front of all the battalions and expressed how pleased they felt at their conduct.

This memorable victory is due to the goodness of the Almighty, who has manifested Himself so often and so visibly the defender of the country; to the prudence of the General's arrangements and their attention in watching the enemy's movements; to the activity generally of all the officers; to the bravery and intrepidity of the soldiers, all of whom have manifested incredible ardor, thinking only of taking good aim, and sighting everything that shewed itself from behind trees or stumps.

The night was spent in cleaning the arms; in raising some epaulments on the left, as a cover from the damage to which we were exposed from the musketry, being seen in reverse. The troops bivouacked through the night, along the abatis, very alert and wishing for the return of the enemy on the morrow.

9th The generale was beat an hour before day; the troops lined the abatis, anxiously waiting the arrival of the enemy. At 5 o'clock some soldiers were sent out, who despatched some of the wounded that wished to defend themselves, and brought within the lines those who did not resist. A very thick smoke was perceived at the Falls, which led to the supposition that the English were abandoning that place, and were occupying themselves only with their retreat. M. de Bernard went scouting with his company, and sent word to the Marquis de Montcalm that on the road to the Falls was an intrenchment which he could set on fire. That General immediately sent him the orders to do so, which he executed at once. Some Indians, who had gone ahead to plunder, came to give notice that the enemy were thinking only of embarking. Buried all our dead. At 8 o'clock in the evening, M. Vols arrived with his detachment, reported to the M<sup>rs</sup> de Montcalm that he found no one at Fort George on his landing, but two leagues from that fort fell, unawares, on a considerable party, commanded by Major-General Lord Daw,<sup>1</sup> who has been killed by M. de Trepezec's detachment, and encamped in a hollow square, with all the barges, bateaux, artillery and ammunition in the centre; that the General had demanded his orders, had shewn him a great deal of civility, and had him forwarded next morning to Fort Lydius, where General Albercrombie received him politely and detained him, telling him that the M<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil's letters required an answer which could not be given him for some days. That he was well aware that he was detained to prevent him coming to inform us of their manœuvres; that the General had asked him news of one of their parties, commanded by Captain Roger, which had met with a misfortune; that on being answered, the General had scolded the Captain very severely, and reproached him with having ran away the moment his troop was engaged; that they had conducted him back to

Fort George, on the assembling of their army there, which he believes consisted of 22 or 25,000 men; that there were nearly 2,000 barges or bateaux, 1,500 of which have been employed in transporting troops, and 500 in coming and going; that this army had been embarked in an instant, and had taken the portage route, marching thither as to a certain conquest; that he had been brought along and when their troops had arrived at the Falls, was taken to the Bald Mountain, where he had been three days, very dissatisfied with the little attention paid to his detachment; that Colonel Johnson arrived the 7th with 400 Indians belonging to the Five Nations or Loups; that a courier was sent off that same day who proclaimed, everywhere, that Cape Breton was taken; that on the 5th at night, he had seen a great number of barges file off, loaded, apparently, with wounded; that the officer who was guarding him, hailed many of them, and discontinued, expressing great regret; that on the morning of the 9th the whole army had, without making much noise, taken up the march to Fort George, whither he was conducted, and having complained of it to the Major-General, the officer in whose hands he was placed, received orders to land him at his canoe, in which he repaired to the Portage and thence here, himself and his detachment exhausted by hunger and fatigue. The troops still bivouacked along the abbati. The prisoners were sent to Montreal. The M<sup>re</sup> de Montcalm dispatched M. de La Roche to the Governor-General to announce to him the retreat of the enemy.

10th Chevalier de Levis went to the Portage with the grenadier companies and pickets; found some intrenchments on both sides of the Falls, at the Portage and the Burnt camp; had 200 barrels of flour brought back; saw a great many which had been thrown into the water, after having had the heads stove in; also considerable other stores. The soldiers and Canadians returned loaded with plunder and with an immense quantity of shoes with their buckles. Had the English buried who were beginning to infect the outside of the abbati. A courier set out for Montreal and a despatch arrived from there by M. de Rigaud from St. John.

The embarkation of the artillery, stores and provisions being completed on the evening of the 4 instant, next morning, at break of day, the tents were struck, and all the troops, amounting to 6367 regulars, officers, light infantry and rangers included, and 9024 provincials, including officers and bateau men, embarked in about 900 bateaux and 135 whale boats, the artillery to cover our landing being mounted on rafts.

At five in the evening reached Sabbath-day point (25 miles down the lake) where we halted till ten, then got under way again, and proceeded to the landing place (leading to the French advanced guard) which we reached early next morning, the 6th.

Upon our arrival, sent out a reconnoitering party; and, having met with no opposition, landed the troops, formed them in four columns, regulars in the centre, and provincials on the flanks, and marched towards the enemy's advanced guard, composed of one battalion, posted in a logged camp, which, upon our approach, they deserted, first setting fire to their tents and destroying everything they could; but as their retreat was very precipitate, they left several things behind which they had not time either to burn or carry off. In this camp we likewise found one prisoner, and a dead man.

The army, in the foregoing order, continued their march through the wood, on the west side, with a design to invest Ticonderoga; but the woods being very thick, impassable with any regularity to such a body of men, and the guides unskilful, the troops were bewildered, and the columns broke, falling in one upon another.

Lord Howe, at the head of the right centre column, supported by the light infantry, being advanced, fell in with a French party, supposed to consist of about 400 regulars, and a few Indians, who had likewise lost themselves in their retreat from the advanced guard; of these our flankers killed a great many, and took 148 prisoners, among whom were five officers and three cadets.

But this small success cost us very dear, not as to the loss of numbers, for we had only two officers killed, but as to the consequence, Lord Howe being the first man that fell in this skirmish; and as he was very deservedly universally beloved and respected throughout the whole army, it is easy to conceive the grief and consternation his untimely fall occasioned; for my part, I cannot help owning, that I felt it most heavily, and lament him as sincerely.

The 7th, the troops being greatly fatigued, by having been one whole night on the water, the following day constantly on foot, and the next night under arms, added to their being in want of provision, having dropped what they brought with them in order to lighten themselves, it was thought most advisable to return to their landing place, which we accordingly did about eight that morning.

About eleven in the forenoon, sent off Lieutenant-Colonel Bradstreet, with the 44th regiment, six companies of the first battalion of Royal Americans, the bateau men and a body of rangers and provincials, to take possession of the saw-mill, within two miles of Ticonderoga, which he soon effected; as the enemy who were posted there, after destroying the mill and breaking down their bridge, had retired sometime before. Lieut. col. Bradstreet having laid another bridge across, and having sent me notice of his being in possession of that ground, I accordingly marched thither with the troops, and we took up our quarters there that night.

The prisoners we had taken being unanimous in their reports, that the French had eight battalions, some Canadians, and Colony troops, in all about 6,000, encamped before their fort, who were intrenching themselves, and throwing up a breast-work, and that they expected a reinforcement of 3,000 Canadians, besides Indians, who had been detached under the command of Mons. de Levy, to make a diversion on the side of the Mohawk river, but upon intelligence of our preparations and near approach, had been repeatedly recalled, and was hourly expected; it was thought most advisable to lose no time in making the attack; wherefore early in the morning of the 8th I sent Mr. Clerk, the engineer, across the river on the opposite side of the fort, in order to reconnoitre the enemy's intrenchments. Upon his return, and favorable reports of the practicability of carrying these works, if attacked before they were finished, it was agreed to storm them that very day: Accordingly the rangers, light infantry, and the right wing of provincials, were ordered immediately to march, and post themselves in a line, out of cannon shot of the intrenchments, their right extending to Lake George, and their flanks, and marched towards the enemy's advanced guard, composed of one battalion, posted in a logged camp, which, upon our approach, they deserted, first setting fire to their tents and destroying everything they could; but as their retreat was very precipitate, they left several things behind which they had not time either to burn or carry off. left to Lake Champlain, in order that the regular troops, destined for the attack of the intrenchments, might form on their rear.

The piquets were to begin the attack, sustained by the grenadiers, and they by the battalions: The whole were ordered to march up briskly, rush upon the enemy's fire, and not to give theirs until they were within the enemy's breast-work.

After these orders issued, the whole army, except what had been left at the landing place to cover and guard the bateaux and whale-boats, and a provincial regiment at the saw-mill, were put in motion and advanced to Ticonderoga, where unfortunately they found the intrenchments not only much stronger than had been represented, and the breast-works at least eight or nine feet higher; but likewise the ground before it covered with felled trees, the branches pointed outwards, which so fatigued and retarded the advancing of the troops that, notwithstanding all their intrepidity and bravery, which I cannot sufficiently commend, we sustained so considerable a loss, without any prospect of better success, that it was no longer prudent to remain before it; it was therefore judged necessary, for the preservation of the remainder of so many brave men, and to prevent a total defeat, that we should make the best retreat possible. Accordingly, after several repeated attacks, which lasted upwards of four hours, under the most disadvantageous circumstances, and, with the loss of 464 regulars killed, 29 missing, 1,117 wounded; and 87 Provincials killed, eight missing, and 239 wounded, officers of both included, I retired to the camp we occupied the night before, with the broken remains of several corps that had accompanied me, sending away all the wounded to the bateaux, about three miles distance; and early the next morning we arrived there ourselves, embarked and reached this camp in the evening of the 9th. Immediately after my return here, I sent the wounded officers and men, that could be moved, to Fort Edward and Albany.

<sup>2</sup> JOHN WRIGHTSON was commissioned Captain 20th April, 1748, and joined the 27th foot 16th December, 1752; he was appointed Major of the 76th, 25th March, 1762, and went on half pay in 1763. He became Lieutenant-Colonel by brevet 25th May, 1772; was appointed Major to Chelsea Hospital in 1775, and died in 1779.

<sup>4</sup> WILLIAM COOKE was commissioned a Lieutenant 22nd January, and joined the 27th on the 27th April, 1756; became Captain-Lieutenant 8th May, 1767, Captain 25th May, 1772, and is dropped in 1777.

<sup>6</sup> JOHN CAMPBELL of Dunerues, Perthshire, was originally a private in the Black Watch. In 1743, he was presented, with Gregor McGregor, to George II. as a specimen of the Highland soldier, and performed at St. James the broadsword exercise and that of the Lochaber axe, before his Majesty and a number of General officers. Each got a gratuity of a guinea, which they gave to the porter at the gate of the palace as they passed out. Mr. Campbell obtained an Ensigny in 1745 for his bravery at the battle of Pontenoy; was promoted to be Captain-Lieutenant, 16th February, 1756, and landed in New-York the following June. He was among the first of the resolute men who forced their way into the work at Ticonderoga, on the 8th July. Stewart's Highlanders, I. 250, 279.

<sup>7</sup> DUNCAN CAMPBELL of Inveraw, having raised a company for the Black Watch, then numbered the 43rd, was commissioned Captain, December 25, 1744; it became the 42nd in 1749; and in December, 1755, Captain Campbell was promoted to the Majority of the regiment. He died of the wounds received at Ticonderoga. Stewart, I., 279; II., Appendix, No. II.

<sup>8</sup> GORDON GRAHAM of Drainie, entered the Black Watch as Ensign, October 25, 1739, and was promoted to a Lieutenantancy 24th June, 1743; served in Flanders and at Fontenoy in 1745; obtained a company August 7, 1747; was at the surrender of Fort William Henry in 1757, and wounded at Ticonderoga. On the death of Major Campbell he succeeded to his commission and made the campaigns of 1759, 1760, under Amherst; served in the West Indies in 1762, and on 9th July of that year became Lieutenant-Colonel of his regiment. He retired from the service 12th December, 1770. Stewart, II., Appendix No. II; Brown's Highland Clans, IV., 139, 159; Beaton's Naval and Military Memoirs, II., 530.

<sup>9</sup> THOMAS GRAHAM of Duchray, entered the 43rd, or Black Watch, as Ensign, June 30, 1741; was promoted to a Lieutenantancy August 6, 1746, and obtained a company February 15, 1756, shortly before the regiment, then the 42nd, came to America. He served in the several campaigns on the northern lakes; was again wounded at the battle of Bushy run, near Pittsburg, in 1763; served in the subsequent campaigns against the Indians, and embarked for Ireland in 1767. He succeeded Major Reid 31st March, 1770, and became Lieutenant-Colonel 12th December following. He retired from the Army December, 1771. Army Lists; Stewart.

<sup>10</sup> JOHN CAMPBELL of Strachur, was appointed Lieutenant in Loudon's Highlanders in June, 1745; served through the Scotch rebellion; made the Campaign in Flanders in 1747, in which year he was promoted to a Captaincy; and went on half pay at the peace of 1748. He was again called on active service in 1756, when he joined the 42nd; and, after recovering from his wounds received at Ticonderoga, was appointed Major of the 17th foot, by General Amherst, 11th July, 1759; was promoted to be Lieutenant-Colonel in the army, February 1762, and commanded his regiment in the expedition against Martinico and Havana. On the 1st of May, 1773, he became Lieutenant-Colonel of the 57th foot, and returned to America at the breaking out of the Revolution; was appointed Major-General 19th February, 1779; Colonel of his regiment 2nd November, 1780, and commanded the British forces in West Florida, where he surrendered Pensacola to the Spaniards, 10th May, 1781; became Lieutenant-General in 1787; General 26th January, 1797, and died in the forepart of the year 1806. Stewart; Beaton; Army Lists.

<sup>5</sup> JAMES GRANT was commissioned Ensign in the 43rd (now the 42nd regiment), November 20th, 1746; Lieutenant 24th January, 1756, and Captain-Lieutenant 28th July, 1760. He left the regiment in 1762, when he was appointed Fort Major of Limerick, and died in 1778. Stewart.

<sup>6</sup> JOHN GRAHAM was the brother of Thomas (number 9, supra, 728); entered the 42nd regiment as Ensign and was promoted to a Lieutenancy 25th January, 1756; became Captain in February, 1762, and was again wounded at Bushy run in 1763; shortly after which, his company having been disbanded, he went on half pay. He rejoined the regiment 26th December, 1765, and is dropped in 1772, having attained the rank of field officer. Stewart, I., 359. Army Lists.

<sup>7</sup> ALEXANDER MCINTOSH was taken from half pay in 1756 and appointed Lieutenant in the 42nd. He was again wounded at Martinico in 1762, and was promoted to a company 24th July of the same year. He went on half pay in 1763 and was not again called on active service until 25th December, 1770, when he was appointed to the 10th regiment then serving in America. Captain McIntosh was killed at the storming of Fort Washington, 16th November, 1776. Army Lists; Beatsen's Naval and Military Memoirs, VI., 61.

<sup>12</sup> CHARLES LEE was a native of Wales and son of a Colonel in the British service. He entered the army early in life; was commissioned Captain in the 44th foot 11th June, 1756; Major of the 103rd, or Volunteer Hunters, 28th October, 1761, and in 1762 served, with the local rank of Colonel, in the auxiliary British force sent to Portugal, where he distinguished himself. Beatsen, III., 324; Entick, V., 428. He went on half pay at the peace and entered the Polish service; became Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel in May, 1772, and after rambling all over Europe, came to America in 1773 and settled in Virginia; resigned his commission in 1775, when he was appointed by Congress Major-General in the Continental Army. He served through the war of the Revolution until 1780 when, in consequence of some misunderstanding, he retired from the service; returned to his plantation in Virginia; sold his farm and then removed to Philadelphia, where he died 2nd October, 1782. Allen.

<sup>1</sup> JOHN TREBY was appointed Lieutenant 28th September, 1748, and was attached to the 44th 10th March, 1753; served under Braddock in 1755, and was desperately wounded and nigh lost his life at the battle of the Monongahela. After having been again wounded at Ticonderoga, he obtained a company 15th September, 1758; next was attached to the 80th Light Infantry and went on half-pay in 1763. He joined the 43rd 15th August, 1775, then serving in America, but seems to have died soon after. Army Lists; Sergeant's Braddock, 243.

<sup>3</sup> ROBERT DRUMMOND was commissioned Lieutenant in the 44th on the 2nd July, 1755; Captain 21st August, 1765, and went on half pay 10th December, 1768, where he continued until 25th April, 1774, when he was appointed to the 51st, then in Minorca. He left the service in July, 1776. Army Lists.

<sup>4</sup> GEORGE PENNINGTON served as an Ensign in the 44th, in Braddock's campaign, and was promoted to a Lieutenantcy 6th November, 1755. He was senior Lieutenant of his regiment in 1771, after which time his name does not appear in the Army List. He had connections in Philadelphia. Sergeant, 361.

<sup>8</sup> WILLIAM FORBES was commissioned Captain in the 46th on the 11th February, 1749; was appointed Major of the 35th foot 31st August, 1762, and retired in 1768. Army Lists.

<sup>9</sup> JAMES MARSH obtained a company in the 46th regiment 2nd February, 1757; became Major in the army 23rd July, 1772, and of his regiment 20th February, 1773; was promoted to be Lieutenant-Colonel in the 43rd 28th August, 1776, the day after the battle of Long Island. After serving through the Revolutionary war in America, he was appointed Colonel of the 77th foot, 12th October, 1787; Major-General 12th October, 1793; Lieutenant-General 1st January, 1798, and died in 1804.

<sup>11</sup> GEORGE LE HUNT was commissioned Lieutenant in the 55th foot 14th April, 1756, and Captain 28th November, 1759, in the 80th Light Infantry. In November, 1773, he was appointed Captain of a company of Invalids at Jersey; became Major in the army 11th September, 1783; exchanged into one of the Hull companies 19th February, 1790; was breveted Lieutenant-Colonel unattached on full pay 30th March, 1795; went on half-pay in 1798; became Colonel in the army in April, 1802, and died, it is supposed, in 1805, as his name is dropped from the Army List of 1806.

<sup>12</sup> JOHN TULLIKINS was commissioned Major of the 4th battalion Royal Americans 26th January, 1757. In 1759, he served in the expedition against Niagara and became Major of the 45th foot 25th February, 1760. In October, 1761, was advanced to be Lieutenant-Colonel in the army; in April, 1762, of his regiment, and in the fall of that year commanded the first battalion of the army sent to reduce Newfoundland. In 1771 he retired on half-pay, and is not found afterwards on active service. Army Lists.

<sup>13</sup> HERBERT DE MUNSTER was commissioned Captain in the 60th Royal Americans 29th December, 1755; was promoted to be Major 20th July, 1758; Lieutenant-Colonel in the army 14th January, 1762, and went on half-pay in 1763; was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of fort St. Philip in 1768 at a salary of £730 sterling, and died towards the close of 1777. Army List, 1778, 260.

<sup>15</sup> GAVIN COCHRANE became Captain in the Royal Americans 15th January, 1756; Major in the army 23rd July, 1772, and of the 69th regiment 14th August, 1773; he was promoted to be Lieutenant-Colonel of the 58th regiment, then stationed at Gibraltar, 24th June, 1777; became Colonel in the army 20th November, 1782, and died in the spring of 1786. Army Lists.

Provincials, Colonel Preble's. Wounded: Captain Winslow, capt. Goodwin, lieut. Macomber, lieut. Dorman, lieut. Adam.

New-York Regiment, Col. de Lancey's. Killed: Lieutenant and Adjutant Mauncey, lieut. Gatehouse. Wounded: Lieut. col. Leroux, lieut. Ducan, lieut. Degraw, Lieut. Yates, and lieut. Smith.

<sup>2</sup> WILLIAM RIDGE received a commission as Ensign in the Royal Americans 3rd January, 1756, and obtained a company 18th September, 1760; went on half-pay in 1763; was appointed to a company in the 44th foot 28th February, 1766, and exchanged into the 17th regiment 15th March, 1768, where he served until November, 1771, when he died or resigned his commission.

<sup>3</sup> ALEXANDER BAILLIE was promoted to a Lieutenancy in the 60th regiment 27th July, 1758, and went on half-pay at the peace, where he continued until 29th November, 1771, when he was appointed first Lieutenant in the 21st North British Fusiliers; Captain in the 9th Foot 23rd September, 1776; Major in the army 18th November, 1790; Lieutenant-Colonel in 1799. There is another officer of the same name who was appointed Captain of Invalids in 1790; Colonel in the army in 1794, and whose name continues on the Army List after 1809.

<sup>5</sup> JOHN JOSEPH SCHLOSSER was a native of Germany and appointed Captain-Lieutenant in the 60th regiment 12th May, 1756; Captain 20th July, 1758. In 1759 he served in the campaign against Niagara, and after its surrender commanded a post about a mile above the falls, which has since retained his name, being called old Fort "Schlosser." He afterwards commanded Fort St. Joseph, near the head of Lake Michigan, where he was surprised on the 25th May, 1763, taken prisoner by some Poutawatamies, carried to Detroit and exchanged. In January and February, 1764, he was employed, in Philadelphia, protecting the poor Moravian Indians from the Paxton mob. He continued in the Royal Americans until 1772. Army Lists; Pennsylvania Archives, IV., 158, 160; Parkman's Pontiac, 240.

<sup>6</sup> JAMES ALLAZ was commissioned Lieutenant in the 60th regiment 17th January, 1756; Captain-Lieutenant of the 3rd battalion 6th May, and Captain 2nd October, 1761; and retired on half-pay in 1763. On the reorganization of the regiment into four battalions again in 1775, he was recalled, on active service, as Captain of the 4th battalion, then in the West Indies; was promoted to be Major in the army 29th August, 1777, and died in 1778. Army Lists.

<sup>9</sup> HENRY BABCOCK was born in 1736; entered Yale College in 1748, and was graduated in 1752; was Captain of an Independent company of Foot in 1754, and in 1755 served in the battle of Lake George; was promoted to the rank of Major in 1756, and in 1757 to that of Lieutenant-Colonel; he commanded the Rhode Island regiment in 1758, and was wounded in the knee; the following year he again commanded his regiment in the campaign under Amherst; went to England in 1761; and on his return married and settled at Stonington, Connecticut, and commenced the practice of the law. In this he apparently was not successful, for in 1773 he applied for admission to Holy Orders in the Church of England, and was afterwards engaged in Lake Superior copper speculations. In 1776 he joined the popular party and was appointed, by the Legislature, commander of the forces at Newport. Updike.

<sup>10</sup> JOHN WHITING was eldest son of Charles Whiting and Elizabeth Bradford, grand-daughter of Governor B., of Plymouth Colony. He was born August 3rd, 1719, and married a Miss Cogswell; removed to Rhode Island; was promoted to the rank of Major after the battle of Ticonderoga, and in 1759 was Lieutenant of the Rhode Island regiment. He died in New London 17th December, 1770. Goodwin's Genealogical Notes, 334, 337.

M. de Montcalm to Marshal De Belle Isle.

Carillon, 12th July, 1758.

My Lord,

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, persisting in the opinion that the enemy were not collecting twenty-five thousand men at the head of Lake St. Sacrament, notwithstanding the unanimity of the depositions of the prisoners, I was under the necessity of starting on the fourth of June to assume the command of eight battalions, from which he had drawn four hundred picked men. On the thirtieth, the day of my arrival at the camp of Carillon, I had two thousand nine hundred and seventy men of our troops; what is incredible, only sixteen Indians, (there are eight hundred of them domiciliated in the Colony;) thirty-five Canadians, thirty-seven men of the marine. 'Twas with this force that I have dared to make a movement in advance, which, in affording the enemy matter for reflection, has retarded his march against me four days.

From the first to the sixth of July I have not received any other reinforcement than four hundred soldiers of the Marine or Canadians. The Marquis de Vaudreuil had promised me in writing, twelve hundred and a great many Indians. On the sixth I effected my retreat, and drew back all my posts without confusion or the loss of a man, my advanced guards having fired on the landing of six thousand men, and that day would have left nothing undesired had a detachment of three hundred men, at whose head I placed an officer of the colony, <sup>1</sup> ABRAHAM WILLARD was the son of Colonel Samuel Willard of Lancaster, Worcester county, Massachusetts, where he was born in the year 1722. He served in the army at the taking of Cape Breton, and rose to the rank of Captain in the above campaign. Having recovered from his wound he commanded one of the Massachusetts regiments in the campaign of 1759, under Amherst, and in 1760 entered Montreal, by way of the lakes, with the army under the command of Brigadier-General Haviland. In 1774, he was appointed a Mandamus counsellor, in consequence of which he became very unpopular. While at Union, Connecticut, he was seized and held through the night in confinement, and next day found himself obliged to sign a declaration that he would not act, asking, at the same time, forgiveness for having taken the oath of office. On the morning of the 19th of April, 1775, he mounted his horse and was proceeding to Beverly, where he had a farm, to superintend the spring work. While on his way the uprising of the country led him to fear for his personal safety, and he turned his horse's head towards Boston, where he purposed remaining only a few days. He was caught by Gage's Proclamation in a trap, and was too far compromised to return amongst his old neighbors. He subsequently accompanied the Royal army to Halifax. Though offered a commission by General Howe, he refused, saying "he should never fight against his country." He was afterwards Commissary to the British troops at New-York, and in 1778 was proscribed and his property confiscated. In July, 1783, he was one of the 55 petitioners, in the city of New-York, to General Carleton, for lands in Nova Scotia. He settled in New Brunswick and called the town Lancaster, after his native place in Massachusetts. He was a member of the Provincial Council and died at Lancaster, N. B., in May, 1789, aged 67 years. His estate in Massachusetts has been redeemed by his family and now belongs to his only surviving daughter, the widow of the Hon. Benjamin Goodhue, of Salem. Letter of Joseph Willard, Esq., of Boston; Ward's Curwen, 520; Sabine's Loyalists, 705.—Ed.

the most experienced in movements through the forest, as a guide, not gone astray and fallen into a column of English.

I have lost six officers and one hundred and eighty-seven soldiers, including some Canadians, in killed or missing.

The seventh was employed by all the troops in constructing an abbatis, and their labor is incredible. The four hundred picked troops who had remained with Chevalier de Levis, arrived in the evening, and the Chevalier, himself, in the night, of the seventh and eighth. As I had not any Indians, two companies of volunteers whom I had drafted from our battalions, kept up a fire with the enemy's advanced guard the entire night.

At half an hour after noon, the enemy's forces, consisting at least of twenty thousand, and according to many of the prisoners, of twenty-five thousand picked men, defiled on our guards and grenadier companies, which came in again. In a moment all the troops were at their posts. At one o'clock the enemy vigorously attacked us in four columns, mixed up with their irregular troops and best sharp shooters. The fire on the one side and on the other was like that at the battle of Parma, and the fight continued until eight o'clock at night. His Majesty is indebted at this moment for the success of that day to the incredible valor of his troops. The enemy retired that night in disorder, reembarking on Lake St. Sacrament, after having burnt some barges which they had conveyed to the Falls, and what affords me most gratification in this affair is, that the Regulars do not share, so to speak, its glory with any person. The reinforcements announced and promised by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, commenced arriving on the eleventh. The Governor-General will plead the want of provisions. How much may be said on that article! From what we have seen and from their precipitate flight, we estimate the loss of the enemy at about five thousand men killed or wounded. Our's is twelve officers killed, twenty-three wounded, ninety-two soldiers killed, two hundred and forty eight wounded. Chevalier de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque have had the greatest share in the glory of the day. The latter is dangerously wounded.

I perceive, by a dispatch from the Marquis de Paulmy of the twenty-sixth of February, that he had not received my despatches of the fourth of November, containing my lists of nominations and recommendations for favors to our troops. I am justified in concluding that they have been intercepted and stopped at the Bureau of the Marine. 'Twas in M. de la Porte's time. If people can act thus, 'tis useless for me to write to you. I shall have the honor to address you a detailed Relation, but I hasten to write you these lines, for fear the Governor-General may send off a vessel from Quebec unknown to me. If ever there has been a body of troops worthy of favors, 'tis that which I have the honor to command. Therefore, I pray you, my Lord, to heap them on it and to grant it all those I shall have the honor to propose to you. For myself, I do not ask you any other than to procure me the King's leave to return. My health suffers, my purse is exhausted. At the end of the year I shall owe the treasurer of the Colony ten thousand crowns (écus). And more than all, the trouble and contradictions I experience; the impossibility in which I am placed of doing good and preventing evil, determine me earnestly to pray his Majesty to grant me this favor, the only one I ambition.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. I must not leave you in ignorance, my Lord, of the fact that Colonel Johnson was, on the day of the affair, at the tail of the English columns with five hundred Indians, the greater part of whom belonged to the Five Nations. They have not struck because we have been conquerors, and I dare to believe that the victory of the King's troops will advance more the Marquis de Vaudreuil's secret negotiation with those people than all the negotiators and parties sent to their village.

Another Account of the Operations at Ticonderoga.

Camp at Lake George, July 14th, 1758.

Sir,

Having a few hours to myself, I think I cannot employ them better than in giving you a correct account of what has occurred between the 5th inst., the day on which we proceeded hence on the unfortunate expedition against Fort Carillon, to the 9th when we committed the blunder of returning here. I enclose you a little plan, hastily drawn up, to render what follows more intelligible. I doubt not that you have many different accounts at Philadelphia where the coffee house overflows with news; a real perpetual motion. And as I have been present myself, I am delighted, Sir, at having it in my power to furnish you a correct account. If, perchance, any reflections escape me therein, I would not wish them to be made public.

Our artillery, warlike stores and provisions being embarked on the 4th, all the troops went on the 5th at sunrise, on board more than 1,000 bateaux, not counting a few rafts which transported our heavy guns, and the horses; the last brigade embarked at 7 o'clock in the morning. At 6 o'clock in the evening we had already arrived at Sabbath-day Point, 24 miles, a spot famous by the unfortunate defeat last year of Colonel Parker,<sup>1</sup> who lost there 300, out of a detachment of 350 men, he had under his command. We beheld there its melancholy remains, both in the water and on the shore. We made a halt at that Point to wait for the rest of the three brigades and artillery, which were in the rear. The whole came up by 11 o'clock at night and we resumed our route.

6th Next morning we found ourselves at day break, within 4 miles of the enemy's advanced posts; at 8 o'clock, the first brigade went a-shore at the landing place, without meeting a solitary man to oppose us. A New-York regiment and a party of the Jerseys landed at the same time near the French camp which, having at last discovered us, hastily moved off, firing on our men at a distance of 600 paces, consequently without any effect, and retired leaving the greater part of their tents, provisions and baggage to the mercy of the new hosts.

Scouts were sent out at once, and 'twas found that the enemy had abandoned all the different intrenched posts, which, however, they had destroyed as far as time allowed, up to Fort Ticonderoga, or Carillon, in front of which was a strong intrenchment, consisting of a number of large trees, laid lengthwise one over the other, 7 @ 8 feet in height and pierced with a double row of loop-holes. The upper side was covered with bags of earth, by which arrangement there was a triple fire. The intrenchment flanked itself perfectly well, and was impregnable to musketry. A huge abbatis of trees which extended outside the entire length, rendered it more formidable. This was not ascertained until after our misfortune.

At 2 o'clock in the afternoon, all the regiments except three, advanced to take possession of the favorable posts on the height near the saw mill, one mile and a half from Carillon. At 4 o'clock they fell in with 350 French on the hill half way between the Landing place and the mill, who had been sent 3 days before from Fort Carillon on a scout 10 miles up the Lake; they saw us pass, and counted 700 bateaux, or the two first brigades, at sight of which, they attempted to return, to oppose our landing, but having gone astray they were, even at the moment our Rangers were firing at them, still unable to discover where they were. They consisted of 150 regulars, mostly of the regiment of La Reine, 100 volunteers and 100 Canadians. At the first volley they fired, they killed Lord Howe<sup>1</sup> and Lieutenant Cumberfort. Lord Howe was at the head of the Rangers, notwithstanding all the remonstrances made him; the moment the fire was received in front, panic seized our soldiers; entire regiments flung themselves one atop of the other, and even the General narrowly escaped being dragged off in the confusion by the fugitives. In vain did the officers cry out and offer opposition; nothing could stop 'em; meanwhile our brave Rangers defended themselves 200 against 350 of the enemy, up to the time they were reinforced. The enemy were surrounded and one Captain, 3 Lieutenants, with 170 soldiers were taken prisoners; some officers attempted to save themselves in the river by swimming, but they were killed, so that 'tis believed not one escaped. We lost Lord Howe, Lieutenant Cumberfort and 8 men; 6 wounded.

I am certain had the enemy had 3 or 400 Indians with them at the beginning of this encounter, they would have beaten us and driven us to our bateaux. 'Tis a singular case that 350 men drove back and threw into considerable confusion about 11,000.

We have taken 1 Captain, 3 Lieutenants and 170 men prisoners. As this affair deranged our plans somewhat, 'twas concluded to go and pass the night at the Landing place.

7th Resumed our march to take possession of the Mill heights, where the enemy had a camp the day before, of 800 men.

8th In the morning two rafts were ordered to be constructed to receive each two 6-pounders, which were to descend the river and take the intrenchment in the rear or enfilade it; but unfortunately, people forgot to reconnoitre whether 'twas feasible, for as soon as it got to be near one o'clock in the afternoon, and the point was passed, they were under the guns of the fort, which did not fail to play on them in such a style that our men found it prudent to return

<sup>1</sup> GEORGE AUGUSTUS, Lord Viscount Howe, eldest son of Sir E. Scrope, second Lord Viscount Howe, in the peerage of Ireland, was born in 1725, and succeeded to the title on the death of his father in 1735. In the forepart of 1757, he was ordered to America, being then Colonel commanding the 60th or Royal Americans, and arrived at Halifax in July following. On 28th September, 1757, he was appointed Colonel of the 55th foot, and on the 29th December, Brigadier-General in America. In the next year, when Abercrombie was chosen to proceed against Ticonderoga, Pitt selected Lord Howe to be the soul of the enterprise. On the 8th of July, he landed with the army at Howe's Point, at the outlet of Lake George, and commenced his march along the west road for Ticonderoga, in command of the right centre. They had proceeded about two miles, and an advanced party of rangers, under Lord Howe, was near Trout brook, when they suddenly came upon a party of Frenchmen who had lost their way. A skirmish ensued in which his Lordship, 'foremost fighting, fell,' and expired immediately. In him, says Mante, 'the soul of the army seemed to expire.' By his military talents and many virtues he had acquired esteem and affection. Howe's corpse was escorted to Albany for interment by PHILIP SCHUYLER, a young hero of native growth, afterwards a General in the Revolution, and was buried in St. Peter's church. Massachusetts erected a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey at an expense of £250. Lord Howe was a member of Parliament for Nottingham at the time of his decease. — Ed.

whence they came. 'Twere fortunate had we done as much before losing so many people to no purpose; the fort would be ours at this moment.

After having resolved to attack the intrenchment, Major Proby, of the 55th regiment, marched the first at the head of all the pickets and of the grenadiers, who were to sustain them; he was followed by all the Regular regiments and some Provincials; but instead of attacking all at once, and there were no other orders, they attacked according as they defiled; our men had all the trouble imaginable in passing the abatis of trees, in which act all order was lost. An hour afterwards, 'twas reported that the intrenchment was impregnable; that the best course would be to withdraw us in order, but no positive answer was returned on this head; all the regiments were ordered to advance; they were led to battle, but all in vain. The French were invisible; nothing was to be seen of them but a small bit of their caps, whilst they were keeping up a terrible and continual fire. Every man who wished to approach nearer than 15 paces, was irreparably dead. Notwithstanding all that, a most brisk fire was kept up on all sides until half-past six, when one regiment after another retired to the camp, which I intrenched of my own accord, after having seen how the thing was going.

What will our posterity say when they will learn that 14,000 men kept up and sustained, for six consecutive hours, with a courage truly heroic, a triple fire from the enemy at an intrenchment impregnable to small arms, without the slightest hope of carrying it? But what appears to me more surprising is, that if perchance they would have rendered themselves masters of it, they would have done so to their own disadvantage; for, after the French would have withdrawn under the cannon of the fort, they would have driven us off very quick, perhaps with greater loss than we should have suffered in capturing it, the fort being only 6 or 700 paces from the intrenchment. Our loss in Regulars was 1,500 men killed and wounded; the Provincials lost in all only about 600 men. The enemy cannot have lost over one hundred.

'Twas very fortunate that we had not been pursued in our retreat; we should have certainly lost 2,000 men more, having to pass defiles where only men can walk two abreast, and sometimes only in single files.

The 47th regiment has had 7 officers killed and 19 wounded; over 200 soldiers killed and 300 wounded.

We retreated that evening and during the night to the Landing place, and what crowns our misfortune and surpasses all belief, on the morning of the 9th everything was embarked and gone, to return whence we came, having still 12,000 fighting men in good health and divers good intrenched camps. We arrived on the same day at Fort Wm. Henry.

This, Sir, is an exact account of what occurred. I should have wished to communicate something more fortunate to you.

I am,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant.

M. de Montcalm to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Carrillon, 20th July, 1758.

My Lord,

I have the honor to address you an exact and circumstantial Account of the Battle of the eighth of July. As I have not with me here the cypher of correspondence, I postpone all reflections to the end of the campaign. Now, without necessity and without any determinate object, a great many men are sent to me whom I have neither desired nor demanded. They will consume our provisions, and I doubt not but it has been done in order to write that I have been placed in a position to make the most of my victory, and three hundred Indians were refused to me at my departure, who would have annihilated the English on their retreat.

I am with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

M. de Montcalm's Report of the Battle of Ticonderoga.

An Account of the Victory gained at Carillon by the King's troops, on the 8th of July, 1758.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, uncertain of the enemy's movements, considered it proper at the opening of this campaign, to divide his forces. He had destined Chevalier de Levy for a secret expedition with a detachment d'élite, 400 men of which were selected from the regular troops, the remainder were sent under the Marquis de Montcalm's orders, to defend the Lake St. Sacrament frontier.

The Marquis de Montcalm arrived on the 30th of June at Carillon; the report of the prisoners some days before, did not permit him to doubt that the enemy had assembled a force of between 20 and 25,000 men in the vicinity of Fort William Henry, and that their intention was to march immediately against him.

He communicated this intelligence forthwith to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and did not hesitate to take up a favorable position in advance, which might impose on the enemy, retard their movements, and afford the Colony time to get its reinforcements forward. And Sieur de Bourlamaque received orders in consequence, to occupy the Carrying place at the outlet of Lake St. Sacrament, with the 3 battalions of La Reine, Guyenne and Bearn. The Marquis de Montcalm with those of La Sarre, Royal Roussillon, Languedoc, the 1st Battalion of Berry, occupied both sides of the Falls, so called because that part of Lake St. Sacrament, contracted by mountains, discharges its waters impetuously into the river St. Frederic, Lake Champlain.

To the 2<sup>d</sup> battalion of Berry was committed the guard and service of Fort Carillon; at the same time the Marquis de Montcalm caused Sieurs Pont le Roy and Desandrouin, engineers, to reconnoitre the site of an intrenched camp which could cover the fort, and as we had no Canadians, and only fifteen Indians, he drafted from the French Battalions two troops of volunteers, the command of which he gave to Captain Bernard of the Béarn regiment, and to Captain Duprat of that of La Reine.

On the night of the 5th some scouts we had on Lake St. Sacrament, gave notice that there were a great number of barges which might, and in fact did belong to the van guard of the enemy's camp. An order was immediately given to the troops of the camps at the Portage and Falls, to run to arms, bivouac through the night and cut off the crews; Duprat's volunteers were sent to take up a position at a stream called Bernes river, which descends between the mountains wherewith this country is covered, and enters that of the Falls. The enemy might take us by the rear of these mountains, and 'twas essential to be notified thereof; 350 men were detached under the command of Captain de Trepezec of the regiment of Béarn, to take post between Bald Mountain and the Left river<sup>1</sup> of Lake St. Sacrament, and the Béarn Volunteers occupied an intermediate position between Bald Mountain and the Portage camp. Measures were also adopted to keep an eye on the landing the enemy might effect on the Right river<sup>1</sup> of the lake.

6th At 4 o'clock in the morning, the enemy's vanguard was descried within sight of the portage. The Marquis de Montcalm forthwith sent orders to Sieurs de Pontleroy and Desandrouin, to trace out in front of Carillon on the ground already designated, the intrenchments en abatis; and to the 2nd battalion of Berry to work at them under its colors.

The enemy commenced landing at 9 o'clock. Sieur de Bourlamaque then effected his retreat in their presence with the three battalions of the Portage, in the best possible order; he joined M. de Montcalm who was awaiting him in order of battle on the heights of the Right river<sup>1</sup> of the Falls, with the Royal Rousillon and 1st battalion of Berry. These five battalions united, crossed the river and destroyed the bridge, and with those of La Sarre and Languedoc, occupied the heights bordering on the Left river.<sup>1</sup>

This retreat would have been effected without the loss of a man, had not M. de Trepezec's detachment gone astray; abandoned by the small number of Indians which acted as guides, it lost itself in the mountains covered with trees, and after a march of 12 hours, fell into an English column which was marching towards the river of the Falls. 6 officers, and about 150 soldiers belonging to that detachment, have been taken; they fought for a long time but were obliged to yield to numbers; the English on that occasion suffered a considerable loss in the person of Brigadier-General Lord How of their army and Colonel of one of the regiments from old England.

At 6 o'clock in the evening, M. Duprat came with intelligence that the enemy was making head towards Bernets river with some pioneers, and that their design evidently was to throw a bridge across it. The Marquis de Montcalm ordered him to fall back, and commenced himself retreating towards the heights of Carillon, where he arrived at sundown. At nightfall a party of the enemy's regulars came to occupy both sides of the Falls, extending towards the bank of Berney, and intrenched themselves in like manner.

7th The entire army was employed at the works and abatis roughly prepared on the previous night by the 2nd battalion of Berry. The officers gave the example and the colors were planted on the works which were traced from the height nearly 650 toises in front of Fort Carillon.

The left rested on an escarpment 80 toises distant from the bank of the Falls, and whose summit was crowned by an abbati that flanked an opening, in the rear of which 6 pieces of cannon were to be placed to batter it, as well as the river.

The right rested equally on an acclivity, the pitch whereof was not so perpendicular as that on the left; the plain between this height and the River St. Frederic was flanked by a branch of intrenchment and was to be flanked also by a battery of 4 pieces of cannon, which was completed only on the morning following the action; moreover, the cannon of the fort were directed towards that plain and the landing that might be effected to the left.

The centre followed 40 sinuosities, the ground<sup>1</sup> keeping on the summit of the heights, and all the sections (of the intrenchment) flanked each other reciprocally; several indeed both on the right and left, received the enemy's fire at an acute angle (en echarpe), but this was because they did not allow us time to throw up traverses there. These species of intrenchments were formed of trunks of trees piled one on the other, having others felled in front, the branches of which, cut and sharpened, produced the effect of chevaux de frise.

Between the 6th and 8th, the pickets of our troops, detached under the command of Chevalier de Levy, arrived in the night.

Throughout the whole day our volunteers exchanged shots with the enemy's light troops. General Abercromby advanced in person with a large body of Militia and the remainder of the Regulars, as far as the Falls, to which place he sent up several barges and pontoons, each mounted with two pieces of cannon. The troops raised, therefore, that day, several intrenchments in front one of the other; the nearest of these was hardly a cannon shot from our abbatis. We bivouacked throughout the night along the intrenchment.

8th The generale was beat at day-break, in order that all the troops might understand their ground for the defence of the intrenchment according to the annexed disposition, which was nearly that wherein the men had worked. The army was composed of eight battalions: La Reine, la Sarre, Royal Rousillon, Languedoc, Guienne, the 2 of Berry and that of Bearn, and of 450 Canadians or soldiers of the Marine, which made, in all, 3600 fighting men.

On the left of the line were stationed the battalions of La Sarre and Languedoc and two pickets which arrived the previous evening; Bernard and Duprat's volunteers guarded the opening towards the river of the Falls.

The centre was occupied by the first battalion of Berry, that of Royal Rousillon and the rest of the pickets of Chevalier de Levy.

La Reine, Bearn and Guyenne defended the right, and on the plain, between the escarpment of that right and the River St. Frederic the Colonial troops and the Canadians were posted, also intrenched behind abbatis, throughout the entire front of the line. Each battalion had in its rear a company of grenadiers, one picket and reserve, both to sustain their battalion and to be posted wherever required; Chevalier de Levy commanded the right; M. de Bourlamaque the left, and the Marquis de Montcalm reserved the centre to himself.

This disposition regulated and known, the troops set again immediately to work; part were occupied in perfecting the abbatis, the remainder in constructing the two batteries before mentioned, and a redoubt which was for additional protection to the night.

On the morning of this day, Colonel Johnson joined the English army with 300 Indians, Tchactas, Mohegans and 5 Nations and Captain Jacob with 150 others. Soon after we saw them and some light infantry on a mountain opposite Carillon on the other side of the river of the Falls; they also opened a considerable fire which did not interrupt the work. We did not amuse ourselves by answering them.

Half after noon, the English army defiled against us; the grenadier companies, their volunteers and the advanced guards fell back in good order and reëntered the line; at the moment and signal prescribed, all the troops were under arms and at their posts.

The left was first attacked by two columns, one of these, which was endeavoring to turn the intrenchment, found itself under the fire of the battalion of La Sarre, the other directed its efforts against an angle between Languedoc and Berri; the centre where the Royal Rousillon was posted, was attacked almost at the same time by a third column, whilst a 4th attacked the right between Bearn and La Reine. These different columns were intermixed with their light infantry and best marksmen, who, under cover of the two, directed a most murdering fire on us.

At the commencement of the battle, some barges and pontoons which had started from the Falls, advanced within sight of Carillon, but were forced to retire by some guns of the fort, and by the bold face shewn by Bernard and Duprat's volunteers whom Sieur de Poulariés supported at the head of a company of grenadiers and a picket of the Royal Rousillon.

The different attacks continued almost the entire afternoon, and almost throughout the engagement, with the greatest vivacity.

As the Canadians and Colonials were not attacked, they directed their fire against the column which was attacking our right and sometimes came within range of them. That column, consisting of English grenadiers and Scotch highlanders, continued charging for 3 hours without retreating or breaking, and several were killed within fifteen paces of our abbatis.

About 5 o'clock, the column which had vigorously attacked Royal Rousillon, fell on the angle defended by the battalion of Guyenne and on the left of that of Bearn; the column which had attacked the right, flung itself also against the same point, so that the danger became imminent there. Chevalier de Levy repaired thither with some troops from the right where the enemy were no longer seriously firing; the Marquis de Montcalm ran thither also, with some of the reserve, and the enemy experienced a resistance which finally abated their ardor.

The left continued to sustain the fire of the two columns which were attempting to enter at that point, where Sieur de Bourlamaque had been dangerously wounded about 4 o'clock. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Senezergue and Privat, Lieutenant-Colonels of La Sarre and Languedoc, supplied his absence by issuing the best orders. The Marquis de Montcalm repaired to that quarter several times, and was attentive to dispatching a reinforcement thither at every critical moment.

At 6 o'clock both columns of the right, which abandoned the attack on Guyenne, came to make another attempt against Royal Rousillon and Berry, and finally a parting effort on the left.

At 7 o'clock the enemy was no longer occupied except by its retreat, under favor of the Light Infantry's fire which was kept up until nightfall; they abandoned, with the field of battle, their dead and portion of their wounded.

The darkness of the night; the exhaustion and small number of our troops; the enemy's forces which, despite their defeat, were still infinitely superior to ours; the nature of those woods in which 'twas impossible, without Indians, to engage an army that had 4 or 500 of them; several intrenchments thrown up en échelons from the field of battle to their camp; such were the obstacles which prevented us pursuing the enemy on their retreat. We even calculated that they would attempt the next day to take their revenge, and we worked all night to set the neighboring heights at defiance by means of traverses; to complete the abbati of the Canadians and to finish the batteries of the right and left, which had been commenced in the morning.

9th Our volunteers having notified the Marquis de Montcalm that the posts at the Falls and the Portage appeared to be abandoned, he gave orders to Chev: de Levy to proceed at day-break next morning with the grenadiers, volunteers and Canadians, to discover what had become of the enemy's army. Chev: de Levy advanced as far as the Portage. Everywhere he discovered traces of a precipitate flight; wounded, provisions and baggage abandoned; remains of burnt barges and pontoons—an incontestable proof of the loss the enemy had incurred. We estimate the killed and wounded at 4,000. Were some among them, and the promptitude of their retreat to be relied on, the number would be still more considerable. They have lost many principal officers; Lord How, Major-General Spittal,<sup>1</sup> the Commander-in-Chief of the forces of New-York, and several others.

The Indians of the Five Nations have remained quasi spectators in the rear of the column. Before declaring themselves, they were doubtless waiting the result of a battle which did not appear to the English to admit of a doubt.

The Act in our hands, which has been published in their Colonies for the levy and maintenance of this army, announces the general invasion of Canada, and these very words are expressed in all the commissions of their Militia officers.

The justice is due them that they have attacked us with the most determined obstinacy. 'Tis not usual that such would be the case with intrenchments for seven consecutive hours.

This victory is due to the skilful manoeuvres of our Generals before and during the action, and to the incredible valor of the troops; all the officers of the army behaved in a manner to entitle each of them to a special eulogium. We have about 450 killed or wounded, thirty-eight of whom are officers.

CANADA.

Journal of the affair that took place in Canada on the 8th July, 1758, between the King's troops, commanded by the Marquis de Montcalm, and those of England, which, to the number of twenty thousand men, have been routed by three thousand two hundred and fifty French.

Paris Doc. XV., 44. Would any one believe, Sir, that twenty thousand English have been obliged to fly before three thousand two hundred and fifty Frenchmen? This is exactly what has just happened to the King of England's troops commanded by Major General Abercromby.

The English design was to take Fort Carillon, in order afterwards to render themselves masters of Canada. Full of confidence in the superiority of the number of their troops, that conquest appeared to them certain, but they had counted without M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil and without the Marquis de Montcalm.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil had sent the Marquis de Montcalm to protect the frontier of the Colony towards Lake St<sup>e</sup> Sacrament. That General arrived on the 30th of June at Fort Carillon, where he found only eight battalions of Regulars, two companies of gunners and about three hundred workmen and a few Indians. Some days afterwards, Captain Raimond brought him a reinforcement of 400 Colonials, but having learned that the English with an army of twenty thousand Militia, and six thousand Regulars were in the vicinity of Lake St. Sacrament, and that Major-General Abercromby was to set out to capture Fort Carillon and drive us out of Canada, he immediately advised the Marquis de Vaudreuil of the circumstance, which that governor had already previously learned from other reports furnished him. He thought proper to change the destination of Chevalier de Levis who had been detached towards Corlac; ordered him to join the Marquis de Montcalm, and took measures to forward additional reinforcements without delay to the latter officer.

The Marquis de Montcalm, in view of checking the enemy, occupied the post of the Falls on the borders of Lake St<sup>e</sup> Sacrament, where he remained until the 6th of July, when the enemy appeared in force on the Lake.

The Marquis de Montcalm sent out several detachments to harrass the English on their landing; then recrossed the River of the Falls with all his troops and came to encamp under Fort Carillon, where he had had the precaution to have a camp laid out. A detachment of about 300 men, which had been sent to annoy the enemy, having lost its way through fault of the guides, fell on a column of the enemy, already formed; one hundred and eighty soldiers were killed or made prisoners, the remainder joined our troops.

On arriving at his camp, the Marquis de Montcalm had only 2800 men belonging to the troops from France, and 450 Colonials, from which number must be deducted one battalion of Berry that was reserved, with the exception of the Grenadier company, to guard the fort.

7th In the morning the entire army was employed constructing abbatiss; the men at work were protected by some grenadier companies and volunteers; the officers had planted their colors on the work, and axe in hand, were the first to set the soldiers an example, and each strove with the greatest ardor to surpass the other.

Our left wing was composed of the battalions of La Sarre and Languedoc; it rested on an escarpment eighty toises distant from the River of the Falls; an abbatiss crowned the summit of the escarpment and flanked an opening guarded by two companies of Bernard's and Duprat's volunteers. Six cannon were posted behind this opening. The right was guarded by La Reine, Bearn and Guyenne; it also was protected by a declivity, the pitch whereof was less precipitous than that on the left. The troops of the Colony and the Canadians occupied the table land between this declivity and the River St. Frederic, and intrenched themselves there with some abbatiss.

The cannon of the fort was directed both against this part and the place where the landing might be made, to the left of our intrenchment. The centre, preserving the summit of the heights, followed the sinuosities of the ground, and all the parts reciprocally flanked each other.<sup>1</sup> The battalions of Royal Rousillon and the first Berry battalion composed the centre; each battalion had in its rear a company of grenadiers, and a picket of reserve along the whole of the front of the line.

Intrenchments had to be constructed of logs placed one on the top of the other, having felled trees in front, whose branches were cut and sharpened, forming a sort of chevaux de frise.

On the evening of the 7th our army experienced great joy, on the arrival of 400 picked men. Chevalier de Levis arrived shortly after with Lieutenant-Colonel Senezergues of the regiment of La Sarre.

Chevalier de Levis had charge of the defence of the right; M. de Bourlamaque of that of the left; the Marquis de Montcalm reserved to himself the command of the centre, in order to be in a convenient position for observing, and for giving his orders, all round. The army bivouacked throughout the night.

8th The generale was beat at the break of day, and all the troops reconnoitred their posts; one portion was employed in completing the abbatis, whilst the other was constructing the batteries.

At ten o'clock in the forenoon, the enemy's light infantry showed itself on the opposite side of the river and opened a considerable fire, which, the distance being too great, was ineffectual in preventing us continuing the work.

At half an hour after noon their army deployed against us. Our guards advanced, the volunteers and grenadier companies fell back and reëntered the lines without the loss of a single man. The workmen and all the troops ran, on the first signal, to their arms and to their posts.

Our left was first attacked by two columns, one of which endeavoring to turn the intrenchment found itself under the fire of the regiment of La Sarre; the other attacked a salient angle between Languedoc and Berry;<sup>1</sup> and a fourth column attacked the right between the battalions of Bearn and La Reine. Captain Raimond, who was in command of the troops that had gone to the level land alongside the River St. Frederic, not being attacked, made a sortie from its intrenchments, took the column attacking our right in flank and charged it with intrepidity. About 5 o'clock in the evening, the column which had attacked the Royal Rousillon battalions, threw itself on the salient angle of the intrenchment defended by the battalions of Guyenne and by the left of Bearn; the other of the enemy's columns, which at first had attacked the battalions of La Reine and Bearn, fell upon it also, and the attack became murderous. The Marquis de Montcalm and Chevalier de Levis perceiving it, the former ran thither with some troops of the reserve, and the latter with some detachments from the right. The English, repeatedly repulsed, again made another attempt, which had no better success, and were obliged to prepare for a retreat, which was covered by the fire of the light infantry that continued until night.

Divers considerations prevented our pursuing the enemy; his forces which, notwithstanding their defeat, were greatly superior to ours; the darkness of the night; the nature of the country in which, even in broad daylight, it is impossible to travel without guides, and lastly, the fatigue of our little victorious army.

M. de Montcalm the next day detached Chev: de Levis to reconnoitre the enemy. He everywhere discovered only traces of a flight which terror had precipitated.

According to the report of the English prisoners in our hands, the enemy lost four thousand men, in killed and wounded. They have lost a great many officers of distinction. Lord How and Major-General<sup>1</sup> Spital of the Regulars are among the slain.

We have had the satisfaction of remarking that 500 Indians attached to the enemy's army, would never engage in the action.

This brilliant victory confers infinite honor on the French. The Marquis de Montcalm has shown himself to be a great captain and a brave soldier. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Levis and de Bourlamaque have covered themselves with laurels in the command of the right and of the left. M. de Levis has received several musket-shots in his clothes. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Bougainville and de Langis, aids-de-camp of M. de Montcalm, have been wounded at his side.

We have lost 12 officers and 92 soldiers who have remained on the field of battle.

We have had in all 25 officers and 248 soldiers wounded.

Permitted to be printed and distributed.

Rouen, this 23 December, 1758.

M. Doreil to M. de Moras.

Quebec, 28th July, 1758.

My Lord,

The accounts which the Marquis de Montcalm has had the honor to render you, will have given you to understand the small force he had to oppose the enemy's expedition on the Lake St. Sacrament frontier, particularly against Fort Carillon. The campaign might have been regarded as much more fortunate than the one preceding, had he escaped being drawn into action. What idea will be formed of it after the marvelous and incredible event which has just occurred?

As the Marquis de Montcalm will, perhaps, not have it in his power to render you, my Lord, a detailed account by the frigate which is to sail in a few days, I shall endeavor to make up for it in part, by fulfilling his intentions.

I have the honor of transmitting to you hereunto annexed, my Lord, copy of the two letters that General has written to the Marquis de Vaudreuil on the 9th of this month, to inform him of the signal victory gained on the 6th by the King's troops over the English army, which numbered 25 thousand men, more than 14 thousand of whom have fought with great bravery and perseverance for over seven hours. I subjoin to the end of my copy a return of the English army. I propose rendering you an account, my Lord, of the Marquis de Montcalm's arrangements and of some interesting particulars of which 'tis well that you be informed.

I commence by the arrangement made for the defence of the abatis.

On the right, the battalion of La Reine; next, that of Bearn and that of Guyenne.

In the centre, Roussillon; four troops of 64 men who arrived the previous night, belonging to the detachment which was to march into the country of the Five Nations with Chevalier de Levy; the second battalion of Berry.

On the left, the battalions of Languedoc and La Sarre—this last closing the line.

The eight companies of grenadiers and two troops of 64 men belonging to those which were to march with Chevalier de Levis, formed the reserve, and were distributed to the left and centre.

The volunteers of Captain Duprat, of the regiment of La Sarre, and those of Captain Bernard, of the Bearn regiment, were posted on the bank of the river to prevent the enemy, by means of some barges full of men, landing and turning our left.

The few Colonial troops and Canadians, numbering about 400 men with a few officers, were stationed in the opening to the right of the battalion of La Reine, under the protection of the fire from our intrenchment, the guns of the place and some abatis in front of them.

The third battalion of Berry, under the orders of M<sup>r</sup> de Trecesson, its commander, was with the exception of the grenadier company detailed to guard Fort Carillon and to convey ammunition to the abatis.

The troops mutually aided and assisted each other, and our grenadier companies have always effected the manœuvre of passing successively from one attack to the other.

Although the Marquis de Montcalm was posted in the centre at the commencement of the action, he repaired equally and in succession to all points, principally from the Guienne battalion to the extremity of the left. About the middle of the fight, he confided the right of the line wholly to Chevalier de Levis; his aids-de-camp conveyed to him continually news from that quarter.

The attack which was attended with most danger, was that made by both the enemy's right columns combined, and on that part of the abatis defended by the Guienne battalion. The Marquis de Montcalm from his side and Chevalier de Levis from his, immediately applied a remedy by repairing thither in person with a reinforcement.

Chevalier de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque deserve the greatest encomiums for their excellent arrangements, and for their example and firmness during the action. Towards the close of the engagement, the latter received a shot which fractured his shoulder blade and uterus.<sup>1</sup> We begin, however, to augur favorably of this wound.

M<sup>r</sup> de Pont le Roy, Captain en premier of the Corps Royal, Chief Engineer of Canada, and M<sup>r</sup> Desandrouins, Captain en second and Engineer attached to the French troops, have rendered essential services by the zeal and rapidity with which they had the abatis constructed in 24 hours; they were both at the defence animating the soldiers by their examples. M<sup>r</sup> de Desandrouins acted as aid-de-camp to the Marquis de Montcalm whose orders he did not cease to convey in all directions from the commencement to the close of the action.

The Commandants and every individual officer of the Corps have performed prodigies of valor, and nothing can be compared to the courage of the lowest soldiers.

In fine, whatever occurred on that brilliant and glorious day must be ever remembered. The Colony which would find itself cut in the centre, was lost beyond recovery. The enemy made the attack with surprising vigor, having the élite of the best regulars, the grenadiers and volunteers at the head of his columns. If defeated, we had no retreat; nothing could have prevented the enemy with a force of 25 thousand men, from being already at the gates of Montreal, which is without any defence. What must the more excite the public admiration and joy, is the fact that no Indian has contributed to this great event, a circumstance which perhaps never occurred in this country; there was not a single one of them. The glory of the General and of the French troops is indeed much greater in consequence; but the enemy's force would, at the same time, have been entirely defeated in its precipitate retreat, had M. de Montcalm had 200 Indians to guide a strong detachment which he would have sent in pursuit, under the orders of Chevalier de Levis. Although the enemy could not have been pursued, his retreat has rather been a flight in terror and uttermost disorder, abandoning wounded, provisions, ammunition, implements &c. A detachment which went out on the 10th, has discovered all these on the road, and nearly 500 dead bodies junked on one side and another. The enemy's army did not consider itself safe at the Portage, it retreated to the head of Lake St. Sacrament where Fort George formerly stood, and where it is carefully intrenching itself.

Besides feeling myself obliged, My Lord, to render you an account of these particulars, the Marquis de Montcalm has directed me to do so. You will remark, in his Narrative,<sup>1</sup> that about 500 Indians of the Five Iroquois Nations accompanied the English army to witness our defeat, and to act, afterwards, openly against us. Some individual officers have even stated that they fired from the hills on our advanced guards. This proceeding justifies the opinion of those who believe that those people, gained over by the English, were assisting to pay us back in our own coin, by sending deputies to the Marquis de Vaudreuil to engage him to divide his forces, precisely when the enemy were on the march to attack us on Lake St. Sacrament.

M. de Rigaud arrived at Carillon with some Colonial troops, Canadians and about 600 Indians, only on the 13th. The Marquis de Montcalm informs me on the 17th that he has advanced a party of Canadians and Indians to encamp at the Portage. The remainder and the Colonial troops are encamped at the Falls, and the eight French battalions are working industriously in constructing regular intrenchments and in finishing Fort Carillon. M. de Pont le Roy and, under his orders, M. Desandrouins are directors of the work. M. de Lotbinière is here since the fifteenth.

By intelligence received yesterday from Louisbourg the English had not as yet opened the trench on the 8th of this month, and were only one thousand toises from the place. They had lost, up to that time, about 1500 men, in killed and wounded. 'Tis reported that sickness prevails among their land forces. Our troops are in the best possible spirits; perfect understanding exists everywhere; that begins to tranquilize us somewhat in regard to the fate of this place. Nevertheless, flattering hopes must not be entertained. The bravery of the garrison can be relied on, but 'tis very feeble, regard being had to the condition of the place.

M. du Chaffault's fleet had on board one sergeant and 26 soldiers of the battalion of Cambis, who were sick at the time of landing at St. Anne; I have claimed them, and he has given them up to me by order of the Marquis de Vaudreuil. I shall keep them here and make them do duty until the siege of Louisbourg be decided.

Up to this date, my Lord, only 328 recruits have arrived; of these, the Colonial troops have received 98. I have embodied the other 230 into our battalions and sent those to the army who were in good health. I would still require about 550 men to complete them on the ancient footing, independent of the augmentation prescribed for the six first by the King's ordinance of the month of January, 1857. You perceive, my Lord, that it is very desirable that some more arrive.

M. Bernier, ordinary Commissary of war, who has been sent to serve under me, has arrived about a month ago in the frigate le Prince Edouart of Rochefort; but so far from being able to give me any assistance, his situation has increased my cares and embarrassments. He is sick since his arrival with a malignant fever, which has carried him to death's door; he is out of danger only since a few days.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

An Account of the Descent of the English into Canada, and of the Victory gained over them by the French.

On the night of the 5 and 6 July, 1758, the English to the number of 16 or 18 thousand men, came with intention to land at the Portage; the camp was occupied by M. de Bourlamaque, who commanded the regiments of La Reine, Guyenne and Béarn; the superior force of the enemy obliged him to fall back on M. de Montcalm, who was in the occupation of the Falls with the regiments of Rousillon and Berry. M. de Montcalm, informed of the number of the enemy, judged proper to fall back during the day; he crossed the River of the Falls and remained two hours on the right of the regiments of La Sarre and Languedoc, that were guarding the heights through which the enemy could pass on the direct course to Carillon; he afterwards retired with all the troops under the guns of Carillon, halting every 50 paces, although the enemy were constantly advancing. He did not lose a man in that retreat, which was one of the most beautiful. Arrived under Carillon on the evening of the 6th. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Pont le Roi and de Sandrouins were directing the work at the intrenchment which was crowning the height, having the river on the left and a curtain on the right; M. de Langy had been despatched on the same night with 150 volunteers to attack some barges, reported to number 60, but on meeting 5 @ 600 he was obliged to retreat, and not having had any notice of M. de Bourlamaque's retiring, returned to the Portage, where he arrived that night. On approaching he cried, Qui vive? the English answered, Français; and as soon as he had somewhat advanced, he was surrounded by enemies and fired on at a brave rate; he fought desperately; the English drove him back to the brink of a small stream; no quarter was given inasmuch as all his volunteers plunged in to wade; M. de Langy was the only officer who rejoined the camp with 10 or 12 volunteers; the fate of the rest is not known.

It has since been ascertained that Captain Bonneau, of Guyenne, retreated, constantly fighting, to a peninsula, with full 150 men, because they had offered to lay down their arms were they allowed quarter, which was refused them; whereupon they fought with incredible vigor, and though their number diminished, they killed a great many people; this obliged the enemy to cry Quarter to them, which they accepted. News has since been received from M. Bonneau, who speaks highly of General Albercrombie's kindness. In the pockets of some English officers killed in the affair of the 5th have been found commissions, which they received as officers for the general expedition against Canada.

Among the papers of the enemy has also been found a printed proclamation published at New-York on the 5th of March last, stating in the title the invasion assigned to the Regulars who were to form, altogether, a corps of 30 thousand men; proceed to commence operations at Fort Carillon, continue by that of Point St. Frederic, and push their conquests up to Montreal.

General Albercromby, on his return to the camp at Fort St. George after the affair of the 5th, has publicly forbid, on pain of death, any mention to be made of the affairs of Louisbourg, and the loss they incurred in the action at Carillon, and to represent the dead only at 1200 men. 'Tis proved that their army was 20 thousand strong.

July 9, 1758.

Sir,

Too much occupied with business and events, I have instructed M. le Mercier to despatch a canoe to you last night to inform you of the victory just gained by the King's troops over the English, and that I was preparing even to recommence this morning, if they wished. You have been informed of the very splendid retreat which we made on the 6th; we should have suffered no loss thereby [had it not been for] the adventure of M. de Langy's detachment; although that retreat had been effected with considerable boldness, and at the moment 6 thousand of the enemy's troops were landing, we arrived at my position on the evening of the 6th. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Pont le Roy, de Sandrouins, have superintended the work of the intrenchment, which was crowning the height, the left on the river, and the right on a curtain. Our 7 battalions—the 2nd of Berry having been entrusted with guarding the fort and all the details of that part, under the orders of M. de Trecesson, who on this occasion rendered great services to the army—our 7 battalions, I say, worked with incredible ardor in constructing abbatiss, which in the course of the day of the 7th, were finished, both good and bad; Chevalier de Levy's pickets reached us on the same day, and he himself arrived on the 5th. The few Canadians and Colonial troops I had by me, were posted at 5 o'clock in the morning at the opening between the abbatiss and the river; the general disposition for the reception of the enemy was completed by the 7th. Throughout the whole of the 7th we had our guards and grenadiers outside to protect the work; the companies of volunteers drafted from our troops, and which I had placed under the command of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Bernard and du Prat, were always in advance to give intelligence of the enemy's movements. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Langy and Daillebout were going to scout also; the army lay on its arms.

8th. Men continued strengthening the abbatiss, our volunteers as usual exchanged shots with the enemy's advanced guards; the arrival of Chevalier de Levy caused no other change in my arrangement than to commit the defence of the right to him, and to remove M. de Bourlamaque to the left; M. Mercier and all our artillery officers were busy placing cannon at the points at which I had ordered them to be placed; at half past noon the English columns defiled against our guards, who, with the grenadier and pioneer companies, entered immediately and without any confusion. The signal gun was fired, and in a moment all the troops were at their different posts.

At 1 o'clock we were attacked by the enemy with an impetuosity worthy of better troops; they made 6 consecutive assaults, and even reached the abbatiss; they formed 3 principal columns; the firing on both sides was kept up briskly until 6 o'clock in the evening and continued until night; the army, which consisted only of 2,900 effectives of our troops and 400 Canadians or soldiers of the Colonials, resisted all those attacks with the courage of heroes. The danger was alike at all points and for a long time; fortunately no troop wavered. The officers performed prodigies of valor on this occasion, and their example has had a surprising influence on the lowest soldier. The Colonial troops and Canadians have caused us to regret that there were not in greater number. Chevalier de Levy, under whose eyes they fought, speaks highly of them; because they were nimbler men he ordered two sorties, under the orders of such of your officers as were capable of going on such service; M. d'hery, Adjutant of La Reine, headed one; Captain Denau, of the same regiment, the other. M. de Raymond, who had the honor to command the troops of the Colony, displayed much zeal and intelligence, and I cannot speak too highly of him, of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Saint Ours, la Naudière, Gaspé, and generally of the small number of officers we had there; we are indebted for this advantage to the courage of the troops, to the sorties Chevalier de Levy ordered to be made at the right by pickets and a company of grenadiers, at the same time that he had dispatched some active grenadiers into the opening; and to M. de Bourlamaque's arrangements and firmness on the left.

All the Commandants of corps, and generally all the officers, acted in a manner to leave me only the merit of finding myself the General of such brave troops, and of attending to have them successively reinforced, according as parts of our abbatis were more or less vigorously attacked. As the enemy could land a force in barges, which, in fact, they attempted at the beginning of the attack, Bernard's and Du Prat's volunteers guarded this part, and M. de Louvicourt, who was managing 3 guns of the fort, sunk a barge and pontoon; this, joined to the fire of the volunteers, compelled the retreat of the 200 barges which the English had caused to advance. Chevalier de Montreuil used the greatest activity in the world to transmit all the orders necessary for the encouragement of the troops, and for the distribution of the ammunition which the gentlemen of the second battalion of Berry and the officers of the artillery had conveyed to us with great diligence; that battalion had its grenadier company defending the abbatis, and although the officers belonging to it regret much not to have been at the same place, they coöperated effectually in all the manœuvres, and have not failed to lose some soldiers in the transportation. M. du Plessix, who had landed in the midst of the affair, marched immediately with his 80 soldiers. The enemy retired at night, abandoning a part of their wounded, and we have passed the night in order of battle, because they had some fresh troops with which they might recommence under favor of the night.

We estimate from the report of prisoners, that they were at least 1200 of their best fighting troops; they had left the remainder behind some abbatis, between the Falls and our field of battle to protect their retreat. Their loss must exceed 4000 men, including killed and wounded, (such is our conclusion from the report of prisoners), and 2000 corpses which lie along our abbatis. Lord Howe who commanded the attack, we are assured has been killed. Our loss, the exact extent of which I do not yet know, will be 250 @ 300 killed or wounded; this this number includes a few Canadians and Colonials. This day, and the misfortune of the detachment of the 6th, inevitably reduce our battalions. Annexed to this despatch is the return of officers killed or wounded. On this day, the 9th, I have sent some volunteers in advance, and it appears certain that the enemy have retired to the Portage and burnt the Mill at the Falls and the barges they had sent forward.

M. de Lusignan writes me, this moment, that three deserters have arrived at his quarters, who report that the army consisted of 20,000 men; and I have learned the same fact from a letter of an officer who was killed; that they lost Lord Howe, the Major-General and 3000 killed, exclusive of the wounded. In that case their loss must be greater than I had stated to you. What a day for France, had I had only 200 Indians to let loose at the close of the action, and to serve as guides to a strong detachment which I would have confided to Chevalier de Levy ! It is a great battle, and perhaps the first that has been fought in Canada without Indians.

I am, &c.,

(Signed), MONCALM.

M<sup>r</sup> de Sandrouins, who has been my secretary, has acted as my aid-de-camp, and always has been from the right to the left, encouraging the soldiers. M<sup>r</sup> de Pont le Roy has followed us.

News from Carillon.

Our success continues: Friday, 20th of July, a detachment of 400 men, Canadians, Colonials and Indians, all under the command of M<sup>r</sup> de Saint Luc la Corne, Captain of the Colony, attacked, at one o'clock in the afternoon, on the Lidius road, about 150 men, captured 53 wagons loaded with provisions, 230 oxen, took 80 scalps and 60 prisoners, including men, women and children ; we lost only one Iroquois Indian and one wounded.

M. Doreil to Marshal de Belle Isle.

Quebec, 28th July, 1758.

My Lord,

You will have seen by one of my despatches of the 16th of June last, to the Marquis de Paulmy, which will have reached you by the frigate La Sirene, if she have the luck to pass, what were the plans of the campaign. The Marquis de Montcalm's position on the frontier of Lake St. Sacrament was difficult and critical. With the few forces and means at his disposal, I should have regarded his campaign as much more fortunate than those preceding, had he, whilst restricting himself to a defensive course, escaped blame. What opinion must be entertained of him after the marvelous and incredible event which has just taken place.

As the Marquis de Montcalm will, perhaps, not have it in his power my Lord, to render you detailed accounts by the frigate about to sail in a few days, I shall endeavor to make up for the deficiency, in fulfilling his intentions.

I have the honor to transmit you, hereunto annexed, my Lord, copies of the two letters that General has written to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, on the 9th of this month, to render him an account of the signal victory gained on the 8th, by the King's troops over the English army, 25,000 strong, more than 1400 of whom have fought with great bravery and firmness for more than 7 hours. I have subjoined, at the close of my letter, a return of the English army. I am about to give you an account, my Lord, of the Marquis de Montcalm's arrangements, and of some interesting particulars, of which it is necessary that you should be informed.

I commence by the arrangement made for the defence of the abatis.

On the right, the battalion of La Reine; next that of Bearn and that of Guyenne.

In the centre, Royal Rousillon, four troops of 64 men arrived the previous night, belonging to the detachment which was to march into the country of the Five Nations with Chevalier de Levy; the second battalion of Berry.

On the left the battalions of Languedoc and La Sarre, this last closing the line.

The eight companies of Grenadiers and two troops of 64 men belonging to those which were to march with Chevalier de Levis, formed the reserve and were distributed to the left and centre.

The volunteers of Captain Du Prat of the regiment of La Sarre and those of Bernard, captain in the Bearn regiment, were posted on the bank of the river to prevent the enemy landing by means of some barges full of men, and turning our left.

The few Colonial troops and Canadians, numbering about 400 men with a few officers, were stationed in the opening to the right of the battalion of La Reine, under the protection of the fire from our intrenchment, the guns of the place and with some abatis in front of them.

The third battalion of Berry under the orders of M. de Trecesson its commander was, with the exception of the grenadier company, detailed to guard Fort Carillon and to convey ammunition to the abatis.

The troops mutually aided and assisted each other, and our grenadier companies have always effected the manœuvre of passing successively from one attack to the other.

Although the Marquis de Montcalm was posted in the centre at the commencement of the action, he repaired equally and in succession to all points, principally from the Guienne battalion to the extremity of the left. About the middle of the fight, he confided the right of the line wholly to Chevalier de Levis; his aids-de-camp conveyed to him continually the news from that quarter.

The attack which was attended with most danger, was that made by both the enemy's right columns combined, on that part of the abatis defended by the Guienne battalion. The Marquis de Montcalm from his side, and Chevalier de Levis from his, immediately applied a remedy by repairing thither in person with a reinforcement.

Chevalier de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque deserve the greatest encomiums for their excellent arrangements, and for their example and firmness during the action. Towards the close of the engagement, the latter received a shot which fractured his shoulder blade and uterus.<sup>1</sup> We begin, however, to augur favorably of this wound.

M. de Pont le Roy, Captain en premier of the Corps Royal, Chief-Engineer of Canada, and M. Desandrouins, Captain en second and Engineer attached to the French troops, have rendered essential services by the zeal and rapidity with which they had the abatis constructed in 24 hours; they were both at the defence, animating the soldier by their examples. M. Desandrouins acted as aid-de-camp to the Marquis de Montcalm, and did not cease conveying his orders in all directions, from the commencement to the close of the action.

The Commandants, and every individual officer of the corps, have performed prodigies of valor, and nothing can be compared to the courage of the lowest soldiers. In fine, whatever occurred on that brilliant and glorious day must be ever remembered. The Colony, which would find itself cut in the centre, was lost beyond recovery. The enemy has attacked with surprising vigor, having the élite of the best Regulars, his grenadiers and volunteers at the head of his columns. If defeated, we had no retreat; nothing could have prevented the enemy with a force of 25 thousand men from being already at the gates of Montreal, which is without any defence. What must the more excite the public admiration and joy, is the fact that no Indian has contributed to this great event—a circumstance which perhaps never occurred in this country; there was not a single one of them. The glory of the General and of the French troops is indeed much greater in consequence; but the enemy's force would, at the same time, have been entirely defeated in its precipitate retreat, had M. de Montcalm had only 200 Indians to guide a strong detachment which he would have sent in pursuit, under the orders of Chevalier de Levis. Although the enemy could not have been pursued, his retreat has rather been a flight in terror and uttermost disorder, abandoning wounded, provisions, ammunition, implements, &c. A detachment which went on the 10th has discovered all these on the road, and nearly 500 dead bodies junked on one side and another. The enemy's army did not consider itself safe at the Portage; it retreated to the head of Lake St. Sacrament, where Fort George formerly stood, and is carefully intrenching itself there.<sup>2</sup>

As we have reason to suspect that the bureaux of the Marine will endeavor to vaunt the glory of four hundred men belonging to the troops and Militia of the Colony, who were in this action, and perhaps to diminish those of the troops of the line, I must inform you, my Lord, of what the Marquis de Montcalm has written me, individually, on the fourteenth. He expresses himself on this subject as follows:

"I must say in truth that the Colonial troops and the Canadians have behaved very indifferently. M. de Trecesson, the Commandant, has been obliged to fire on some of them who were abandoning their post, in the two sorties ordered on the right by Chevalier de Levis; few officers, soldiers and Canadians made a sortie after orders to that effect had been given. Adjutant Druil, of the battalion of La Reyne, and Captain Demoes, were sent to persuade them to do so, and to lead them. Nevertheless, as a good servant of the King, I have considered it for the good of the service to praise them in a Narrative which was to be published. Captain de Raymond of the Colonial troops, and who commands them and the Canadians, a relative of the Brigadier-General who has been in command at Isle Royal, has personally acted very well; I greatly fear that M. de Vaudreuil will not do any thing for him, because he does not like him. I have been obliged to deceive both the French officer and soldier who said openly, that M. de Vaudreuil was desirous of having us strangled, by giving us so small a force to face a real danger, whilst he was uselessly retaining a corps of two or three thousand men for the purpose of making experiments in the country of the Five Nations, where three hundred men were sufficient, and that he did not deign to put the other forces of the Colony in motion, et cetera.

"God be thanked, the excitement is calmed at present. M. de Vaudreuil will doubtless endeavor to justify himself on the ground of want of provisions of which we had only five day's supply at the time of the attack, but 'twould be easy to prove to him still more his mistake in this regard; there was a prodigious quantity of them at St. John and at Chambly.

"For myself, tired of working miracles and of not being listened to, I shall demand my recall at the end of the Campaign.

"I am engaged at present in introducing order among two thousand Canadians and six hundred Indians, who, at last, arrived yesterday evening, the greatest portion of whom, had it not been for the ordinary and affected delays, might have been here, like Chevalier de Levy, before the action. They are come now to devour provisions, when there is no longer any need of them."

I must here report another circumstance to you, my Lord, which proves more and more that M. de Vaudreuil, jealous no doubt of the glory that the Marquis de Montcalm has acquired, would, without affecting it too much, fain have deprived him of the means of succeeding in making a good defence.

The latter, aware of the importance of having an experienced Engineer, such as M. de Pont le Roy, of whose merit and talents in the army of Italy and Provence he was cognizant, requested him of M. de Vaudreuil, who appeared to comply, and even left him master of ordering that officer to leave here for the purpose of joining him at Montreal. M. de Montcalm wrote in consequence to M. de Pont de roy. The latter who was burning with the desire of making the campaign and of acquiring a personal knowledge of the state of the fortification of Carillon, of which he entertained a bad opinion, in consequence of what he had heard of that place, makes his arrangements, fixes the day for his departure, and informs the Marquis de Montcalm of it, and reports it to M. de Vaudreuil, who, on almost the very day he granted the Marquis de Montcalm's request, let the Engineer know, that whenever he thinks it fit that he shall repair to the army, he (M. de V.) will give him his orders. This snare surprised M. de Pont le Roy; he shewed it to me, and concerted with me an answer importing that on his first order notified by the Marquis de Montcalm, he had fixed on the tenth of June, which was the next day; that he had no time to lose in joining the Marquis de Montcalm at Montreal, whence he was to march on the twenty-fourth or 25; that his baggage had already been sent off; ('twas no such thing.) He set out the following day in the hope that he could only feel obliged to him for the zeal and ardor with which he obeyed orders. He arrived at Montreal; M. de Vaudreuil through the guise of politeness evinced some appearance of anger; no matter, the object of the public good was attained. He dared not openly and to his face refuse this Engineer-in-Chief to the Marquis de Montcalm, with whom he left on the 25th for the army.

The event has justified how much his presence there was necessary, and this little detail, will, besides, convince you still more, my Lord, of all the troubles to which people are incessantly exposed here, though having no object in view but the good of the public service. The Marquis de Montcalm has been unceasingly exposed thereto, from the first moment of his arrival, and it is only by the force of zeal and philosophy that he has resisted it.

Besides feeling myself obliged, my Lord, to render you an account of these particulars, the Marquis de Montcalm has directed me to do so. You will remark in his Narrative that about 500 Indians of the Five Iroquois Nations accompanied the English army to witness our defeat, and to act afterwards openly against us. Some individual officers have even stated that they fired from the hills on our advanced guard. This proceeding justifies the opinion of those who believed that those people, gained over by the English, were assisting in giving us change, by sending deputies to the Marquis de Vaudreuil to engage him to divide his forces, precisely when the enemy were on the march to attack us on Lake St. Sacrament.

The Marquis de Montcalm informs me the 17th that he has advanced a party of Canadians and Indians to encamp at the Portage. The remainder and the Colonial troops are encamped at the Falls, and the eight French battalions are working industriously in constructing regular intrenchments in place of abatis, and in furnishing Fort Carillon, which ought to have been done long ago. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Pont le Roy and Desandrouins are directors of the work, under his orders.

We continue very uneasy for Fort Louisbourg, where the English landed on the 8th of June to the number of eighteen thousand men. We rely considerably on the valor of the troops, but they are too few of them and the works (corps de place) are worth nothing. M. du Chaffault's fleet came to take refuge here, after having had hardly time to put on shore at Port Dauphin the Cambis battalion, which proceeded over land to Louisbourg the moment it landed. This fleet has one sergeant and twenty-six men belonging to that battalion who remained sick on board. I have reclaimed them and shall retain them here until the siege of Louisbourg be decided. If the place be taken we shall keep them, and will put them on the roster of one of our battalions, with which they will do duty; if not, we shall send them back this fall.

The King's frigate La Valeur, commanded by Sieur Canon, a famous cruiser, is the bearer of this despatch.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

P. S. Since writing my letter we learn that the English had not as yet opened the trench on the 8th of this month before Louisbourg; they were then encamped only one thousand toises from the place, and had lost 1500 men in killed and wounded. 'Tis reported that sickness prevails among their land forces, and that misunderstanding exists between Admiral Boscawen and the Commander of the land forces. Our troops are in the best possible spirits, perfect understanding exists everywhere; that begins to tranquillize us somewhat in regard to the fate of the place. Nevertheless no flattering hopes must be entertained. The bravery of the garrison can be relied on, but 'tis very feeble, regard being had to the condition of the place.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Massiac.

Camp at Carillon, 28th July, 1758

My Lord,

Since the night of the eighth, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, full of advantageous ideas, which experience in war and knowledge of a frontier he has never seen, would soon make him lay aside, does not cease writing to me by his letters of the twelfth, sixteenth, and seventeenth, that it is possible, by means of strong detachments, to oblige the enemy to abandon their position at the head of Lake St. Sacrament. I am justified in apprehending that he presents this chimerical idea as practicable, inasmuch as it has indirectly come to my ears that he had, last year, written to the same effect on the possibility of the siege of Fort Lydius.

I have the honor to annex hereunto the extracts of the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letters, dated the twelfth, fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth, and my answers beside each. I flatter myself that you will find them as firm as they are respectful.

You may, my Lord, assure his Majesty that diversity of opinions will never injure his service, so far as I am concerned. 'Tis to this diversness of opinions, and to the respectful firmness I always infuse into it, that the Chouaguen expedition is due. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, after having desired it, was ready to renounce it, and I encouraged him only by memoirs.

In case doubts are entertained of the strength of the English on this continent, I can assure you according to the almanac which they had printed in New-York on the first of January, 1758, that they had then twenty regiments of regulars from Old England, five independent companies, two companies of artillery, and that their regiments consist of ten companies of one hundred men each. They have also forwarded by sea a large force for the siege of Louisbourg.

I am respectfully,

My Lord,

Your most humble, &c.

Correspondence between M. de Vaudreuil and M. de Montcalm.

Extract from the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letter to the Marquis de Montcalm, 12 July, 1758.

Our circumstances are sufficiently favorable, Sir, not to lose sight of the great advantage we have acquired over our enemies by your victory of the eighth of this month. Their retreat to old Fort George may be with a view to fortify and arrange themselves there, and to dispose all things so as to be ready to march after the reunion of their troops who are employed at the siege of Louisbourg. But whatever may be their views, and whatever interpretations we may put upon them, all must engage us to employ every means so as not to allow them time to adopt new measures which, whatever they be, would always seriously prejudice us, in regard to the small quantity of provisions we have, and to the necessity of having our Canadians back to save the harvest. I enter strongly, Sir, into the projects you have formed on this subject; the retreat and terror even of the enemy, only augment my anxiety to forward to you all the forces at my disposal; that is to say, I send you all the militia belonging to the government that are fit for duty, to execute such movements as you will deem proper; you have already many of these men, and some will reach you every day, so that exclusive of Indians, your strength will be considerable. 'Tis of importance, Sir, that we always have strong detachments both on the lake and at the head of the bay. They could not be too numerous, so as to harrass our enemies constantly, cut off their communication with old Fort George, and intercept their convoys. No better manœuvre is in our power to force them to abandon their position, batteaux, artillery, campaign train, provisions, &c. 'Twill oblige them to retire, and thereby deprive them forever of all hope of renewing their attempt.

Observations of the Marquis de Montcalm in answer to the preceding Letter.
16th July, 1758.

This part of the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letter appears to have been written only with a view to make the Marquis de Montcalm responsible for all the events that may arise, so as to say: I have sent him all the forces of the Colony; he has had them for a month, and did not know how to profit by them, in order to prevent the enemy establishing himself at Fort George. If, on the contrary, the Marquis de Montcalm was marching with all his forces and did not succeed, the Marquis de Vaudreuil would not fail to write: He has marched without orders and has compromised the Colony. 'Tis always astonishing that the Marquis de Vaudreuil considers himself qualified at a distance of fifty leagues to determine on operations of war in a country he has never seen, and where the best Generals, after having seen it, would have been embarrassed. The Marquis de Vaudreuil forgets that that army was at least 20,000 strong, and, according to several prisoners, 25,000. Supposing that it had lost in killed and wounded 5,000 men; that a portion of the Provincials had returned, they would still have 12 @ 14,000 men, and consequently the superiority in the field, and would be at liberty to do as they pleased in their country.

'Tis with pain, and without departing from the respect which is due, that we are obliged to add that the part of the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letter which is italicised, is the work of a thoughtless Secretary and not of a man skilled in war. A communication is not cut off except by proceeding with a respectable force between two bodies, and a superior enemy in force is not compelled to abandon a position by simple detachments. He may nevertheless abandon it, and that will be the consequence of a change of plan on his part rather than of our movements; this is what we shall learn on the earliest day.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil will find in my Observations some distrust of him; this will never prevent me applying myself to the good of the service and of the Colony without embarrassing myself with what people might write against me, either directly or indirectly. But I do not conceal from the Marquis de Vaudreuil, that I shall be able to demonstrate to him on my return to Montreal, that, if he has had the goodness in his despatches of last year to pay me some eulogiums which I cannot merit, he did not omit persuading the Minister of the Marine that he had supplied me with the means of laying siege to Lydius. Although the King's service ought not to suffer anything at my hands on account of that, and I shall on all occasions afford the Marquis de Vaudreuil tokens of respect and affection, 'twere desirable that, forgetful of the past, we should labor without delay on a new plan, and that I should not have to complain of, or to dread the obscurities and doubts of his instructions and letters.

Extract of the Letter which accompanied the preceding Observations.

When you think it necessary, Sir, to withdraw the Canadians, on account of provisions and the harvest, I shall endeavor to do without them. I shall never answer for any event, but certainly, that the General and the troops will do their utmost. I expect, however, that, even during the harvest, you will leave me a certain number of Canadians, and these good ones, with some Indians. These, Sir, are my plans. Do you think the enemy will persist in remaining at Fort George? We shall endeavor to drive him thence. I am ready to march thither with the entire army. Such will not be my advice, but a distinct order from you will be sufficient for me. If it be by the head of the bay, I leave this place exposed to the enemy; if by Lake St. Sacrament, 'twill require a land march (portage) of three weeks, exhaust the army by fatigue and delay the harvest. If they be willing to retire voluntarily of themselves and in consequence of the movements I shall make, I shall be overjoyed.

Were I so fortunate, Sir, as that your important occupations would permit you to be at the head of the army, you would see everything yourself, and I should have the satisfaction to receive clearer and less embarrassing orders, and you would have judged that I have combined boldness, prudence and some activity. All this does not prevent, however, that the Colony, on the eighth of July, had been played for (jouée) odd or even (de pair ou non.)

You perceive, Sir, that, as usual, I express myself to you with truth and respectful firmness. The same love of truth prompts me to inform you that I demand my recall from both Ministers, and that I request President Molé<sup>1</sup> and M. Lablée, Count de Bernitz to solicit it. If you will be so good, Sir, as to unite with them in obtaining that favor for me, it will make me forget all the annoyances I may have had. I shall preserve, in return, a gratitude which will equal the respect with which I am, &c.

P. S. The desire of economising the provisions was the cause, Sir, of our having been without Indians in the affair of the eighth. You must recollect that I had foreseen it. I had requested you, three weeks before I left, to go and raise the war-song among the Abenakis and to let me bring them with me. If you send me all the Militia of the government of Montreal, shall we not fall, without any determinate object, into an opposite and unfortunate extreme?

Extract of the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letters to the Marquis de Montcalm; 15th July, 1758.

'Tis a very proper time, Sir, to finish whatever regards Carillon, and may increase its defence, but we have nothing more urgent than to profit by the immense advantage of the precipitate retreat, consternation and ancient discouragement of our enemies. The proofs we have thereof are not equivocal, and everything must induce us to profit by a circumstance so favorable in order to oblige them to abandon their position at old Fort George. I cannot sufficiently reiterate to you, Sir, all that I have had the honor to observe to you on that point. You are, in fact, now in a position to have constantly considerable detachments of Regulars, Canadians and Indians along the lake and head of the bay, to harass our enemies with vigor, to cut off their communication with Lydius, to intercept their convoys, to force them to retire and perhaps even to abandon their artillery, field train, bateaux, provisions, ammunition, &c. These movements are worthy your attention; they must be decisive for this Colony, since thereby we can deprive our enemies forever of the power of renewing a similar enterprise. You perceive, besides, Sir, that we can be sufficiently fortunate to enrich the Colony, at the same time, with whatever we shall oblige the enemy to abandon.

This is of such great consequence that, so far from reducing the forces that I have destined for you, I have nothing more pressing than to increase them, and to hasten their departure to you. You have the elite of our officers, of our young men, of our Canadians and of our Indians. They will act with as much zeal as ardor in the movements you will order them to execute, inasmuch as their early return will depend thereon. I request you to announce this to them, and you will see that they will perform wonders. We should have to reproach ourselves with losing so fine an opportunity of utterly humbling our enemies.

16th July.

I cannot forbear having the honor again of renewing to you, Sir, all the observations I have submitted to you in my last letter. You cannot want for canoes, Canadians and Indians to send out large detachments. We could not have a finer opportunity to oblige the enemy to retire from old Fort George.

Extract of the Marquis de Montcalm's letter in answer, 18th July, 1758.

M. d'Ailleboud is arrived this moment and hands me the letter you have done me the honor to write me on the 15th. As it generally contains only the same things you have done me the honor to write me on the 12th, I have already answered them, whereunto I shall add, that I have not been able to send large detachments by Lake St. Sacrament until I have reëstablished my camps at the Falls and Portage, and sent over bateaux and canoes, a manœuvre which is done only when executed, and advances less expeditiously in fact than in theory. Up to this time I have done impossibilities in Canada with my slender means. I shall endeavor to do my best and require no spur. Happy (would it be) were you at the head of the army; you would then judge very correctly, Sir, on every point.

To profit by the fear of enemies, would require to be in a condition to pursue them the very next day. An army that can be pursued only by detachments ten or twelve days afterwards, gets rid of its fright.

Extract of the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letter to the Marquis de Montcalm, 17th July, 1758.

You perceive, Sir, that I have not neglected anything for the prompt conveyance to you of a great number of Indians and the élite of our Canadians. You have now a very considerable force; therefore, we have nothing better to do, as I have had the honor to observe to you, than to employ them, without the loss of a moment, in vigorously harassing our enemies, cutting off their communication with Fort Lydius and intercepting their convoys. We have no better manœuvre to oblige them to abandon their position at old Fort George. Their consternation and discouragement ought even make you hope that, finding them hard pressed, they will perhaps be under the necessity of abandoning their artillery, bateaux, etc., and will think only of their flight to Fort Lydius.

What I have had the honor to write to you on this subject in many of my letters, merits, Sir, your attention. Your brilliant affair must not remain incomplete; 'tis important that we place our enemies in the real impossibility of returning to the charge, for so long as we shall have a fear of their renewing the attempt this fall, our provisions are being consumed without any benefit, and perhaps when our Canadians [will be under the necessity of returning for the harvest] you will be obliged to retain them at Carillon, or else, having constantly on the lake and at the head of the bay, very large detachments of troops, Canadians and Indians on the track of our enemies, you will terminate your campaign in a few days, in a manner not to leave us anything to apprehend for our frontier. These reasons, Sir, lead me to defer writing to France, because, in rendering the Court an account of your brave affair of the eighth of this month, I hope to inform it that we have not neglected the great advantage of the retreat and discouragement of our enemies, and that we have rendered it impossible for them to make any new attempts at least for this year; and if we are so fortunate as to make them abandon their field train, &c., they will not have it in their power for a long time to undertake a similar expedition. You know how much the Court will be charmed by all these events. I shall therefore postpone writing my despatches for a fortnight. Thus, Sir, you will have time to prepare yours.

Extract of the Marquis of Montcalm's letter in answer, 26 July.

Sir, I now answer the letters you have done me the honor to write me on the 16 and 17th. The large detachments you desire, have been, and will continue to be organized. M. de St. Luc is out with 5 @ 600 Indians or Canadians, but is he to fight convoys which the enemy do not form? Should he meet with the greatest success and surprise the fort containing their supplies, the enemy will never abandon their position, as you expect. I request you to pay attention that now when I have two months provisions at St. Frederic, the English General might have beaten and intercepted your convoys, you would not order me to abandon the position I actually occupy.<sup>1</sup>

In regard to the consternation you always suppose that army to be in; 'twas considerable on the eighth and ninth, but now we are in the 26th. The art of war demands a thing to have been done, in order to be able to judge of the enemy's operations.<sup>1</sup> Again a people are mistaken, and I do not hesitate to assert that the wars of Canada which have preceded this one, do in no wise resemble it.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Massiac.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Letter written by the Marquis de Montcalm to the Minister of the Marine, and put into cipher by M. Doreil, to be transmitted to My Lord Marshal the Duke de Belle Isle, 28 July, 1758.

My Lord,

The situation of the Colony is most critical should peace not interpose. The English command, including the troops of their Colonies, over fifty thousand men, notwithstanding the Louisbourg expedition they have had thirty thousand in the field this campaign against Canada, which opposes thereto eight battalions amounting to three thousand two hundred men; the remainder, Colonial troops, whereof two hundred only are in the field; of the surplus at Quebec, Montreal, the Beautiful river, Upper countries and Canadians, no more than about twelve hundred have been this year in the field, either here or at the Beautiful river. I consider in the field those who have made the entire campaign. Two thousand four hundred Canadians have been loaned us from the thirteenth of July, when there was no further use of them, to the 12th August, when they were recalled for the harvest. Could a larger number of them be drafted, I believe yet 'twill ever be impossible to keep over three thousand during the entire campaign without undermining the country. As for the rest, these people, like the Indians are fit only for forays, and do not know what it is to remain five months in the field. The Indians are well adapted to forays; they must not be calculated on for one year's capital.

With so small a force, how preserve, without a miracle from the Beautiful river to Lake St. Sacrament, and attend to the descent on Quebec; 'tis an [im]possibility. Whoever will write to the contrary of what I advance, will deceive the King. However unpalatable soever it be, 'tis my duty, as a citizen, to write it. This is not discouragement on my part, nor on that of the troops, for we are resolved to bury ourselves under the ruins of the Colony. 'Twould require fifteen hundred recruits of a good description, making allowance for deserters, or one man per company to place our battalions at fifty; it has been impossible to complete them to forty for want of the recruits taken in the passage; and six battalions of seventeen companies and the companies placed before their departure at fifty, with some provisions for their support for one year.

In proposing the only means of coping with the immense forces of the English, I am but too apprehensive that it will not be possible for France to send these succors, owing to the superiority of the English army. But the English set too large a force on foot in this continent to expect ours to resist them, and to look for a continuation of miracles which saved the country from three attacks.

I this moment learn that they have penetrated to Frontenac. I feared it long ago. The Colony will be cut in two.

I take the liberty to reiterate to my Lord Marshal Belle Isle, the assurances of my profound respect,

DOREIL.

M. Doreil to M. de Crenille.

Quebec, 28th July, 1758.

Sir,

I hope that all the letters I have the honor to write to you this year in triplicate will have reached you; viz: one on the 30th of April, one on the 15th, and one on the 22nd of June. Duplicates of the two last go with this dispatch by the frigate LaValeur. Those letters, those I have written this year to the Marquis de Paulmy, numbering ten, and my correspondence with Marshal de Belleisle, will have sufficiently instructed you in regard to what regards my duties; what has occurred in this hemisphere and our situation which has improved in consequence of an event incredible to posterity.

I had the honor to communicate to you, in my short despatch of the 22nd June, the intelligence that the Marquis de Montcalm had just then put me in possession of, as to the proposed projects of the enemy to march in force to the Oyo river and to attack Fort Duquesne. In fact, everything was to be apprehended and little to be hoped. We were too bare in that quarter, and the fort is not capable of a good defense. By the avowal of M. Dumas, who has been in command there, it is fit only to dishonor the officer who would be intrusted with its defence. Five hundred men have been sent thither, and the intelligence we have received about it, joined to the event which has just happened at Lake St. Sacrament, convinces us that the enemy sought, by his proceeding, only to excite our jealousy for that quarter in the same way that he had won over some deputies of the Five Iroquois Nations, in order to engage the Marquis de Vaudreuil to send to their country a detachment of 2 or 3000 men, so as to divide our forces, whilst the enemy would be marching with all his might to surprise the Marquis de Montcalm, on the frontier of Lake St. Sacrament, where he had only about 3,700 men, almost all regiments of the Line.

Hardly had they reassembled and scarcely had he arrived in person at the camp before Carillon, having been able to set out from Montreal only on the 25 June, when he received intelligence from all parts, that the English already assembled at old Fort George, to the number of 25 to 30 thousand men with artillery and necessary material for a siege, were making preparations to set out to attack him and Carillon. M. de Montcalm lost no time; he prayed and urged M. de Vaudreuil anew to send him reinforcements, and, meanwhile, arranged his little army in the best manner to try at least to arrest the further progress of the enemy, resolved to fall back on Carillon and to fight there notwithstanding the great inequality. He was so good as to communicate everything to me, and I avow to you, Sir, that I trembled for the result, the rather as we knew that the enemy had about ten thousand of excellent regular troops from Europe. In fact there was enough to make one shudder. Fort Carillon is not finished. It is capable of containing only a garrison of 400 men; provisions only for 10 @ '12 days; no Indians; no retreat.

The enemy could land above Carillon without fighting, cut off the communication of that fort with that of St. Frederic and consequently with Montreal, and afterwards march against this last place, leaving a third of his army to blockade those two forts and M. de Montcalm. That General would have no other course to pursue, his provisions being consumed, than to surrender himself with his little army, prisoners of war, and perhaps at discretion. The total loss of the Colony would follow. 'Twould be found cut in two and its forces destroyed, for whatever would encounter the passage of the enemy on the route from St. Frederic to Fort St. John, and from Fort St. John to Montreal, would inevitably be beaten in detail. Forts St. John and Chambly which are, especially the latter, miserable huts, would be carried by assault together with the supplies for the army, to which they serve as entrepôts.

Such, Sir, was the melancholy situation of this Colony when the enemy commenced appearing on the 6th instant at daybreak on Lake St. Sacrament. As many as 700 barges were then counted. The vanguard, composed of six thousand picked men, landed first. We had in advance only three feeble battalions under the orders of M. de Bourlamaque, the only ones fit to contest the landing. The inequality of the forces, the just fear of being cut off and enveloped, determined the Colonel to fall back on the camp at the Falls where the Marquis de Montcalm was posted with four battalions. That place is only half a league from Carillon on which the General retreated entirely that evening. He had left the three battalions of Berry guarding the fort.

The Marquis de Montcalm, on arriving, set the whole army at work at the abatis, under the direction of Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Pont le Roy and Desandrouins. The work was commenced with order, continued the day of the 7th, and completed the morning of the 8th. Never was work finished so apropos, nor of such essential utility for the good of the state. Too much cannot be said on this occasion in commendation of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Pont le Roy and Desandrouins.

The enemy deployed at half-past noon on the same day, the 8th, in four principal columns; advanced within 45 paces with great boldness; and were received with heroic firmness and courage, and always repulsed for the space of seven hours of the briskest and most obstinate fighting. Never was there a day so fortunate and so glorious for the King's troops. I shall not enter into a detail of it, Sir; to supply this, I think you will be pleased to take cognizance of the letter I have the honor to address to Marshal de Belleisle, which accompanies the duplicates of those written on the 9th by the Marquis de Montcalm to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, communicating his victory and the circumstances of that ever memorable day to his Excellency.

It has cost us dear in officers, and M. de Bourlamaque received on the occasion a very dangerous wound. The loss of soldiers is not in proportion.

What increase of good fortune for the Colony and for France, had the Marquis de Montcalm had only 2 @ 300 Indians and smart Canadians to join a strong detachment of troops which he would have sent in pursuit of the enemy, who effected their retreat in terror and in the greatest disorder, abandoning a portion of their wounded. Their loss in killed and wounded exceeded 5000 men. We are certain of more than two thousand corpses. They have had two generals killed, one or two colonels, and the major general.<sup>1</sup> The English have vigorously attacked and maintained the fight with great courage, having their best troops always at the head of the columns. But the least of our soldiers performed miracles, and the officers, prodigies of valor.

What praise do not the Commandants of corps equally deserve? What firmness, coolness and wisdom did not Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Levis and de Bourlamaque exhibit? What would have to be said of the Marquis de Montcalm, is beyond all eulogium. Conqueror of Chouaguen and of Fort George, ever victorious since his arrival in Canada, nothing more was wanting to his glory than to save the Colony at the moment decisive of its loss. In his letter to M. de Vaudreuil, you remark, Sir, that, whilst heaping praises upon all those who have fought under his orders, he has the modesty of saying of himself: "Mine was only the glory of finding myself the General of such brave troops," &c. Who after that would believe that such a man is serving here with considerable annoyance? This, nevertheless, is but too certain; he therefore is thinking of his retreat, which, I hope, will be followed by mine.

You are too kind to me, Sir, and Marshal de Belleisle is too just to allow me to fear being sacrificed any longer. I shall treat this subject elsewhere.

I am, with much respect,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

P. S. Were it not for the cipher, I would have the honor to send you copy of my letter to Marshal de Belleisle. I confine myself to sending you, Sir, copy of the Marquis de Montcalm's two letters to M. de Vaudreuil, and the return of the killed and wounded.

Since writing my letter to Marshal de Belleisle we learn from Louisbourg that the English had not yet opened the trenches up to the 8th of this month. They were then only one thousand toises from the place, and had lost 1500 men in killed and wounded. 'Tis reported that sickness prevails among their land forces. Our troops are in the best disposition possible. Perfect understanding exists everywhere. We are thereby somewhat tranquilized as regards the fate of the place. Nevertheless, we must not flatter ourselves with any hopes. The valor of the troops may well be relied on, but they are too few for the poor condition of the place and for the use of the enemy.

M. Doreil to M. de Paulmy.

Quebec, 30th July, 1758.

My Lord,

The letter wherewith you have honored me on the 26th February last, which has been handed me by M. Bernier, confirms to me your retreat and my misfortune. I am inconsolable, my Lord, in no longer serving under the orders of a Minister whom I cherish as much as I respect, and on whose protection I grounded all the hopes of my promotion and of the favors whereof I may be susceptible. In losing you, my Lord, I have also lost the hope of returning this year to France. I was expecting everything from your goodness in this regard ; I was flattering myself that you would deign cast a favorable glance on my most humble representations, and that you would be pleased to remember that I should not have consented to abandon my family and domestic affairs after the losses I had then experienced, had yourself, my Lord, not assured me that my absence would be only for a year and a half, or two years at most. So long an expatriation, the circumstances of a service beyond the seas, altogether extraordinary, a service moreover, of labor, inasmuch as, up to this moment, I have been obliged to discharge it alone, had led me to expect, this year, some favor from the King, and I had taken the liberty, my Lord, to inform you of that which was most flattering to me. Had the Marquis de Montcalm's dispatches of the month of November reached you, you would have seen, my Lord, that that General considered me then entitled to it. May I, at least, hope that you will have the kindness to recommend me, on this point and whatever may interest me, to Marshal de Belleisle. I have, indeed, the honor of being known to him, but he probably does not possess the same goodness whereof you have given me so many proofs.

M. Bernier, whom you have designated, my Lord, to come and serve with me, arrived in the last days of June. When I was about instructing him to enable him to aid me he fell seriously ill, and has been in a dangerous condition for more than 15 days. This danger has passed, but his convalescence will be slow, and I shall not be able to derive any assistance from him for a long time, more especially as he is altogether a novice in the duties of Commissary at War, which differ here, in many essential respects, from the service in France. Notwithstanding this additional inconvenience, nothing will suffer more than hitherto. I expect, even, in the course of the winter, to instruct M. Bernier sufficiently that he may be qualified to replace me next year. He has talent and intelligence, and I shall have him assisted by M. de la Rochette, my Secretary, who is conversant with all the details of the Commissariat.

I have had the honor to write you, in all, ten letters this year in triplicate, reckoning from the 26th February to the 16th June, in answer to those I have received from you, and to continue to keep you instructed ; and have rendered an account of the service with which I am intrusted. The letters will have passed into the hands of Marshal de Belleisle, except one, my Lord, which was private.

My last, of the 16th June, will have communicated to you my fears in regard to the smallness of the force furnished the Marquis de Montcalm wherewith to oppose the enemy on the Lake St. Sacrament frontier, whilst a detachment of 2,000 men d'élite, exclusive of a considerable number of Indians, was detailed to march into the country of the Five Nations and against Corlar, on a slender hope held out by those Nations, who have always been treacherous than they would be able to take up the hatchet for us and strike the English. This Colony was placed within an ace of its ruin, by that diversion, which was concluded on by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, without having consulted the Marquis de Montcalm, who justly pretended that a detachment of 4 @ 500 men, at most, was sufficient. Scarcely was the Marquis de Montcalm arrived at the camp of Carillon, on the 30th of June last, than he had the enemy on his shoulders to the number of 25,000 men, 3,000 of whom were Regulars from Europe, besides 500 Indians. He had but about 3,500 men, whereof 400 only were Colonials and Militia. The plan of the enemy was to carry Fort Carillon, to defeat our little army and to penetrate into the interior of the Colony. Might they not flatter themselves with success? Nevertheless, O ever memorable day! and one which posterity will scarcely credit, that formidable, hostile army has been repulsed, beaten and routed on the heights of Carillon, where the Marquis de Montcalm was waiting for it with firmness, under the protection of indifferent intrenchments constructed, in 24 hours, of abatis composed of trees laid one on the other. The enemy have lost, on that occasion, 5,000 of their best Regulars, killed or wounded, two Generals and the Major-General. All was achieved by the incredible valor of both officer and lowest soldier. They knew 'twas necessary to conquer or to die; they have done wonders. Nothing can be compared to the conduct and firmness of Chev. de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque. The former has received several shots without being wounded; the latter has been wounded very dangerously. He has had his collar bone and shoulder blade broken; nevertheless, he appears, since some days, out of danger. During the whole of the engagement, which lasted several long hours, the Marquis de Montcalm exposed himself the same as the commonest soldier, and from the centre, where he was posted, repaired successively to all points to issue his orders and to convey reinforcements to the spots which were in danger. The General is so far above all eulogium, that I pass over all he merits. Conqueror of Chouaguen, of Fort William Henry, with a very small force and means! all that was wanting to his glory was to save Canada at the moment she was cut in two and irremediably lost; to gain the victory with French troops only, and (what never happened and never does occur) without Indians, the enemy having 500 of them. What I admire most is, that this worthy General, writing on the 6th to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, to express to him all the danger of his situation and to reiterate his entreaties for reinforcements, said:

"Meanwhile I hope much from the valor and will of the troops; I perceive those people yonder march with precaution and are picking their steps. If they allow me time to reach the position I have selected, on the heights which command Fort Carillon, I will beat them," &c. And in his letter informing the Governor-General of his astonishing victory, after having eulogized almost all the officers individually, he has the modesty to say, "As for myself, I have only the merit of finding myself the General of such brave troops," &c. Who would believe after that, my Lord, that such a man is serving with so much annoyance as to be forced, as well as myself, to demand his recall?

To enable you the better to judge of what he has just done, I have the honor to transmit you here annexed, my Lord, copy of his Narrative. 'Tis as much on his part as on my own, for I conclude he will be unable, for want of a copyist, to address you one himself. It is the same that he transmits to Marshal de Belleisle, M. de Moras and M. de Cremille.

You will have learned, my Lord, before receiving this despatch, the expedition of the enemy against Isle Royale. A fleet, consisting of 22 or 24 ships of war, 14 frigates or bomb ketches, and 120 transports with forty barges, made their appearance off that island on the first of June, having a landing force of 17 @ 18 thousand men. We had, at the time, in the port of Louisbourg, six men of war and three frigates, which are blockaded there. M. de Bregnon, captain in the navy, commanding le Bizarre, 64, loaded with provisions and ammunition and armed as a packet boat (en flûte), entered the harbor in view of the English fleet, remained there 8 days and sailed in the night of the 8th and 9th, passed through the enemy's ships and fortunately arrived here with his cargo which was not needed at Louisbourg.

Five 64 gun ships, under the orders of M. du Chaffault,<sup>1</sup> were unable to enter the port; they landed the battalion of Cambis at Port Daupin and have come here. The enemy landed there on the 8th of June; lost some people and would have lost more had the battalions of Artois and Bourgogne, which did wonders at Gabarus, not been cut off by a strong detachment of the enemy which had climbed a rock that was deemed inaccessible. We have just received news from that Island, dated 8th of July. At that time the English were encamped within one thousand toises of the place. They had lost 1,500 men, and had not yet opened the trenches. Sickness is reported in their army, misunderstanding between Admiral Boscawen and the General of the land forces. Ours are in the best disposition and perfect accord prevails. All that begins to afford hope for the fate of that island; nevertheless, its escape from the English cannot reasonably be expected. The bravery of the troops can well be depended on; but the place is good for little or nothing, and the enemy is master of the sea.

I make use, as you perceive beforehand, my Lord, of the permission which I have solicited, to have the honor of writing to you occasionally. I shall continue to do so, if agreeable to you. I shall satisfy thereby my inclination and sentiments of gratitude and attachment which I flatter myself you do not doubt.

I am, with most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

Quebec, 31st July, 1758.

My Lord,

This letter is more important than those I have just had the honor of writing to you, dated the 25th and 30th of this month. I should annex thereunto a detailed account of the operations of that campaign and principally of the glorious affair of the 8th, were I not certain that the Marquis de Montcalm has the honor of sending you one, which leaves nothing to be desired. But I must not observe silence on what the General, through modesty, does not express. All that he has performed since his arrival in America, without forces and without means, so to speak, is admirable and even incredible under all the circumstances, to those who had not a near view of them. What he has done in saving Canada, at the moment it was most in danger, is so much above all eulogium, that I confine myself to two points, which have struck me with admiration.

The Marquis de Montcalm writing on the 6th to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, to expose the danger of his situation and to reiterate his entreaties for reinforcements, assumed nevertheless the tone of a conqueror. He said to him: "I hope much from the will and bravery of the French troops. I perceive that those people yonder are marching with precaution and are picking their steps; if they afford me time to reach the position I have selected on the heights of Carillon, I will beat them," &c. And in his letter informing that Governor-General of his astonishing victory, after having made the eulogium of almost all the officers individually, he has the modesty to say to him, "For myself, I have only the merit of finding myself the General of such brave troops," &c. How beautiful that is, my Lord! Who would believe, nevertheless, that such a Chief is serving with so much annoyance that he is forced to demand his recall? Having left his cypher at Montreal, he is unable, my Lord, to have the honor to write you as he would desire, and commissions me to supply the defect. To satisfy him, I employ the cypher furnished me on my departure by Count d'Argenson, the duplicate whereof is in M. de Fumeron's office. I use it also with M. de Crémille.<sup>1</sup>

The following, then, is what he has instructed me to communicate to you:

What follows to the end was in cipher in the original. Neglect, ignorance, tardiness and obstinacy have thought of irremediably losing the Colony. To save it has required a miracle and supernatural bravery of the French troops. After so grand an event, no excuse can be resorted to but the want of provisions. The first convoy from Bourdeaux [consisting] of ten thousand barrels of flour, had nevertheless arrived at Quebec the nineteenth of May, and there was a quantity of it at Fort Chambli and St. John before the end of June. M. de Vaudreuil is not excusable in having uselessly detained at Montreal the Colonial troops and the Militia and Indians, inasmuch as Chevalier de Levis arrived at Chibouton<sup>2</sup> on the morning of the eighth of July, preceded on the night of the seventh by four hundred picked men belonging to the French troops of his detachment. At least the 400 Colonials and the nearly 800 of Canadians whose destination was the same, and the Indians assembled at Montreal, might use the same diligence in joining the Marquis de Montcalm, had they been ordered to do so. This great proof is sufficiently strong, not to offer any other. The Indians themselves have complained, and some of the Colony have murmured at the loss of their time in Montreal and at the affected sojourns which have been made at La prairie de la Madeleine, St. Johns and elsewhere. Since the battle, M. de Vaudreuil sends too many Canadians, who did not begin to arrive until the thirteenth, and that with a view to write to the Minister of the Marine, that the Marquis de Montcalm has not known how to profit by his victory. As if one could go like a fool with about six thousand men, two thousand of whom were Militia, in pursuit of an enemy who has yet fourteen to fifteen thousand men intrenched in a single camp, and a start of ten days. We may be convinced he is capable of so doing, since he has truly dared to write last year that the Marquis de Montcalm, after the capture of Fort William Henry, could have undertaken the siege of Fort Lidius or Edward, where the enemy had six or seven thousand men, and could in twice twenty-four hours convey double the number from Orange, whilst the Marquis de Montcalm, who had six thousand at most, was obliged, out of this number, to send back the Canadians for the harvest, and all the Upper country Indians had gone away, and a portage of six leagues had to be made without horses or carriages, in order to arrive at the object. This is a calumny without example, after which much greater acts of treachery may be expected.

In all views of the case, Fort Carillon is worth nothing and costs the King as much as Brisack. An ignoramus constructed it—a relative of M. de Vaudreuil, whose fortune 'twas desirous to make and who has made it. See in this connection, M. de Pont le Roy's memoir,<sup>1</sup> which I have put into cipher. Ineptness, intrigue, lies, cupidity, will in a short time destroy this Colony, which costs the King so dearly. If it escape this year, which is not yet certain, as the enemy can return in greater strength and with more precaution, 'tis absolutely necessary to conclude peace this winter, my Lord, or the Colony will belong to the English next year, whatever M. Vaudreuil may write or cause to be written or to be said; it is of the greatest importance to change the entire administration when peace is made; should the making of it be delayed, change this moment the general government, otherwise the Marquis de Montcalm will have sustained this machine, always threatening to tumble, in order to see it perish at last, and perhaps be the unjust victim of it. For two years he has not ceased talking of the expedition and descent the enemy may effect at Quebec. There is no disposition either to foresee or to order anything; he uses his ruined health, his purse; sees all the evil, is penetrated by it, unable to remedy it or to do any good. He demands his recall, and in the meanwhile serves as usual. He will owe ten thousand écus on the first of January. His disinterestedness excites criticism and jealousy and attracts enmity. He has had a great deal of trouble in quieting the French officer and soldier, who at last, after more than three years' suffering, have exploded; the latter during the action of the eighth, have made several remarks worthy of being collected; here is one among the rest: "M. de Vaudreuil has sold the country, but f . . . ! we will not suffer him to deliver it up. He has sacrificed us in order to have our throats cut. Let us defend them. Long live the King and our General."

Peace, Peace, my Lord, no matter at what sacrifice as regards boundaries; 'twill be so much gained if people will work well when 'twill be concluded. 'Tis necessary that the Marquis de Montcalm inform his Minister so as to enable him to advise the King. He will continue to report to him, but perhaps flatters himself that his despatches reach him. The principal ones of last year have been intercepted or stopped at the Bureau of the Marine. He will not write again to the Minister of the Marine except for form sake, and through pure politeness, without any detail. Also, his despatches can never quadrate with those of M. de Vaudreuil. This interruption or retention of the Marquis de Montcalm's despatches, is the cause that no French officer, deserving of the favors demanded, has received any, whilst the officers of the Colony have received theirs. This is a pity, and an affliction for the troops that serve so well and have performed wonders. The Marquis de Paulmy has had the goodness to express his regret at not having received the recommendations.

After these details on the part of the Marquis de Montcalm, permit me, my Lord, to add from myself, some arguments in favor of peace, without which this country is lost. It has been maintained by a miracle up to the present time and with nothing, by the conduct, talents and virtue of the Marquis de Montcalm, seconded by Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Levis, de Bourlamaque, by the bravery of the officers individually, by the goodness of the French soldier, and the great docility of us all. We are come to defend the country. We are ruining our health and purse in it. In return, we have experienced only unworthy preferences, endless injustices, calumnies, treachery. We have suffered through wisdom and the love of peace. We have sacrificed everything through zeal, for the King's service, and in order to establish good harmony. Three years passed in this cruel situation, at last weary their patience. The measure is full. The Marquis de Montcalm has only to reproach himself with too much goodness and deference. He asks you for his recall, my Lord; I am astonished that he has not demanded it sooner. On my knees I beg you to grant me mine, which I am long soliciting in vain. I have abandoned children in the cradle, and all my affairs in France. They are endangered for more than three years; occasion me considerable losses, and are completing my ruin there. Here 'tis impossible to live these two years past, on the King's allowance. The twelve thousand livres which I have, are equivalent to three thousand in France. Judge, my Lord, if it be possible to support oneself with a furnished house. I expect, in this regard, everything from your justice and your goodness. I have made every arrangement, this winter, so that the service will not possibly suffer by my departure, and I shall place the Marquis de Montcalm in a position to assure you thereof. Whether the war is to continue or not; if it be desirous to save and settle Canada solidly, let his Majesty confide the general government of it to the Marquis de Montcalm. He possesses political science as well as military talent; a statesman and a man of detail, a great worker, just, disinterested even to scruple, clear-sighted, active, and having nothing in view but the public good; in a word, a virtuous and universal man. I do not know whether this place would be to his liking, and perhaps he would be very little obliged to me if he imagined that I hazarded this proposition. I submit it, my Lord, only for the public good and through zeal for the King's service. Though M. de Vaudreuil should possess similar talents, he will always have one original drawback—he is a Canadian. That qualification is of more serious consequence than I can express. The Marquis de Montcalm is, at present, more thoroughly acquainted with what suits the country than M. Vaudreuil. He knows how to deal with the Indians, to attach them to him, and to make them act according to circumstances. They know him, love him, respect and fear him. 'Twas a popular error to imagine that M. de Vaudreuil was necessary in Canada solely on account of the Indians. It would be greatly to be desired that M. Duquesne had remained here until now, acting in concert with his friend the M<sup>te</sup> de Montcalm. They would have done great things. As for the rest, this place which may be very well filled, requires a general officer of the land service and not a marine. M. de Vaudreuil is neither the one nor the other. War is now carried on here the same as in Europe, and the functions of the Governor-General regard in nowise the Navy. Thus 'tis only within some thirty years that the Colony is governed by Marines, although war, previously, was not waged as it is to-day.

How surprised you, my Lord, and the entire kingdom will doubtless be, at not receiving, perhaps until the end of October, news of the great event which has just occurred. The frigate La Valeur, selected to carry the news, is commanded by Captain Canon, a famous privateer of Dunkirk. He is ready to sail these fifteen days, and I shall not be surprised if he will not be dispatched for a month. The same slowness prevails everywhere here. The vessel that carried the news of the fall of Chouaguen in 175, which was taken on the 14th of August, did not set sail until the 22nd 7<sup>her</sup>. The same delay occurred last year in forwarding the news of the capture of Fort William Henry. I am just assured that Captain Péan, Town-Major of Quebec, is to go to France in this frigate. If that be the case, he will be employed in carrying the news to M. de Moras. I shall adopt all possible precaution to make you receive the intelligence at the same time, and perhaps before. That will occasion another secret letter which I shall have the honor to write you on the eve of Captain Canon's departure.

This, my Lord, is a detail of very strong and very important matters which I deposit in the breast of my respectable Minister with full confidence, flattering myself that I shall not be compromised and that he will approve of my zeal, which is, in truth, all tested.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DORÉIL.

Montreal, 2nd August, 1758.

My Lord,

I have the honor to address you hereunto, copy :

1st Of the letter of General Abercromby wrote me on the 26th of last month,<sup>1</sup> which reached me only a few days after the affair of the 8th. That General detained, up to that time, the officer who conveyed my dispatches, and the small detachment which accompanied him.

2nd Of the parole of honor he has exacted, on the 21st July, from Captain Corriveaux of a company of our Militia, who was taken in the affair of the Baron de Dieskau.

3rd Of the power he gave, on the 21st July, to Colonel Schuyler to treat for his exchange and for that of the other English officers who are prisoners in this Colony, in lieu of French officers whom he has in his power.

4th Of the letter which that General has written on 21st July to the Marquis de Montcalm.

5th Of the letter the Marquis de Montcalm wrote to that General on the 24th July.

6th Of the letter which I have written, myself, to that General on the 1st of this month.

You will see, my Lord, that General Abercromby, far from being as particular as I have been, in inviolably executing the Capitulation of Fort William Henry, regards it, on the contrary, as null and void.

I shall wait to terminate the exchange of our prisoners taken since the 9th of August of last year in the manner I have proposed to General Abercromby, in order to have the honor to render you an account thereof.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Copy of the Letter written by General Abercromby to the Marquis de Vaudreuil from Fort Edward, 26th June, 1758.

Sir,

I have received the letter your Excellency had done me the honor to write me on the 4th of June, with divers observations on the subject of the Capitulation of Fort William Henry, concluded the 9th of August last. Without entering into any discussion, permit me to inform your Excellency that the infraction of that Capitulation committed by a part of the forces of the King, your master, immediately after the surrender of the fort, has been so manifestly contrary to the good faith which exists among all nations, that, in honor and justice to the King, my master, who has confided to me the command of his troops in North America, I find myself obliged to regard that Capitulation as null and void, which I make known to all the Governors and Commanders by sea and land in North America.

I persuade myself that, in considering things in a proper light, your Excellency will be convinced of the justice of my proceeding in regard to the Capitulation, and that nothing will induce you, by forgetting the laws of humanity, to use the least violence towards his Majesty's subjects, whether belonging to the Civil or Military departments, who are included in that Capitulation, and who might unfortunately fall into your hands, as that would oblige me and the other of his Majesty's Commanders by sea and land, to use reprisals on all his Most Christian Majesty's subjects, who are actually prisoners with us, or who may become so hereafter.

Permit me once more to inform your Excellency that I am determined to carry on the war with all possible humanity, agreeably to the intentions of the King, my master, and nothing will induce me to adopt contrary measures except the infractions which the troops of the King, your master, may commit in this regard.

In respect to the proposals which have been made for the exchange of Colonel Schuyler, Captain-Lieutenant Martin and Surgeon Stakes, it has been made solely in view not only of accommodating these gentlemen, but also M. Corriveau and the others who have an extreme desire to return to Canada; but since your Excellency does not approve that proposal, I shall let Colonel Schuyler and the other gentlemen know that they will have to repair immediately to Canada.

Your Excellency may be assured that the letters you have confided to my care will be forwarded.

- I shall always consider myself highly honored by being in correspondence with your Excellency, and I shall be charmed to seize every opportunity to convince you that I have the honor to be with the greatest respect, your Excellency's Parole of Captain Corriveau.

I, the undersigned, Jean Jacques Corriveau, Captain of Militia of the troops of Canada, a prisoner of war of his Majesty the King of Great Britain, taken in the month of August, 1755, having obtained from his Excellency Major-General James Abercromby, Esquire, Colonel of the 44th regiment of Infantry, Colonel-in-chief of the Royal American regiment and General-in-chief of all his Britannic Majesty's troops in North America, &c., &c., &c., [permission] to visit my family and attend to my private affairs, on condition of returning to New-York the 21st of January next, if I be not previously exchanged, do pledge my word of honor that during the last term of 6 months, I shall not in anywise meddle with any except my own private affairs, nor interfere in anywise in any military or other affair, which may in anywise prejudice his said Britannic Majesty or his arms. And that in case I be not exchanged at the time prescribed, I shall then surrender myself without delay to New-York, on the day abovementioned. In witness whereof I have signed these presents at the camp of Lake George, this 24 July, 1758, to serve as is reasonable.

Authority to Colonel Schuyler to effect an Exchange of Prisoners.

By his Excellency James Abercromby, Esquire, Colonel of the 44th regiment of Infantry, Colonel-in-chief of the Royal American regiment, Major-General and Commander-in-chief of his Majesty's forces levied and to be levied in North America, &c., &c.

To Peter Schuyler, Esquire,

Whereas we have in our hands one Captain, four Lieutenants and three Cadets of his most Christian Majesty's troops, who have been made prisoners in our last expedition against Carillon, and as the French, on the other hand have, besides yourself and Captain-lieutenant Martin of the regiment of Royal Artillery, who is returning to Canada in execution of your parole, Captain-Lieutenant Pringle, Lieutenant Roach and Ensign Downing,<sup>1</sup> for all whom I wish to make an exchange, which you would effect the more promptly and without any loss of time, as you will be on the spot, should his most Christian Majesty's General be willing to accede thereto. Wherefore these presents are to authorize and empower you to treat with his Excellency the Marquis de Vaudreuil, the Marquis de Montcalm or any other persons authorized on the part or for his most Christian Majesty, in order to effect the exchanges aforesaid of the prisoners on the following conditions, to wit, officer for officer of equal rank, namely, yourself, who hold the rank of Captain in the service, for Captain Bonneau, and the four French Lieutenants for Captain-Lieutenant Martin, Captain-Lieutenant Pringle, Lieutenant Roach and Ensign Downing; observing that such exchange be made on the conditions above expressed from hand to hand and not separately the one from the other of the aforesaid parties; and if such can be executed in that way, you are by these presents authorized to sign all act or acts necessary to this subject, which I engage to ratify.

Given under my hand and seal at Lake George this 21 day of July, 1758.

Copy of General Abercromby's letter to the Marquis de Montcalm.

Sir,

I have the honor to inform you by Lieutenant Smalk,<sup>1</sup> the bearer of this letter, that Captain Bonneau, Lieutenants Joubert, Larochelle, Chevalier de Rene and Chevalier Bernard, Sieur Granet and Permillat, Cadets with 144 non-commissioned officers or soldiers belonging to the troops under your orders, having been taken in the affair of the 6th have been treated with all possible humanity and care. I doubt not but you evince the like towards all the English officers and soldiers who will have fallen into your hands. I beg you to send me by the bearer a list of the officers with the number of soldiers. Under the escort which conducts this letter to your Excellency, go also Colonel Schuyler and Captain Martin, whom I have detained until now only in the view to do a favor to some of your officers who had solicited me to propose the exchange which I have offered to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, they appeared convinced that he would accept it with pleasure, but as he has refused the proposition, I send you back the two prisoners abovementioned, to convince your Excellency of the desire I feel that the war be carried on with humanity and generosity as in Europe and as it ought to be everywhere. I have not hesitated upon the entreaties of Captain Corriveau, to permit him to return on his parole to Canada for the purpose of arranging his affairs, and to that end have allowed him 6 months; which being expired, I expect, if he be not exchanged in the mean time, that he will return to New-York. Meanwhile, I request your Excellency if you are disposed for an exchange, to communicate your propositions to me on this point by the return of the bearer hereof. You must be aware, however good the treatment prisoners receive in the place of their captivity, they always have much to suffer.

I have the honor to be with great consideration,

Sir,

Copy of the Marquis de Montcalm's Letter to General Abercromby.

Camp at Carillon, 24th July, 1758.

Sir,

I received, yesterday evening, the letter your Excellency has done me the honor of writing to me by Lieutenant Smalk.<sup>1</sup> Colonel Schuyler and Captain Martin, whom I shall forward to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, have been given up to me at the same time. 'Tis at the request of these two officers that I have kept Lieutenant Smalk<sup>1</sup> to-day, that they may write by him. I feel all possible gratitude for the good treatment you have been pleased to show our officers and soldiers who are prisoners. I was well assured of it beforehand; it is unnecessary for me to observe to you that we shall do the same on every occasion, and for myself, personally, I shall always pay the most particular attention to it. I have the honor to address to your Excellency some letters for our officers who are prisoners, and one which I write personally to Captain de Bonneau, of the regiment of Guyenne. Your Excellency is not ignorant that the affair of the 8th continued until night-fall. I could not have the field of battle reconnoitred until the next day, and the delay of a night has been fatal to the wounded who remained there. I have paid the greatest attention to the removal of all those who remained on the ground, to the number of 70. In spite of all the care which I had taken of them, which was the same as that bestowed on our troops, the wounds having been considerable, the majority of them have died; 34 remain who have been fit to be conveyed with our own to Montreal, where they will be cared for with the greatest attention. A sergeant has come in, since the affair, who has given himself up as a prisoner, and an orderly sergeant of the New-York regiment. Among the number of wounded we have recognized only two officers, who were unconscious; no information could be got from them. I should think, by his commission, that one of them was George Needham, Captain of Thomas Murray's regiment;<sup>1</sup> a party has brought us in, since the affair, 7 prisoners, who have declared themselves as belonging to Nicholson's regiment lived in New England, before the affair, and since Captain Pringle and Lieutenant Roche have been taken prisoners, we have not had any other except one ensign of Lord Howe's regiment. A note thereof has been sent when Lieutenant Wolfs, of our troops, carried you the Marquis de Vaudreuil's answers. Some days after, we took 19 persons with one officer belonging to Robert Rogers' company.

Your Excellency must have remarked, from the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letters, that the obstacle to individual exchanges arises from the non-execution of the capitulation which I granted to the garrison of Fort W. H., and as there is question of my proper act, I can say nothing, except that I have nothing to reproach myself with on that occasion. I even believe that all England renders me justice, and during the 36 years that I have the honor of serving the King, my master, I believe I have never exposed myself personally so much as I have done to keep my word; as for the rest, no person would desire the exchanges more than I do; however well treated prisoners may be, their condition is always to be pitied, but although I have the honor to command the King's troops in war, I am subject to the orders of M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of New France; I send him copy of the letter you have done me the honor to write me; I request him to communicate to me promptly his intention, and if there were any means to apply a remedy, in order to respond to your views regarding individual exchanges, I shall have the honor to communicate them immediately to your Excellency, observing the same form you have observed in sending me Lieutenant Smalk,<sup>2</sup> to whom I furnish a detachment for his return and safety, which has orders to accompany him to within hail of your first post.

I thank you for the gracious permission you have granted to Sieur Corriveau, Captain of the militia, and answer you, that if there be no means of making exchanges, he will be surrendered at Fort Edward, at the expiration of the leave that you have been pleased to grant him.

I am, with the highest consideration,

Sir,

Your most humble, &c.,

Copy of the Letter written by the Marquis de Vaudreuil to General Abercromby, from Montreal, the 1st August, 1758.

Sir,

I have received the letter your Excellency has done me the honor of writing to me on the 26th of last month.

I shall not renew to you my observations on all that concerns the capitulation of Fort William Henry, and what you do me the honor to observe to me on that point, convinces me that it is an object, the decision of which regards actually the Kings, our masters, who will judge of the rectitude of my intentions in that regard.

I persist always in the sentiments of humanity with which your Excellency is yourself penetrated; these dispositions are for you, Sir, a certain guarantee of the manner I shall apply them, as much as it will lie in my power, even towards the subjects of the King, your master, dependent on that capitulation.

I am very sensible of the liberty your Excellency has been pleased to grant Captain Corriveau to return to this Colony on his parole, and although I do not think he was obliged to give any, I shall not the less cause him to return to your Excellency within the time you have allowed him.

The Marquis de Montcalm has reported to me the attention you have had to furnish him news of the officers and soldiers that were taken on the 6th. Please accept, Sir, my thanks for the good treatment you have been pleased to show them. I shall always do my best not to remain in your Excellency's debt in this regard.

Colonel Schuyler<sup>1</sup> has communicated to me the power your Excellency has given him to treat with me for the exchange of the officers therein described. I shall accept, Sir, with pleasure that exchange, but I have the honor to propose to your Excellency, to make all the other prisoners in your power rejoice, at the same time, over the same sentiments of humanity which you feel for the officers, and to exchange them; I think you will readily consent, inasmuch as Colonel Schuyler has appeared to me willing to take upon him to make that exchange; but as his own orders do not give him authority except for the officers, I have considered that it would be proper to ascertain first your Excellency's intentions on that point; I intend, nevertheless, to ask of you by preference in this exchange, those who depend on this Colony, both soldiers and Canadian Militia, and only those taken prisoners since the 9th of August, 1757. And if you accept this proposition, I request you to send me the list of the prisoners in your hands, and I shall authorise the Marquis de Montcalm to agree with your Excellency on the means and place the most proper to terminate the exchanges, from hand to hand.

It will always give me real pleasure to afford your Excellency proofs of the sincerity of my intentions by the liberality with which I shall treat, without attaching myself too scrupulously to the inequality of ranks.

If Sieur de Belletre, Cadet in the Marine troops, who was taken in the neighborhood of Fort Cumberland in Virginia, be actually at your Excellency's disposal, I request he may be included in these exchanges.

I shall ever seize with earnestness every occasion to prove to your Excellency how much it gratifies me to correspond with you, as it will afford me occasion to renew to you the assurances of the most profound respect with which I have the honor to be, &c.

P. S. On the assurances given me by Colonel Schuyler, that Surgeon Major Stakes is detained by reason of serious sickness, I shall consent to his remaining at home until the time of the general exchange which I propose to your Excellency, if it take place.

P. S. I feel a sincere pleasure, Sir, in placing under your Excellency's cover, the enclosed dispatches from Mr. Schuyler and the other English officers.

Camp at Carillon, 3<sup>d</sup> August, 1758.

My Lord,

Although I dare flatter myself that you render me the justice of believing that personal annoyances will never effect my zeal for the King's service, I wish to edify you by transmitting description of his personal appearance given by Samuel Smith. Catharine, his only child, married Archibald Kennedy, King's Collector, Receiver-General of the quit-rents and member of His Majesty's Council of New-York, and removed to England with her husband, and left no issue. Among the houses in New-York city owned by Colonel Peter Schuyler, was his residence, No. 1 Broadway, corner of the Battery, now celebrated as having been the headquarters, during the Revolutionary war, of Sir Henry Clinton and Sir Guy Carleton. Letters of S. Alosen and W. A. Whitehead, Esqs., New Jersey Historical Society Proceedings, I, 53, 58, 178, 179; Dunlap's New-York, I, 375, 394, 395. II, Appendix, lxi., clxxv.; Smith's New-York, II, 224, 257, 265; Smith's New Jersey, 493. — Ed.

to you copy of a last letter, dated yesterday, to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and you will see therein that it depends only on him to live in harmony with me, and that I am sacrificing everything in view of his Majesty's service.

You will perhaps be surprised that I speak to him of the composer of his letters; he admits that he does neither write nor dictate any; besides it was really necessary that I should seek an excuse for him. He has acknowledged to me that he wrote to you last year that he had furnished me every means to go and lay siege to Lydius, but that he did not intend accusing me thereby, inasmuch as he did not say that I ought to do so, and that he knew well that it was impossible for me to do it under the circumstances.

Content with this justification, my Lord, and more so with the hope I entertain that you will be pleased never to enter judgment in my regard, on what might be written to you, without having heard me, I shall continue to labor with the same zeal in defence of this Colony, until it will please his Majesty to grant a recall which my health and debts oblige me to demand. Until then I shall willingly shed the last drop of my blood, and give up the last breath of my life for his service.

I am with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), MONTCALM.

I might, my Lord, have no need of the King's pecuniary favors, were I willing to follow the tone of the country, and I would not owe ten thousand écus, were I to do nothing but what is civil and decent for the service, and to live militarily.

Extract of a letter from the Marquis de Montcalm to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, from the camp at Carillon, 2nd August, 1758.

Be assured, Sir, that the personal matters of which I complain, and which I really impute to the composers of your letters, to the turbulent and mischief-making spirits who are seeking to estrange you from me, will never diminish either my zeal for the public good, nor my affection for you, nor my constant attention to write nothing but good of you and your brother, and not to speak of, nor afford a favorable coloring to things on which I think you have not fully determined. Wherefore should you not act in the same manner by me? Why not alter your secretary's style? Why not give me more of your confidence? I dare say the King's service would gain thereby, and we should not have the air of disunion, which transpires to the degree that I send you a New-York newspaper which mentions it. You believe, Sir, you are not to blame; I, that I am not; for I think I have always been prodigal of advances to you, and have given way more than any other man in order to agree in opinion with you on all occasions. But false reports are made to you, efforts are made to embitter you; for myself, I shall forget, although it pain me, what you have written last year; I think you have not weighed its consequences, and I flatter myself you will never afford reason to suspect my military conduct, when I do all that I know how. Repel effectually those who will think of writing, or of speaking to you of me; say aloud and in public, that my recommendation to you must be the best, and you will soon see that your Colony will alter its tone. Will you begin with me, Sir, by doing me a pleasure? Accept M<sup>r</sup> de Montbelliard's proposal; send back his commission to the Court, and ask that he serve as detached from his corps under your orders, and send M<sup>r</sup> de Louvicon to the company, and serve M<sup>r</sup> de Bonafous the same way. Fear not that this is to have them under my discipline, for I do not mean any such thing, and wish them no manner of harm; and I should greatly desire to be able to give you all the troops of the line to discipline. If you consult only your heart, you will accept my proposition; the Minister will be obliged to you and I shall be grateful therefor. If you consult strangers, you will be told: 'tis impossible, having an order from the King, as if 1500 leagues off, it is not your's to suspend those with whom there is any inconvenience. But those who approach you have the ill address to endeavor, contrary to your intentions, to engage you to mortify, without wishing to do so, the General, the troops of the line and all that relates to them. What need have you, Sir, after my three years service under your orders, to prescribe to me useless or minute details, which I should blush to prescribe to a lowest captain; that proceeds from your secretary having but one mould wherein to fashion instructions and letters for all officers, from me down to the Colonial ensign. I have already had the honor to tell you that we do not think ourselves wrong, neither the one nor the other of us. It is to be supposed, then, that we are both so, and that some change must be applied to our mode of proceeding. For me, Sir, I shall neither answer complaints on your part, nor seek to justify myself, nor furnish you any memoir except when you will require it of me or the King's service shall really be interested. You will write to me or act as you please in the matter. If it be well in my regard, I shall be very grateful, and shall so express myself to you; if ill, my silence will teach you that I am not content. But I flatter myself that I shall not find myself in this case, after so frank a letter on my part, and which will prove to you that I am really willing to preserve your friendship and deserve your confidence until my departure; for I request you to demand my recall on account of my health and of my debts. The Minister might suppose that I am induced to ask it because of my dissatisfaction with you, Sir; that is also true, but you have at hand the remedy on this point, and you have it not on the other two.

I flatter myself that my letter will not go to your Secretary, and that you will be so good as to honor me yourself with an answer. Your Secretary would preserve spite against me which would always be prejudicial to the King's service.

A true copy.

MONTCALM.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Massiac.

Montreal, 4th August, 1758.

My Lord,

I have the honor to render you an account, in one of my letters of the 25th of last month of the brilliant victory we have gained on the 8th of that month over the English army, commanded by General Abercromby.

That day confers on us infinite honor, but I fear it will draw down pernicious consequences on the Colony; I have been unwilling to mention in that letter what has occurred.

I reserved to myself the development of them to you in this letter, in order that you alone may be informed of them. To enable you, my Lord, to judge that the account I have the honor to render you of them is free from passion, I annex copy of the instruction I gave the Marquis de Montcalm, when he announced to me the day of his departure for Carillon, but on the following day he declared to me by a memoir and a letter (annexed hereunto) that he would not leave unless I furnished him other instructions. His refusal failed not to excite noise; it became public. I foresaw, my Lord, the ill effect it might produce at the opening of the campaign. M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm found me as complaisant as he was petulant and excited. In order to avoid noise and rupture, I consented to sign the annexed instruction which he had drawn up himself. When I regard only myself, my Lord, I sacrifice everything to maintain union; but I foresee with pain that, in wishing to make use of mild means, I shall indubitably compromise the authority the King has confided to me. I am the more founded in this belief by the Marquis de Montcalm having been, after the action of the 8th, so transported with joy, that he lost sight of the moderation he owed to himself; he exalted his victory in terms so indiscreet as to produce in his army expressions the most indecent against the Government, and especially whatever emanates from the Minister of the Marine.

He no longer remembered, my Lord, your recommendations in favor of our Indians. So far from managing them, he repelled them to the degree that they have almost all returned. You will judge of their discontent by the Council hereunto annexed, which these Nations have publicly held at my quarters on the 30th of July, in presence of the Intendant.

Had I been aware of the subject of their speeches, I would have given them a secret audience. I could not do better than in my answers to justify the Marquis de Montcalm and to engage these Indians to return to Carillon.

I could not have expected to find the same docility in the Upper Nations, how devoted soever they may be, were a similar thing to happen to them. What is the more unfortunate, my Lord, is, that the 3 Chiefs of the 5 Iroquois Nations, whom I had attached to M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm's army, have been witnesses of the manner in which he has treated our domiciliated tribes, and that the account they will render of it at their villages will possibly prejudice my negotiations.

If the troops of the Marine have not exploded so openly, we are indebted for their restraint to their subordination, but their pain, though secret, is not the less acute, seeing that M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm, far from doing justice to their services, attributes these to the troops of the Line. This proceeding disgusts both officer and soldier.

In regard to the Canadians, they cannot but be rebuffed by the manner he is making them serve. They have always been excited by their feelings; they have rendered the greatest services; now they are degraded by the harshness with which they are commanded; they clearly perceive the importance made of them each time they are wanted. They bear, without a murmur, the corvées with which they are continually burthened. They ask nothing better than to be placed in the most exposed situations, either in encampment, scouting parties, and even in front of the enemy. They distinguished themselves on the day of the 8th.

Effectually, my Lord, the troops of the Marine, the Canadians and the Indians had to themselves a space as large as the rest of the army, although it does not include the quarter of that intrenched ground; as soon as they received orders, they advanced with ardor to charge the flank of the enemy who wanted to penetrate the part defended by Chevalier de Levis. They approached them so near that they have made many prisoners; during the action the different corps which have been engaged with our enemies, equally distinguished themselves, and have acquired the same degree of glory. 'Tis a truth to which the Marquis de Montcalm rendered the justice it deserves. He wrote to me on the day after the victory in these terms: "The few Canadians and Colonials I had, were placed at the opening (in the intrenchment) between the abatis and the river; they made us all regret that we had not more of them. "Chevalier de Levis, under whose eyes they have fought, praises them highly; he ordered them to make two sorties. M<sup>r</sup> de Raymond, Captain of the Colonials, who had the honor to command them, exhibited on the occasion, as much intelligence as zeal. I cannot speak in too high terms of him, as well as of all the other Colonial officers."

The Marquis de Montcalm, forgetting no doubt, the eulogium he made to me, does not render them the same justice in the annexed Narrative, which he sent me; on the contrary he took particular care to pass over their actions in silence, which has induced me to comment on that Narrative in order, my Lord, that you may possess an exact knowledge of the truth.

That Narrative has not been in existence long; he has made out another, hereunto annexed, still less favorable to the troops of the Marine and Canadians. It has been a principle with him, to make that day turn only on the troops of the Line.

The Canadians have a great deal to suffer from the petulance and ill humor of M. de Montcalm; several officers of the Regulars, imitating their General, treat them harshly.

I can assure you, my Lord, that M. de Montcalm's first arrangements had only in view the checking of the enemy, by occupying the head of the Portage, without in any way intending to dispute the ground with them, inch by inch; his plan was to abandon Carillon to its own forces, to remove his camp back opposite St. Frederic, and to intrench himself at that place; there is even reason to believe that he would have adopted that course had it not been for the representations of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Lemercier and Solbinière.

The day of the 6th was humiliating to the nation; a portion of the tents and baggage were burnt on that day at the head of the Portage; no opposition was offered to the landing of the English, a manœuvre always critical and difficult to be executed when resistance is offered. M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamaque, who was aware of all its advantage, notwithstanding the trifling force he had under his command, exacted three consecutive orders from M. de Montcalm before retiring. If the enemy had profited by the circumstance and pursued our army, already panic stricken by its retreat, and the major part of which was occupied that day in conducting their baggage to Carillon, there is reason to believe 'twould have been cut in pieces.

It lay that day, also, in order of battle, after having passed the Falls, instead of having employed that time in constructing intrenchments. Fortunately, the Lord has fought for us, and our enemies did not attack us until the 8th, without having reconnoitred our intrenchments.

The plan of the fort and of the intrenchments, will enable you sufficiently to understand the risks he incurred in his arrangements, without my pointing them out to you; it is sufficient to show that the troops of the Marine, the Canadians and Indians were too feeble to resist and prevent the enemy from turning the intrenchments, and that they were masking the fire of the artillery and musketry of the fort.

I lost no time, my Lord, in writing to the Marquis de Montcalm that the victory he had just won made me hasten more and more the departure of the Militia and provisions, to enable him to terminate his campaign as favorably as he had begun it. I urged him not to lose the advantage we had gained over our enemies; they had furnished us proofs of their discouragement by their precipitate retreat under the ruins of old Fort William Henry, by abandoning provisions, other effects and even some wounded. As early as the 11th, M. de Rigaud was at the orders of the Marquis de Montcalm, with about 600 Indians and a corps of picked Canadians; he would in a short time afterwards, have had as many as 10,000 men had he not successively sent back a large number of them.

My letter and my hurry to increase his forces, displeased him to the degree that he sent me back a copy of that same letter with comments. You will find it annexed. He did not sign the letter which followed them, but I could not be mistaken, inasmuch as there was an article in his handwriting. You will see, my Lord, the answer I have sent him.

The Marquis de Montcalm pretends to be informed of letters I had the honor to write you last year, by a respectable lady whom he has cited; I do not name her to you because he has not said so to me.

The entire army desired that M. de Montcalm should confide the two principal detachments to Chevalier de Levis and M. de Rigaud; I wished it more than any person, in consequence of the satisfaction you would have had, my Lord, in communicating at the same time to the King, both our victory of the 8th, and the necessity we should put our enemies to, of abandoning their position on the shore of Lake St. Sacrament; it is only with that view that I postponed the departure of the frigate commanded by Sieur Kaou.

Had the Marquis de Montcalm executed the movements I wished him to have made, with considerable detachments by the Lake and the head of the Bay, they would have had all the success I expected from them. The encampment of the English at old Fort George was, doubtless, only momentary; we cannot have a stronger proof than their inactivity up to the 20th of last month, when they began to intrench themselves. They have had time to recover from their terror, since they have not, since the 21st, seen the appearance either of Canadians or Indians. M. de Rigaud is at the Falls with the troops of the Marine and a portion of the Canadians; he has a party in advance at the other end of the portage, but as M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm has not been willing to defend the landing, he has given orders to the troops of the Marine to fall back on Carillon, should the enemy make their appearance. Thus it is, my Lord, that our light troops lost the advantage they possess of fighting the English in the woods.

I consider it useless to repeat to you the behavior of the M<sup>ie</sup> de Montcalm towards me; from the last campaign until his departure I have affected ignorance of it. I have anticipated him in politeness; I have had conferences with him, to gratify the envy he has of being consulted, although I have repeatedly experienced that as soon as I had communicated any project to him, it became public by the Memoirs he made on my ideas, and which he was showing to divers persons with a view to attribute them to himself.

The attachment the troops in general, the Canadians and the Indians, feel towards Chevalier de Levis, has produced in the mind of the M<sup>ie</sup> de Montcalm feelings of jealousy, which he has exhibited on occasion of the detachment that Brigadier was to command. 'Twas which of the regular troops should accompany him, as he was not to march until after M. de Montcalm. He evaded his departure for Carillon, although I had repeatedly observed to him that it was proper he should be at the head of the army, that the enemy, aware of his arrival, might slacken their march.

I omit nothing to avoid the explosion of a rupture with the Marquis de Montcalm; there is nothing that he does not risk, my Lord, to compel me to it; I pass in silence all the infamies or indecent acts he has committed or authorized.

After all these reasons, my Lord, I should consider myself wanting in my duty to the King's service, and to the confidence with which you honor me, were I not to supplicate you to be pleased to demand of his Majesty the recall of the Marquis de Montcalm. He desires it himself and has requested me to demand it of you. So far from thinking of injuring him, I consider, my Lord, that he deserves to be promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general; he will be able to serve very usefully in Europe. No person renders more justice than I do to his excellent qualities, but he does not possess those which are required for war in this country; 'tis necessary to have a great deal of suavity and patience to command the Canadians and the Indians. The King having confided the Colony to me, I cannot avoid anticipating the unfortunate consequences which the Marquis de Montcalm's longer sojourn might produce. I shall retain him with me next spring, until I have received your orders. It is essential that they reach me early; you will be so good, my Lord, as to send them to me by several of the first ships which will leave France.

The regular troops will be highly flattered to remain under the command of Chevalier de Levis, which circumstance authorises me to renew to you the demand I have the honor to submit to you in his favor for the rank of Major-General. He has richly deserved it by the distinction with which he served in the affair of the 8th. He unites within himself all the good qualities of a general officer; he is generally beloved, and deserves to be so.

M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamaque will suffice as second to Chevalier de Levis.

I am with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

Memoir to serve as Instruction to the Marquis de Montcalm, Maréchal of the Camps and Armies of the King.

The Marquis de Montcalm is not ignorant:

1st How much we have attended, since the last campaign (notwithstanding the scarcity of provisions), to procuring everything that may tend to the safety of the Colony.

2nd That during the winter we have performed almost impossibilities, to suffice for the different Canadian and Indian parties and for the preparations relative to defensive and even offensive operations, in the confidence that powerful succors, of every description, would reach us early in the spring.

3rd The different messages we have received from the Five Iroquois Nations founded on the assurance we give them, since a long time, of early succor.

4th The desire of those Nations to unite themselves with a large force (un gros) to drive the English from the lands they (the Indians) inhabit, and to attack them without incurring the risk of compromising themselves.

5th The advices we have had of the preparations and movements of the English to reëstablish Theyaguin, to construct forts from distance to distance, with a view to make Choueguen insensibly spring up again, to extinguish the favorable dispositions entertained towards the French by the Iroquois, and to reduce the latter to the unavoidable necessity of taking part with them against us.

We hope that the steps we have taken with the 5 Iroquois Nations will have suspended the effect of the reiterated negotiations and entreaties of the English.

But we are informed that the object of our enemies is always the same in those parts, and that, independently of the siege of Louisbourg, they appear to have offensive views on the frontier of Lake St. Sacrament and even on that of the Beautiful river.

According to all this, we have conferred with the Marquis de Montcalm on the actual position of the Colony and the measures which we consider the most just to secure our frontiers against the enemy's attacks; we have found the last Memoir he has submitted to us on this subject, as well as his reflections, very judicious; but, although he is aware of our intentions and is sufficiently informed of everything that can contribute to the general welfare of this Colony, it comports with the good of the service that we communicate to him the present Instruction.

Lake St. Sacrament, appearing the part most menaced, we deliver to the Marquis de Montcalm the command of an army composed of 8 battalions of Regulars, about 600 soldiers of the troops of the Marine, who will form, also, one battalion, 5 @ 600 Militia, and suitable artillery, which, with the officers, servants, workmen of every description, employés both in the store and with the contractor, amount to over 5,000 persons to be fed; and the Marquis de Montcalm is aware that we have received four months' provisions for only 5,000.

We have furnished the Marquis de Montcalm the list of officers of the detachment of the Marine who are going under his orders.

We adjoin to that army the greatest number of Indians we can.

The straitened circumstances to which we are reduced for provisions oppose an obstacle (which we cannot surmount) to the desire we would feel to furnish the Marquis de Montcalm with a larger force. He, himself, sees that we have scarcely provisions for the most urgent necessities, and that, besides, as none of our posts is provided with any, it behooves our prudence carefully to preserve those which will possibly reach us so as to enable us to call together the remainder of the Colonial forces for the defence of the threatened frontier, when we shall learn that the enemy are really on the march to attack it. On this directly depends the salvation of the Colony; we are well assured that the Marquis de Montcalm will concur, on his side, in the strictest economy, by avoiding all imprudent consumption, and that he will send back even useless people.

We doubt not that, on the Marquis de Montcalm's arrival at Carillon, M. de Bourlamaque will arrange everything so as to operate according to the exigency of the case.

Our first object being to create a powerful diversion of the forces which appear to threaten the Lake St. Sacrament frontier, and even to render the enemy undecided, we cannot do better than to seem willing to act offensively; we have given our orders accordingly to M. de Bourlamaque. 'Tis important that the Marquis de Montcalm make, the moment he arrives, all the offensive demonstrations which circumstances will permit him, all things considered. The enemy will not fail to have cognizance thereof, and we must have the more reason to believe that such expedient will possibly occasion some change in their arrangements, as, before they can be in a position to operate offensively, they will have doubly matter for reflection and for being undecided, because the detachment which we are sending under the orders of Chevalier de Levis, Brigadier, &c., by the River of Corlac, will then direct its blows against the English settlements, and render our enemies uneasy. If our views on this point be fulfilled, as we must not doubt they will be, from M. de Levis' zeal, this diversion, joined to that which the Marquis de Montcalm will create on his side, cannot but place it out of the power of the English to act offensively at either of these two points.

On the movement we are making in the Corlac district essentially depends :

1st The complete decision of the 5 Iroquois Nations against the English ;

2nd The non-execution of the project of the latter to reëstablish Theyaoguen and successively Choueguen.

These two objects demand, in every point of view, our attention. The Marquis de Montcalm feels all their importance ; he is even aware that it would be very desirable that our situation in regard to provisions should become sufficiently favorable to keep Chevalier de Levis with his detachment until late in the season, in the district we have confided to him, or to enable him to push on to the Beautiful river, if the case demand it.

Supposing the English come to Lake St. Sacrament, where old Fort George stood, their proceeding may be susceptible of two interpretations : 1st We ought not believe that they are in sufficient force to act offensively against that frontier, if it be true, as all announce, that they are carrying on their expedition against Louisbourg as well as their movements against the Beautiful river country, and to reëstablish Theyaoguen ; 2nd It would appear more probable that the enemy will direct their attention to a bold defensive demonstration.

However it be, the Marquis de Montcalm will neglect nothing to throw light on the conduct and manœuvres of the enemy ; we hope he will not delay obtaining an exact knowledge thereof.

But if the English should happen to occupy Lake St. Sacrament with a superior force, the Marquis de Montcalm must not lose an instant in occupying on his side the portage of Lake St. Sacrament ; he will make his arrangements so as to preserve the offensive on that lake ; he will annoy and harass with vigor the enemy on the road from Lydius to Lake St. Sacrament, and everywhere else he will consider it best to direct his attention, especially in order to try and intercept their convoys. In fine, he will always hold himself in readiness to profit by whatever advantages events and chance will favor him with. As for the rest, we cannot but defer to the Marquis de Montcalm respecting the movements and manœuvres he will make according to the exigency of the case.

If, contrary to all expectation, the enemy should decide on coming to lay siege to Carillon, it will be for the Marquis de Montcalm to determine whether he will go and meet them, in order to give them battle on their march or on the lake, or wait for them in an intrenched camp or other position which he will believe most advantageous. We only observe to him that he will not be able to decide on going to meet the enemy unless he will believe that he has enough of Indians and Canadians to fight them successfully in the woods. The Marquis de Montcalm knows that whatever desire we may have to keep many Indians at Carillon, it has happened that they retired after having struck a blow ; he then will do his best to induce them to remain with him, but should he not succeed, he will confine himself to harassing the enemy, in order to retard their march, it being prudent to avoid compromising himself by a general and decisive affair.

In other respects, we shall augment the Marquis de Montcalm's forces according as we receive provisions, and circumstances require, and he will furnish us information regarding his position. We shall call together, as far as our situation in respect to provisions will admit, all the forces of the Colony, and we are resolved to proceed in person, should the case demand, to succor the threatened frontier. We have issued to this effect our orders to concentrate at St. John, the greatest number of bateaux possible. The Marquis de Montcalm will send back to that place, on his arrival at Carillon, all those who will not be necessary for the daily service.

We regard as useless entering into any fuller details with the Marquis de Montcalm, on whatever may concern the objects of his mission and tend to the glory of his Majesty's arms and the good of the Colony; we refer them to his knowledge, his experience and his zeal, in which we have always reposed our confidence.

Copy of the letter written by the Marquis de Montcalm to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, on the night of the 23rd, at Montreal.

Sir,

I have the honor to beg of you to read again the Instruction with which you have honored me this evening and the annexed Memoir, and I expect from your equity that you will think it fully enough that I take upon myself, under circumstances which may be so critical, to defend as much as it will be possible for me, the frontier of Lake St. Sacrament with 4000 men, against very superior forces, without burthening me with an instruction, the obscurities and contradictions whereof appear to render me responsible for events which may happen and we must anticipate. I render justice to the uprightness of your intentions, but I cannot leave until you have furnished me an instruction with all the changes as necessary as they are indispensable to preserve the deputation<sup>1</sup> of a General officer who has served with so much zeal for your own glory and the defence of this Colony.

I am with respect,

Sir,

Your most humble &c.,

Copy of a Memoir of the Marquis de Montcalm.

Paris Doc. XV., 165. The Marquis de Montcalm who has read, with a great deal of attention, the Instruction which has just been communicated to him by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, has the honor to represent to him :

1st That he has nothing to object to the principle of his plan of campaign, as that depends on speeches and negotiations, of which the Marquis de Montcalm has never had any knowledge except in common with the public in a vague and indeterminate form.

2nd The Marquis de Montcalm represents that, according to what the Marquis de Vaudreuil did him the honor to communicate, he was calculating on 1200 Canadians which are now reduced to 5 or 600. Consequently, as the calculation of mouths to feed, does not correspond with the number of fighting men, the Marquis de Montcalm declares to the Marquis de

Vaudreuil that he does not reckon on more than 4,000 fighting men at most, in the body of troops confided to him. He makes no objection to this article, the moment the want of provisions is assigned, but declares he can operate only relatively to that number of combatants.

The Marquis de Montcalm does not understand how the Marquis de Vaudreuil advances that an offensive demonstration on Lake St. Sacrament can turn the enemy's forces away from it; that proposition is so contradictory, that it must be owing to some error of his secretary.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil is pleased to conceal from him alone, the force of the English in that quarter, the prisoners' depositions are too constant and uniform and the M<sup>re</sup> de Vaudreuil is well aware that notwithstanding the Louisbourg expedition, the English have 10 battalions of Regulars, 5 companies of Rangers between Orange and Lydius, and can be easily joined by a large body of Militia.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil knows well that the interception of convoys is a difficult operation when Indians are few in number; he is still less ignorant, in consequence of the reports rendered him by the Marquis de Montcalm, Chevalier de Levy and M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamaque, that the post of the Carrying place is the bottom of a tub, whence the enemy will easily drive us with a superior force whenever 'twill be his pleasure, and even turn it by a road with which his parties must be conversant, and we have made them acquainted, in going last year to Fort George.

The Marquis de Montcalm appears to contradict himself formally in the most important article of his Instruction. He begins by leaving it to the Marquis de Montcalm to go and meet the enemy to fight him on his march on the lake, and the Marquis de Vaudreuil adds in that same article, that he must not expose himself to a general and decisive action. The Marquis de Montcalm cannot leave until the Marquis de Vaudreuil has entirely changed this article of his Instruction and explained it clearly; for if the Marquis de Montcalm should march forward to fight, the action is commenced and he contravenes the Marquis de Vaudreuil's Instruction; if he wishes to abide by the latter part, he must adopt measures in consequence which will depend on circumstances and the time the enemy will afford; for an intrenched camp is not always easy to fix nor prompt to make, and it would be still better to retire to St. Frederic than to compromise oneself or shut oneself up in a post which would not be tenable; the Marquis de Montcalm owes these observations to himself; whether the enemy has collected so large a force only for defensive purposes, or in consequence of the arrival of our battalions, we shall soon learn, and as he must, in case of an offensive policy, have commenced his operations for the whole of next month, Chevalier de Levy's expedition, the earlier execution of which has been prevented by the want of provisions, is of no utility and cannot create any diversion in favor of the defence of Lake St. Sacrament, but it is capable of fulfilling other objects.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil has omitted in his Instruction one point of the greatest importance, which is to determine at what time the about 600 men of the Marine troops, and the 5 @ 600 Canadians, whom he promises, will be at Carillon; it is necessary to know this in order to make his arrangements.

The Marquis de Montcalm must again observe that the Marquis de Vaudreuil demands the bateaux to be sent back, except those necessary for daily use; this article is contradictory with that of avoiding a general and decisive affair, because we must always reserve a sufficient number of bateaux for the retreat of the troops, and therein follow the arrangement made in 1756, when Chevalier de Levy, with as many and more troops, was entrusted with attending to the defence of that quarter, whilst the Marquis de Montcalm was besieging Chouaguen.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil must also be aware that should the enemy force us, by the superiority of his forces, promptly to abandon the Carillon place, we can never have time to bring off, but shall burn, any bateaux we should have conveyed there in order to have a navy on Lake Saint Sacrament.

Montreal, this twenty-third, at night.

Narrative of the Victory gained over the English on the 8th of July, 1758, by the King's army, under the command of the Marquis de Montcalm.

M. de Vaudreuil's Observations.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, uncertain of the enemy's movements, did not consider himself in a position to act at the same time towards Louisbourg and on the frontier of Lake St Sacrament; he, consequently, determined to divide his forces and to entrust Chevalier de Levis with a particular expedition, with a corps of 1600 picked men, 400 of whom, drafted from our battalions, formed six pickets of 64 men, each with double officers. This strong detachment carried off with it the greatest portion of our Indians.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil never entertained a doubt that the English, with the greatest number of troops they had, might act offensively against Carillon; but no provisions having arrived from France, he was unable to defend that frontier except by a diversion in which he would have succeeded, had the provisions arrived early enough to enable him to send the detachment he had confided to Chevalier de Levis, the object of which was to produce a grand diversion; to give the Five Iroquois Nations a proof of the King's protection, and to engage them, in fine, to make use of a hatchet the M<sup>te</sup> de Vaudreuil had permitted them to suspend as long as the proximity of the English and the safety of their families required such a course. This detachment had also for object the defence of the Beautiful river, and was to be victualled a la côte, in order to diminish the consumption of the provisions, it being regarded only as a coup de main, which was capable of conferring one of the greatest benefits on the Colony.

The Marquis de Montcalm, commissioned to defend the frontier of Lake St Sacrament, arrived at Carillon on the 30th of June with Sieur de Pontleroy, Capt<sup>n</sup> of the Corps Royal and Engineer-in-Chief of New France, and Sieur Desandrouins, also Captain of the Corps

The Marquis de Montcalm did, indeed, find at Carillon only eight battalions of Regulars, but he is not exact as regards the troops of the Marine and the Canadians, since he makes no mention of 50 gunners and bombardiers, and of more than 300 Militia workmen employed

Royal and Engineer attached to the Regular troops. The corps of troops he found assembled there, consisted of eight battalions of Regulars and, what will hardly be believed, 15 Indians, an unfortunate circumstance which perhaps will never recur.

Up to the 8th, the day of the affair, he received no other reinforcement from the Colony than about 400 soldiers of the Marine, or Canadians, commanded by Captain de Raymond of the troops of the Marine.

in the Artillery and Engineer department, exclusive of those attached to the hospitals and the different employés. The number of Indians was at least 150. But the capture they made on the 26th of June, under the command of Sieur de Langy Montegron, of 19 English (two of whom were officers) had occasioned the return of several, and there never remained less than 40.

The Marquis de Montcalm when he left Montreal, was not ignorant that all the Abenakis who were then returning from hunting, were designed for Carillon, as well as more than half the Iroquois of the Saut Saint Louis, the Lake of the Two Mountains, Nepissingues and Algonkins, who amounted to over 500.

Colonel de Bourlamaque, who commanded at Carillon, informed the Marquis de Montcalm of the news he had just learned of the enemy from the prisoners. According to their report, he was no longer permitted to doubt that the English had assembled at the head of Lake St Sacrament, near the ruins of Fort William Henry, an army composed of 20,000 men of the Militia of the country and of a corps of 6,000 troops from old England, consisting of 2 battalions of the Royal Americans,<sup>1</sup> one regiment of Scotch Highlanders,<sup>2</sup> and Murray's,<sup>3</sup> Blake-ney's<sup>4</sup> and Lord Howe's<sup>5</sup> regiments, under the command of Major-General Abercromby, and that this army, provided with a number of barges and a proportionate train of artillery, was to move in order to attack us the first days of July. The Marquis de Montcalm dispatched several couriers to the M<sup>te</sup> de Vaudreuil to report to him this intelligence, and to demand of him to hasten whatever reinforcements the Colony could furnish.

On the report of the prisoners made on the 26th, and M. de Bourlamaque's letters, the M<sup>te</sup> de Vaudreuil had suspended the departure of Chevalier de Levis' detachment and changed entirely its destination, even before receiving the Marquis de Montcalm's despatches, and anticipated them by the precipitate departure of Chevalier de Mercier, commanding the artillery of the Colony. He notified the Marquis de Montcalm that he would not confine himself to sending him the 800 Canadians and the 400 Indians which he asked for, inasmuch as he ordered the entire of Chevalier de Levis' detachment to march, and that he should moreover notify the Militia, previously commanded, to be prepared to march as soon as the provisions would arrive from St John and Quebec.

4.

At the same time he did not hesitate to order the battalions of La Reine, Guyenne and Bearn, under the orders of Sieur de Bourlamaque, to occupy the head of the Portage on the border of Lake St. Sacrament, and also sent forward the battalion of Royal Rousillon and the first of Berry to the right of the Falls, and the battalions of La Sarre and Languedoc to the left of that river, where he posted himself in person, to be equally within hail of all the parties. He left Sieur de Trecesson at Carillon with the second battalion of Berry, to command there.

The Marquis de Montcalm attributes to himself the bold manœuvre of going to occupy

This bold manœuvre, which presented the appearance of a larger force than we had, retarded some days the enemy's movements, according to the report of prisoners; their first plan had been to establish at the Portage, under the orders of Lord Howe, a head which the main army was to follow only some days after; our advance movement determined them to march the entire army, which delayed their operations until the 5th.

The Marquis de Montcalm, at the same time, went to reconnoitre and to determine the position he should take, for the defence of Fort Carillon, by occupying the heights that command it.

From the 1st to 4th several small parties were sent out to fight in order to obtain news of the enemy; and as there were no Indians, two companies of volunteers were organized with drafts from the Regulars, the command whereof was given to Captain de Bernard of the regiment of Bearn and to Captain du Prat of the regiment of La Sarre.

On the 4th the Marquis de Montcalm organized a detachment of 130 volunteers under the orders of Ensign de Langy Montegron, of the Colonials, an officer of the highest reputation. The Marquis de Montcalm having called for some volunteer officers for that detachment, notifying them beforehand the Falls and the Portage, although the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who wished to give an offensive character to that army, had ordered Sieur de Bourlamaque to do it, who had in consequence prepared everything, and had written to the Marquis de Vaudreuil on the 26th of June that he would have already taken up a position there, did he not daily expect the Marquis de Montcalm.

Although the Marquis de Montcalm wishes to insinuate that this manœuvre put a check to the enemy and retarded their operations, 'tis no less certain that, not having had any design to embarrass with abatis the lake shore, from Bald Mountain to the old camp of Sieur de Contrecoeur, to oppose the landing, and to defend the Portage inch by inch, which appeared the only course to pursue, it would have been more advantageous to work first at the intrenchment on the heights of Carillon, and to secure his communication with the Fort.

6.

The scouts have been always formed by the Canadians and Indians; but the Marquis de Montcalm, wishing that the Regulars might imitate them, formed his two companies of volunteers without daring to promise himself great success therefrom; as appears by the detachment he formed on the 4th, the command of which he confided to Sieur de Langy, by adjoining to it some captains under his orders, as he expressed himself.

The Marquis de Montcalm passes in silence the gallant manœuvre of this officer, who fell in with the vanguard of the English army, in going thither with a solitary bark canoe, well armed.

that they would be under Sieur de Langy's orders, irrespective of their grades, even of captains, and he was obliged to limit the number to one officer per battalion. This detachment started on the night of the 4th in a bateau on lake S<sup>t</sup> Sacrament, returned the 5th at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, having discovered, on the lake, the vanguard of the English army, led by Colonel Blastrik<sup>1</sup> and Major Roger, chief of their rangers.

The Marquis de Montcalm ordered, immediately, on the retreat becoming general, the troops to take their arms, pass the night in bivouac, and the baggage to be removed; and Sieur de Bourlamaque received orders to keep some detachments on the South and North sides to observe the landing of the enemy, and Duprat's volunteers to proceed to a river which runs between the mountains wherewith that country is covered, and flows into that of the Falls, for fear the enemy should try to turn us by the rear of these mountains. They went thither immediately, and Sieur de Langy was sent by Sieur de Bourlamaque, at night fall, to occupy Bald Mountain with a detachment of 130 volunteers, supported by three pickets under the command of Captain Trepezec, of the regiment of Bearn, who was to make his retreat with him, following the left shore of Lake St. Sacrament.

On the 6th, at four o'clock in the morning, the Marquis de Montcalm, being told that a number of barges were seen in the offing, immediately sent orders to Sieur de Pontleroy to trace out abatis intrenchments on the ground selected the 1st of the month; to Sieur de Trecesson to set the second battalion of Berry, with the colors, to work at it; to 200 men of the Colonial troops, who arrived the previous evening, to join them on the heights of the Falls.

Supposing that the M<sup>rs</sup> de Montcalm did order the baggage to be removed, nothing was done that day. Wherefore it became necessary to burn a part of it, as well as the tents, within sight of the enemy.

8.

'Twould appear that the M<sup>rs</sup> de Montcalm would wish to shew that the detachment commanded by Sieur Trepezec was given conjointly to Sieur de Langy, whereas this officer did not arrive until after the departure of that detachment. 'Tis true that he was to rejoin it in his quality of officer.

9.

This article proves the solidity of the reasons alleged in the observation on article 5.

At 9 o'clock the enemy landed at half a quarter of a league from the Portage; our advanced posts fired on their first troops and fell back on Sieur de Bourlamaque's corps, who having joined the M<sup>e</sup> de Montcalm, the 5 reunited battalions passed the defile of the River of the Falls, destroyed the bridge over it and ranged themselves with the two battalions of La Sarre and Languedoc in order of battle on the heights which bordered it. This retreat was effected in the enemy's presence, without the loss of a single man. But by a real fatality, the detachment under the command of Sieur de Langy, and whose retreat was secured by the right bank, was abandoned by the small number of Indians which acted as their guides, lost its way and fell in with a column of the opposite army which was marching towards the River of the Falls.

About 4 o'clock in the evening, we heard a considerable firing, and perceived the remnant of this unfortunate detachment pursued by the English. Some companies of grenadiers immediately lined the rapid of the Falls to check the enemy's pursuit, and several of our men, under cover of their fire, waded the stream. Of this detachment, consisting of about 300 men, we have had two officers killed, 4 miners and 184 soldiers, and one Canadian killed or taken prisoner. The Marq<sup>e</sup> de Montcalm retired on the evening of the 6th to the camp before Carillon; the army then numbered about 2800 Regulars, 450 Colonials, without any Indians; and from this number must be deducted one of the battalions of Berry, which, with the exception of the grenadier company, that was on the same service as the other grenadiers of the army, was occupied guarding and doing duty at the fort.

On the morning of the 7th, the army was all employed in working at the abatis under cover of the grenadier and volunteer companies; even the officers gave the example with axe in hand, and the colors were planted on the

'Tis certain that we have not lost a single man in that retreat, and that it was effected in good order, the enemy not having followed us. It cost us, however, as I have stated, a part of the baggage and tents, which were burned immediately after the landing.

11.

'Tis easy to see the motive which induced the M<sup>e</sup> de Montcalm to suppose that Sieur de Langy had the command of the detachment which was under the orders of Sieur de Trepezec.

12.

This article does not differ except as to the number of combatants.

13.

The head of the intrenchment was distant only 450 toises from Fort Carillon, which might be regarded as inaccessible on its left, but could easily be turned at the right, there being 350 toises of intrenchment at the water side, as is works which had been laid out, the evening before, by Sieurs de Pontleroy and Des androuins on the heights, nearly 650 toises from Fort Carillon; the left, occupied by the battalions of La Sarre and Languedoc, rested on an escarpment 80 toises distant from the River of the Falls, the summit of which was crowned by an abatis; this abatis flanked an opening, abreast of which were posted the two companies of Bernard and Duprat's volunteers, in whose rear six guns were to be placed to batter it and the river. The right, guarded by La Reine, Bearn and Guyenne, rested in like manner on a height, the pitch whereof was not so steep as that on the left; the Colonial troops and Canadians were stationed on the plain, between the latter height and the River St' Frederic, where they, too, intrenched themselves with some abatis; it was flanked by that part of the intrenchments occupied by the regiment of La Reine, and was to be flanked also the next day, by a battery of 4 guns; moreover, the guns of the fort were brought to bear on that quarter, as well as on the landing that might be made to the left of our intrenchments.

The centre followed the sinuosities of the ground, keeping on the top of the heights, and all the parts flanked each other reciprocally; many, indeed, there, as well as on the right, were attacked by the enemy en écharpe, but that was because they did not allow us time to construct traverses there. The centre was occupied by the battalions of Royal Rousillon and the first of Berry, to which were adjoined, throughout the entire front of the line, some pickets which arrived with Chevalier de Levy on the previous evening. Each battalion had in its rear one company of grenadiers and one picket of reserve, for the purpose both of supporting their battalions and of marching wherever they were required.

These intrenchments were constructed of trunks of trees laid one on the other, having in front trees felled, the branches of which easy to be seen by the plan, (appended to the first); this part being defended only by troops of the Marine, Canadians and Indians, the intrenchment which the M<sup>re</sup> de Montcalm announces here, did not occupy more than a quarter of that ground, and was, besides, very imperfect.

being cut and sharpened, served as chevaux de frise.

On the night of the 7th, the 400 picked men belonging to our Regulars, who were detached on a particular expedition under the orders of Chevalier de Levis, arrived to the great satisfaction of our little army. The joy was so much the greater as they announced the person of Chevalier de Levis; in fact he arrived in the night with Lieutenant-Colonel de Senezergue, of the regiment of La Sarre. The Marquis de Montcalm entrusted to him the defence of the right, and to Sieur de Bourlamaque that of the left; he reserved to himself to remain at the centre, to be better able to issue his orders equally.

The army bivouacked. At day-break on the 8th the generale was beat, in order that all the troops might understand their positions, according to the arrangement agreed upon; after this movement, they immediately set to work, some in perfecting the abatis, the rest in constructing the two batteries abovementioned, and a redoubt which was still to protect the right. About ten o'clock in the morning, the enemy's light troops appeared on the other side of the river and opened a brisk fire, so distant that the work was continued without noticing them.

At half-past twelve their army filed on us; our advanced guards, the volunteers and grenadier companies fell back in regular order and entered the lines without the loss of a single man; in a moment, at the signal agreed upon, the workmen as well as all the troops were at their arms and at their posts. The left was the first attacked by two columns, one of which endeavored to turn the intrenchment and found itself under the fire of the regiment of La Sarre, the other directed its efforts against a salient point between Languedoc and Berry; the centre, where the Royal Rousillon was stationed, was attacked almost at the same moment, by a third column, and a fourth directed its attack towards the right, between Bearn and La Reine. The enemy had on the 7th their barges and pontoons drawn to the Falls; whence some twenty were seen defiling on that river. Bernard's and Duprat's volunteers, who were posted there, received them with a will; Sieur de Poulharies, at the head of a company of grenadiers and a picket of the Royal Rousillon, likewise appeared there, and the cannon from one of our batteries of the fort, commanded by Lieutenant de Louvicourt of the Corps Royal, having disabled two of them, they have not appeared any more throughout the entire of the action. As the Canadians and troops [of the marine] were not attacked, they, under cover of the intrenchment, directed their fire against the column which was attacking our right, and which sometimes was in range of them. Chevalier de Levis sent successively Adjutant Dhert and Captain Daynau of the regiment of La Reine, to order the most alert of them to make two sorties and to take that column in flank. Sieur de Raymond, antient captain of the Colonial troops, who commanded them, always headed these sorties; the different attacks of the enemy continued almost the whole afternoon, and almost with equal vivacity throughout.

The arrival of the 400 men and of Chevalier de Levis personally, produced as much joy as hope in our army.

About five o'clock the column which had attacked the Royal Rousillon, threw itself on a salient defended by the Guyenne battalion and on the left of the Bearn; the column which had attacked La Reine and Bearn with the greatest desperation, also threw itself on that point, so that the danger from that attack became imminent. Chevalier de Levis repaired thither with some troops of the right, when the enemy were doing nothing but firing. The Marquis de Montcalm ran thither also with some of the reserve, and the enemy experienced a resistance which finally cooled their ardor. The left was sustaining always the fire of the two columns which were trying to enter at that part, where their depôt was ## 15.

The Marquis de Montcalm, always with a view to make this action turn only on the troops of the line, makes the barges fall back before Bernard's and Duprat's volunteers; 'tis easy to be seen by the plan, that they could not, from their position, annoy those barges. He makes his partiality still more manifest in attributing to Sieur Lauvicou the command of the battery which stopt them, whilst Chevalier Lemercier was there in person.

16.

The troops of the marine, the Canadians and Indians, who were stationed at the weakest point, were fortunately not attacked. But they rushed boldly from the intrenchment and made a flank attack on the column which appeared most determined to clear the intrenchment. They displayed so much valor that even during the action they took most of the prisoners.

also located. Sieur de Bourlamaque had been wounded there about three o'clock, and lieutenant-colonels de Sennezergue and de Privast, commanding the regiments of La Sarre and Languedoc, had supplied his absence by continuing to issue the best orders there. The Marquis de Montcalm repaired thither several times and was careful to dispatch a reinforcement there at every critical moment. For during the whole of the affair, the companies of grenadiers and the reserved pickets always hastened to the points that were most pressed.

About six o'clock, the two right columns which abandoned the attack on Guyenne, came to make another attempt at the centre against Royal Rousillon and Berry, and, in succession, one last effort against the left; from 6 to 7 o'clock the hostile army was busy retreating, under cover of the fire of the light troops, which continued until nightfall.

During the battle several places caught fire, but it was immediately extinguished, the soldiers courageously passing over the reverse to arrest its progress. Besides the munitions of powder and ball, barrels full of water were almost continually [conveyed] from the fort, and Sieur de Trecesson, who commanded the second battalion of Berry, and who was also in the fort as well as Sieur Mercier, the Commandant of the artillery, rendered on this occasion the greatest services by their activity in causing to be conveyed to us the ammunition and refreshments necessary in so long an engagement.

The darkness of the night, the exhaustion and small number of our troops, the enemy's forces which, notwithstanding his defeat, were infinitely superior to ours; the nature of these forests in which it was impossible, without Indians, to engage an army which had 4 or 500 of them; several intrenchments that the enemy had formed, one behind another, from the field of battle to their camp; such were the insurmountable obstacles which prevented us pursuing them in their retreat; we calculated even on their attempting the next day to take their revenge, and we consequently worked all night to protect ourselves (nous défiler<sup>1</sup>) against the neighboring heights by traverses, in perfecting the abatis of the Canadis<sup>2</sup> and in completing the batteries on the right and left, which were begun in the morning.

On the 9th our volunteer companies went out and advanced to the Falls. On the news they brought us that the enemy had apparently abandoned the Falls and Portage posts, the Marquis de Montcalm ordered Chevalier de Levis to march at daylight the following morning with our volunteers, eight companies of grenadiers and one 50th of the Canadians, to discover with caution what had become of the enemy's army.

Chevalier de Levis advanced before the Portage; he found everywhere traces of a precipitate flight; wounded, barrels of flour, baggage abandoned, shoes left in swampy places, wrecks of burned barges—an incontestable proof of the loss the enemy have experienced. According to the statements of their prisoners, and from what we have seen, we estimate their killed or wounded at 4,000; if we were to rely on some of them and the promptitude of their retreat, their loss would be still more considerable. Ours has been 12 officers killed, 25 wounded; 92 soldiers killed and 248 wounded. The enemy have lost many of their principal officers, among others, Lord Howe, who has been killed on the 6th by our detachment on its retiring from Bald Mountain; Mr Spittall, Major-General<sup>3</sup> of the Regulars and the Commander-in-Chief of New-York.

Five hundred Indians, Thiactas, Loups and Five Nations, arrived on the morning of the 8th with Colonel Johnson; some of them appeared in the action, but the greater number, especially those of the Five Nations, remained inactive in the rear of the columns; before they should decide, they were, doubtless, waiting for the result of the battle, which appeared to them uncertain for the English.

The Indians were not so numerous, and those who were there have been mere spectators, with the exception of a few Mohawks.

The proclamation of the 24th of March, printed at New-York, announces the general invasion of Canada, and these very words are expressed in the commissions of all the Militia officers.

This day's success is due to the incredible valor of both officer and soldier. Chevalier de Levis particularly distinguished himself on the occasion; he has received several musket balls in his clothes; Sieur de Bougainville, Deputy Quartermaster-General of the army, and Sieur de Langis, a Colonial officer, have been wounded at his side; Sieur de Bourlamaque deserves, also, great praise for his good conduct and firmness. Chevalier de Montreuil, Adjutant-General, had the orders and ammunition conveyed, with indefatigable zeal, to the various points of attack, whither he repaired in person. All the officers who composed this army have furnished such great marks of courage that each of them would merit a special eulogium.

M. de Vaudreuil's letter to M. de Montcalm and the latter's Observations thereon.<sup>1</sup>

Extract of M. de Vaudreuil's letter.

M. de Montcalm's Observations.

Carillon, 16th July, 1758.

We are, sir, in sufficiently favorable circumstances, not to lose sight of the great advantage we have acquired over our enemies by your victory of the 8th instant; their retreat to old Fort George may have for its object to fortify themselves there or to make arrangements and dispose things so as to be ready to march, on the reuniting of their troops employed at the siege of Louisbourg; but whatever be their views, and what interpretation soever we may put on them, everything must engage us to use every means to deprive them of time for adopting new measures, which, whatever they be, would be always most prejudicial, regard being had to our small stock of provisions and to the necessity of having our Canadians back for the harvest.

I enter, strongly, Sir, in whatever plans you may have formed on this point. The retreat and even terror of the enemy only increases my zeal in having conveyed to you all the forces at my disposal; that is, in sending to

This part of the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letter, appears to have been written only with a view to render the Marquis de Montcalm responsible for all the events that may happen, in order to say: I have sent him all the forces of the Colony; he has had them for a month, and has not known how to profit by them so as to prevent the enemy establishing themselves at Fort George. Were the Marquis de Montcalm, on the contrary, to march with all his forces and not succeed, the Marquis de Vaudreuil would not fail to write: He has marched without orders, and has compromised the Colony. 'Tis always astonishing that the Marquis de Vaudreuil considers himself qualified to determine, at a distance of 50 leagues, warlike operations in a country which he has never seen and where the ablest generals would be embarrassed after having seen it. The Marquis de Vaudreuil forgets that this army was at least 20,000 strong, and according to many of the prisoners, 25,000. Let us suppose that it had lost in you all the militia of this government fit for service, and executing such movements as you will think proper; you have already a great many of them and others will reach you daily, so that, independently of Indians, your forces will be very considerable. 'Tis important, Sir, that we have, continually, large detachments, both on the Lake and head of the Bay. They cannot be too strong to harrass our enemies vigorously, to cut off their communication between Fort Lydius and old Fort George, and to intercept their convoys; we have no better manoeuvre to force them to abandon their position, bateaux, artillery, campaign train, &c., to oblige them to retire, and thereby deprive them, forever, of all hope of renewing their attempt.

killed and wounded, 5,000 men, that a portion of those Provincials return home; they would still have 12 or 14,000 men, and consequently the superiority in the field, and be masters of acting as they pleased in their country.

'Tis with pain, yet without losing the respect due, that I am obliged to say that the passage in Italics is the work of a thoughtless Secretary, and not of a warrior. A communication is not cut except by going with a respectable corps between two bodies, and a superior enemy is not compelled to abandon his position by mere detachments; they may, however, abandon it, and such will be the result of a change of plan on their part, rather than of our movements; this we shall learn on the earliest day.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil will find in my Observations some distrust of him; this at least will never prevent me applying myself to the good of the service and of the Colony, without troubling myself about what may be thought of me directly or indirectly, but I do not conceal from the Marquis de Vaudreuil that I shall be able to shew him, on my return to Montreal, that if he has had the goodness, in his despatches of last year, to accord me some praise that I may not deserve, he did not fail to persuade the Minister of the Marine that he had furnished me the means to lay siege to Laydius. Although the King's service ought not to suffer thereby at my hands, and I shall, on all occasions, afford the Marquis de Vaudreuil marks of respect and affection, it were desirable that, forgetting the past, we should work on a new plan, and that I should not have to complain of, or to fear the obscurities and double meaning of his instructions and letters.

Before I had received the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letters, I occupied myself with a strong detachment of 500 Canadians or Indians, which marched this morning by the head of the Bay, and dispatched a scouting party, whose return I am expecting. [NOTE. These italicised words are in his own handwriting.]

The Colony is only to-day en regle, Sir, I review it to-morrow and I have yesterday informed your brother that on the 15th (after to-morrow) he should go in person with M. de la Valterie's corps, and encamp at the Falls, and M. de la Corne will go on the 19th with his, to encamp at the head of the Portage; we shall be in measure posted as before. I am waiting for M<sup>r</sup> de St. Luc, and am immediately going to form a strong detachment for him which will proceed by Lake St. Sacrament. This, Sir, is all that I believe possible whilst making our troops continue our works. I am very glad to give on this occasion an important commission to your brother. I retain Chevalier de Levis by me, and we shall both be in a position to support or withdraw him when I shall receive news of the enemy, and that the reinforcements you announce will be arrived. I shall attend to profiting by them according to circumstances. Your brother, who will have all the Indians at his camp, will second me, to the best of his ability, in retaining them as long as possible, and we shall, perhaps, be embarrassed therein, both the one and the other.<sup>1</sup> When you think it necessary, Sir, to withdraw the Canadians, on account of provisions and the harvest, I shall endeavor to do without them. I shall never answer for any event, but certainly, that the General and the troops will do their utmost. I expect, however, that even during the harvest, you will leave me a certain number of Canadians and these good, with some Indians. Such, Sir, are my plans. Did you wish the enemy to persist in remaining at Fort George? We shall endeavor to expel him thence. I am ready to march thither with the entire army. Such will not be my advice, but a distinct order from you will be sufficient for me. If it be by the head of the Bay, I leave this unprotected; if by Lake St. Sacrament, 'twill require a land march (portage) of three weeks, which will exhaust the army by fatigue and delay the harvest. If they be willing to retire voluntarily of themselves and in consequence of the movements I shall make, I shall be overjoyed. Were I so fortunate, Sir, as that your important occupations would permit you to be at the head of the army, you would see everything yourself, and I should have the satisfaction to receive clearer and less embarrassing orders, and you would have judged that I have combined boldness, prudence and some activity. That does not prevent the odds, that the Colony might been jeopardized on the eighth of July. Decide thereon when you will learn that the Canadian merchants or sutlers were offering, the night before the battle, the velte<sup>2</sup> of Brandy for nine francs; the valor of the troops has decided.

In regard to Mr Wolfs' statement respecting the 500 Indians; he has seen them; so to say, counted and even spoke to them, and with our telescopes we saw them on the opposite mountains, spectators, on the day of the battle.

I must add that on the day of Mr. Wolfs' arrival at the enemy's, Abercromby interrogated him. When Wolfs maintained that I would arrive with Chevalier de Levis, that English General answered: You are not obliged to tell me the truth; I know beyond a doubt that M. de Montcalm is still at Montreal and that Chev. de Levis is going to Corlac, and must be near arriving there.

You perceive, Sir, that as usual I express myself to you with truth and respectful firmness. The same love of truth prompts me to advise you that I demand my recall of the Ministers, and I request President Molé and M. l'abbé Count de Bernitz to solicit it. If you will be so good, Sir, as to unite with them in obtaining that favor for me, it will make me forget all the annoyances I may have had. I shall preserve, in return, a gratitude which will equal the respect with which I am, Sir,

Your most humble, &c., &c.

P. S. M. de la Roche beaucour having arrived some hours subsequent to your second courier, has delivered me your despatches of the 9th and 11th. I have the honor to thank you for the compliment you are pleased to make me, on the bravery of the troops; I have communicated it to them. I assure M<sup>me</sup> the Marchioness de Vaudreuil, of my respect, and thank her for the interest she takes in my preservation.

The desire of economising the provisions was the cause, Sir, of our having been without Indians in the affair of the eighth; you must recollect that I had foreseen it. I had requested you, three weeks before I left, to go and raise the war song among the Abenakis, and to let me bring them with me. If you send me all the militia of the government of Montreal, shall we not fall, without any determinate object, into an opposite and unfortunate extreme ?<sup>1</sup>

Copy of the letter written by the Marquis de Vaudreuil to the Marquis de Montcalm. Montreal, 21 July, 1758.

Sir,

I have received, by the same opportunity, the letter you have done me the honor to write me on the 17th inst., and an unsigned letter dated the 16th, but in the same handwriting as the first.

The English Sergeant-Major whom you announced to me in your letter of the 17th has arrived; I have interrogated him; he told me that all the papers he had with him, when he arrived at Carillon, are in the possession of M. de Bougainville. I request you, Sir, to be so good as to send me, by the earliest opportunity, those papers and all others which have been found on the English, taken or killed; they may contain many particulars of interest, and it will, perhaps, be even necessary for me to make a report of them to the Court.

In regard to the unsigned letter, I am fully convinced it does not come from you, or at least that you did not intend sending it to me. But as it contains an extract of a letter which I have had the honor to write to you on the 12th of this month, I proceed to answer the Observations which relate thereto.

You will permit me to say, Sir, that a wrong interpretation has been given, in the first article of those Observations, to my mode of thinking. I flatter myself you will do more justice to the sentiments which you have always known me to have entertained for you, and that you have seen with pleasure my haste to increase your forces, in order to enable you to conclude your campaign as gloriously as you have commenced it.

These, Sir, are exactly my views; their tendency will always be to remove difficulties, humiliate the King's enemies and promote the good of the country which his Majesty has been pleased to confide to me.

I owe it to myself, and to the justice I render your mode of thinking in regard to me, to pass in silence the remainder of the 1st article.

The second article of the Observations refers to these words: The detachments cannot be too strong in order to harrass our enemies vigorously, to cut off their communication between Fort Lydius and old Fort George, and to intercept their convoys. We have no better manœuvre to force them to abandon their position, bateaux, artillery, field train, provisions, &c.

I cannot but be surprised that I should have been literally understood as meaning to cut off entirely the communication between Fort Lydius and old Fort George, and that your army would be necessary for that purpose. In fact, 'tis easy to see by my letter itself, that my expression, to cut, signifies to try to cut, or at least to impede the communication of our enemies; large detachments may accomplish that object, and be able to take advantage of many favorable circumstances. My reflections in this regard could not escape your sagacity. They were founded even on the brilliant affair of the 8th. As for the rest, we have been sufficiently invited to these suggestions by the discouragement of our enemies; the proofs they have afforded us thereof cannot be more certain. We ought not, consequently, remain inactive, especially as the consequences of those movements, when ordered with the prudence I know you possess, can accrue only to the advantage of the Colony.

For the rest, Sir, I have always rendered and shall ever render you the justice which is your due, both in my despatches to the Minister of War and in my reports to the Minister of the Marine; therefore I cannot bring myself to believe that anything to the contrary has been written; you will do me a favor, Sir, to send me copy of the letter which you must, according to those Observations, have received on that subject. I am confident that you will not refuse me this satisfaction.

I am the more disposed, Sir, to abstain from mentioning those Observations to you, as I perceive that you have entered into my views by the detachment of 500 Canadians and Indians which you have dispatched on the 16th by the head of the Bay and by that you proposed giving to M<sup>r</sup> de St. Luc to go by Lake St. Sacrament. It is to be feared that those detachments have not been sufficiently strong; therefore I doubt not but you will augment the first that you will organize

I duly appreciate the destination you have given my brother Rigaud; I am well assured he will do his best to execute whatever movements you will order him.

You will see, Sir, by all my letters that I have referred the matter to you; my intention is not that you should march with your army to drive the English from old Fort George, but only that you should send out large detachments. I cannot omit having the honor to reiterate all that I have remarked to you on that point, and that I have in view solely to place you at your ease; should your operations require my presence, I shall actually be at Carillon.

You will be at liberty, Sir, to retain, to the end of the campaign, the Militia belonging to the government of Quebec, those of Three Rivers, 200 Canadians of the government of Montreal, and all the Indians; you will please send back, if circumstances permit, the remainder of the Canadians belonging to this district by the 10th or 12th of next month for their harvest, and to recommend that the 200 who will terminate the campaign, be selected with equity in proportion to the number from each parish; I shall keep bateaux and provisions at St. John to have all the Canadians belonging to this government promptly dispatched to you as soon as I shall receive word that the enemy are coming to attack you.

Already a number of Canadians have returned, many of whom have presented to me the furlough you have given them; the others say, that you have discharged them. Those men have been equipped, and it would be just that they should have finished the campaign; I beg you, Sir, to be so good as to avoid giving these furloughs; they have been the sole cause of my not having sent you the remainder of the Canadians belonging to this district who were ready to start.

I was ignorant, up to this time, that there were any Canadian merchants or canteen keepers at Carillon. At all events, Sir, you have had the power to send them away by the terms of my ordinance of last year, the execution whereof I beg you to enforce, and to send the canteen keepers back to me by the first opportunity. Nothing is more injurious than the retailing of brandy, as I have had the honor to tell you before your departure.

You may remember, Sir, that when you did me the honor to go to St. Francis, all the Abenakis warriors were in the woods hunting, and that they did not return even until long after your departure. Nothing was more urgent on my part than to send them to you immediately on their return.

It only remains for me, Sir, to assure you that the unsigned letter of the 16th makes no impression on me; that the justice I render your sentiments is for me a sure guarantee that you are fully convinced of the sincerity of those I have avowed to you; they will ever be the same, and you will recognize always in me, a constant desire to maintain the most perfect union with you, and to prove to you that nothing equals the respectful attachment with which I have the honor to be &c<sup>a</sup>.

Speeches of the Iroquois, Nepissings, Algonkins, Abenakis and Mississagués, 30th July, 1758.

The General's answer.

Father. We are come to express to you the profound pain we feel at the manner M. de Montcalm has received us at Carillon. We took the earliest opportunity to tell him that we were greatly mortified in not having shared his victory. He answered us curtly: You are come at a time when I have no further need of you. Are you come only to behold dead bodies? go behind the fort, you will find some. I have no need of you to kill any English. We withdrew from his quarters to consult together.

The next day we were to bid him good morning; we asked him leave to go on the Lydius road. He struck his table, saying: F . . . ! you shall not go. Go to the devil, if you are not satisfied.

Father. We did not require an interpreter to understand these words. We immediately told him that we were surprised at his anger without having given him any provocation. The council was not long; we each returned home.

The same day, a young chief came back quite furious, and beside himself with rage, who exclaimed in a loud tone: "We must go away since we are treated thus; I've just been turned out of doors by M. de Montcalm."

We would not hearken to this young man; we continued to form our party, which finally obtained leave to march; you know the result; we would have returned immediately, but we said to ourselves, we are not depending on M. de Montcalm, but on our Father, M. de Vaudreuil, and though he be at Montreal, we must regard him as being here, and do his will all the same. We shall go afterwards and present him our complaints.

Children. You cannot fail to anticipate the grief I feel in hearing your words. I cannot credit what you have told me of the Marquis de Montcalm. I render more justice to his sentiments in your favor; you must have misunderstood him, or have exhausted his patience. However that be, forget the past, and you, Chiefs, endeavor to remove the dislike of your warriors to serve under the Marquis de Montcalm. I am persuaded that eventually they will be glad to do so, and acknowledge that so far from despising them, he loves them and is very glad to have them with him.

M. de Montcalm called us together and gave us a Belt to engage us to remain; we consulted our warriors as usual. Ganetagon, a new chief, flung the Belt into the middle of the ring and said: "We must be devoid of all sensibility to receive this message. I am going to get my canoe ready to proceed to Montreal with my men." Thereupon, each repeated the harshness he had experienced at M. de Montcalm's hands; the Iroquois of the Lake and all the other Nations who experienced the like ill treatment, said they would do the same. There was some talk of taking back this message, but no one would take charge of it. Nevertheless, it had to be done, and the more resolute presented it to M. de Montcalm, saying: "We are mortified that your message has been fruitless." He wished to know the reason. We were obliged to tell him that his head was turned since he had beaten the English without us; that he may have need of us, but should not find us. He relented; proposed to us to leave at least some warriors with him to act as scouts. We answered that the ill humor of the warriors did not permit us to leave him a single one. Finally, he altered his tone; he got M. de Levis to speak to Ganetagon, who is much attached to that gentleman. We held a third meeting, and, out of respect for you, Father, and in consequence of M. de Levis' behavior, we left him some warriors, after which we departed to bring home our wounded.

Father. You will ask: "Why did we not stay with M. de Rigaud?" We answer you, that M. de Montcalm did not wish it; he cares no more for him than for us, although he is your brother.

We came for comfort to you, Father, and to warn you that our men are so disgusted that they will never consent to go where M. de Montcalm will command. Therefore, Father, make your arrangements accordingly.

M. de Dieskau to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Bath, England, 5th August, 1758.

My Lord,

Deign to receive this letter favorably, 'tis dictated by a heart overwhelmed with grief. I behold myself abandoned without resource; my bills of exchange drawn on the Marine, sent back protested, make me apprehend it, and cause me the most sorrowful reflections. Your goodness, my Lord, in which I have the greatest confidence, can alone extricate me from so critical a position. 'Tis Lord Barrington, the Minister at War, who has caused to be advanced to me all the money I have received here, and consequently 'tis to that Minister I owe the hundred guineas lately protested. This has made me adopt the course of drawing a bill of exchange direct on M. Le Normand, Secretary of the Marine, in the hope that he will take consideration on my embarrassment and pay it.

I am ignorant, my Lord, wherein I can have merited treatment so much the more rigorous as it appears that I am abandoned by the Court, not having received an answer to any of my letters for more than six months.

I have had the honor, my Lord, to inform you repeatedly of the offer which has been made me to permit me to return to France on my parole, which I did not wish to accept without receiving your orders on that point. I am always waiting for them with the greatest impatience.

Might I have had the misfortune to incur your displeasure, my Lord? I cannot believe it, as I have entertained for you, all my life, the deepest veneration.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Baron de DIESKAU.

Marshal de Belle Isle to M. de Montcalm.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Versailles, 6th August, 1758.

Sir,

I have received the letter you have written to the M<sup>re</sup> de Paulmy, the 12th June last, who has informed me that you had not yet received mine of the 26th of February, in which I notified you of the retirement of that Minister, and that the King had entrusted to me the War Department.

I observe, from what you state in that letter, that you were occupied in making the necessary arrangements to collect a body of troops at Carillon, and that you had dispatched M. de Bourlamaque to that effect, whilst Chev: de Levis was proceeding, with a detachment of 2000 men, in the direction of the Five Nations, less to attempt anything there than to endeavor to induce them to take up the hatchet.

I doubt not but you will profit by every opportunity at your command, to furnish me news of the events that will occur during the campaign, and, if circumstances require, you may use the cypher furnished you by the M<sup>re</sup> de Paulmy.

I have acknowledged, by my letter of the 4th July, the receipt of those whereof you send the duplicates and triplicates, and have nothing to add thereto.

I have the honor to be, most perfectly, Sir, &c.

Marshal de Belle Isle to M. de Montcalm.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Versailles, 6th August, 1758.

Sir,

I have just received the letter you did me the honor of writing to me on the 14th of June last, and answer it at once, in order not to lose the opportunity of a schooner, which is to sail immediately from Brest for Canada.

M. de Marsiac, with whom I have conferred on the subject of what you represent, to wit, that the increase in the price of provisions, placed it out of the power of both officer and soldier to support themselves, pretends that the inconvenience will have disappeared on the arrival of the first ships, and that abundance will again insensibly prevail, according as the different shipments will reach their destination. I shall see, however, what is to be done, in consideration of what the troops may have suffered, and of the supplement of pay his Majesty has granted to those who will return to Europe. Meanwhile, M. de Marsiac has given orders for placing elsewhere the deductions the troops might have suffered for want of certain stores, so that they will lose nothing of what has been promised them. In regard to the cessation of specie payment, M. de Marsiac has explained to me, that they were driven to it, in order to put an end to a considerable premium (agio) which was very prejudicial to bills of exchange, that are always paid with exactitude in France.

I have the honor to be most perfectly, Sir, &c.

M. de Vaudreuil to Marshal Duke de Noailles.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 6th August, 1758.

My Lord,

The interest I take in your health, and my gratitude for your goodness, exact nothing less than the prayers I offer up for your preservation. Permit me, my Lord, to renew them, and to have the honor of expressing to you how much I should be flattered by receiving intelligence from you.

Persuaded, my Lord, that this Colony constantly occupies your attention, I have the honor to communicate to you whatever has occurred of interest since the last campaign.

You will possibly have learned, my Lord, how much this Colony has been afflicted by the scarcity of provisions, and how severely the detachment I had sent last fall, to wind up the campaign, had to suffer, less from the rigor of the season than from the want of provisions. Their principal supplies consisted in powder and ball, and nothing less than the industry of the Canadians and Indians in living in the woods could support the few soldiers that accompanied them. That detachment completely fulfilled its mission. It laid waste or burnt all the settlements in the Palatine district, situate between Corlac and the country inhabited by the Five Iroquois Nations.

The English, my Lord, had conceived the most flattering hopes from our short stock of provisions. They had found their people in the best disposition; were all at their ease; the great and small in New England equally concerned in the war. Their views were of the most extensive nature; they had, at first, laid their plan to scale Fort Carillon; their preparations were perfect; their ladders constructed, and their army ready to march; the detachments which were to precede their enterprise were to meet with nothing less than the success they hoped therefrom. I had been careful to send some parties of Canadians and Indians against them, who by their zeal and good disposition found resources for their support.

I shall confine myself, my Lord, to that detachment, on whose return the enemy's army was to put itself in motion. 'Twas a detachment d'élite commanded by Major Robert Rogers, the most celebrated English partizan. He had orders from his officer to break up the ice, to lay down the route the army was to follow. But that detachment was entirely defeated by a party of soldiers of the Marine, Canadians and Indians, the command of which I had confided to a few simple Cadets belonging to our troops.

In this way, my Lord, I protected the Colony, during the winter, from the menaces of our enemies.

I founded all my hopes on the powerful reinforcements which I had demanded of the Court; but in spite of the wise and just measures of M. de Moras, we received provisions only on the 19th of May. A portion of the troops of the Line had set out, previous to that time, to open their campaign at Fort Carillon. I was sensible of all its importance, the enemy being able, by the earliness of their navigation, to take the field fully a month before us.

At first, I had proposed to break up their plans, to operate a diversion of their forces, and to place their General in a state of indecision. With that view I announced as my preparations, the offensive on Lake St. Sacrament, whilst I was organizing a detachment of troops, Canadians and Indians under Chev: de Levis' orders, to proceed to the district of Corlae. The Five Nations, who for a long time had been inviting me to form this detachment, were to join it for the purpose of attacking the English.

Whilst matters were in this position, I had intelligence of the considerable forces of our enemies and of their encampment on the ruins of old Fort William Henry. But, although the prisoners we had recently taken, did not state positively that they designed coming to attack Carillon, I decided on changing Chev: de Levis' destination and joining his detachment to the Marquis de Montcalm's army.

The enemy took possession on the 6th of the post we had occupied at the head of the Portage and at the Falls.

The Marquis de Montcalm throws up in great haste an intrenchment on the height in front of Fort Carillon. Our army, which was then only 5,000 some hundred men, was in order of battle on the 8th; the enemy made their appearance in three columns. The fight began at half-past twelve; it was one of the sharpest and most obstinate on both sides; but at last Chev: de Levis, who was occupying the right of our army, charged so apropos, in flank, the enemy's columns which wanted to turn him, that the English, unable any longer to withstand the briskness of our fire, retired about six o'clock in the evening, and the firing, notwithstanding, continued until nightfall.

The enemy's army was, according to the report of prisoners, about 14,000 men, independent of a body of 13,000 which had remained with General Abercromby at the Falls.

The loss of the English, according to these same prisoners, amounts to about 5,000 killed or wounded; General Howe and several officers of mark are among the former.

On our side we have had about 350 killed or wounded, but a great many officers. M. de Bourlamaque has been dangerously wounded, but he is better.

My brother Rigaud set out on the 5th with about 600 Indians and a party of Canadians d'élite. Notwithstanding all the diligence he could employ, he was unable to reach Carillon before the 11th. He is greatly mortified at not having shared the Marquis de Montcalm's brilliant victory. I am individually much pained at it, because the English could hardly have escaped succumbing before the hot pursuit we should have given them.

I cannot, my Lord, too highly praise the troops generally. Following the example of their Generals and officers, they have performed prodigies of valor.

I desire, my Lord, that the King be satisfied with my services and zeal. I hope that you will be so good as to seize the opportunities to place them in the best light.

M. Bearn,<sup>1</sup> Adjutant of Quebec, who will have the honor to deliver you this despatch, is well qualified to enter with you, my Lord, into all the details you will judge proper to demand of him relative to this Colony, with which he is thoroughly conversant. He is the officer in whom I have most confidence. Nothing less than his resources, his readiness and his zeal were required to accelerate my movements. Permit me, I beg of you, my Lord, to have the honor to solicit your kindness in his favor. I am confident that you will find him worthy of it, when you will have been acquainted with him. I have particularly charged him to give me news of you, this fall, if it be at all in his power.

My brother Rigaud is at present at the Falls, where he commands the camp of the detached troops of the Marine and Canadians d'élite. He has the greatest desire to distinguish himself.

I am with the most profound respect,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Massiac.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

My Lord,

A letter from the Marquis de Vaudreuil, copy whereof I transmit you, leads me to believe that he will endeavor, perhaps, to send you a piece of mischief which issued from the interior of the Colony by means of some domiciliated Indians of the Sault Saint Louis. I write to you on the subject, in order that you may not give yourself the least uneasiness nor feel any on account of the pain an ill-concocted intrigue may afford me. To the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letter I annex my answer; the same spirit that regulates my conduct towards that Governor-General, has dictated my answer—the spirit of conciliation necessary to the good of the service, and from which I shall never depart, no matter what provocation I may receive. You can, my Lord, assure his Majesty of this. I exhort, unceasingly, the Marquis de Vaudreuil to stifle in silence and in the interior of his cabinet these discretions,<sup>2</sup> of which the public must not be aware, and M. Bigot, whose office obliges him to notice them, and whom I request to devise some mode of conciliation, gives me reason to hope that he will succeed.

I am with respect,

Your most humble, &c.

The same postscript that is to the letter for my Lord, the Marshal de Belleisle, is equally for the above.

Copy of a letter from the Marquis de Vaudreuil to M. de Montcalm, dated 1st August, 1758.

Sir,

All our domiciliated Indians came on the day before yesterday, to make remonstrances to me in full council against the ill treatment they pretend to have received from you, both on their arrival and during their sojourn at Carillon. They announced to me their unwillingness in future to return to that place whilst you are in command there. I have regretted not having foreseen that they were to speak publicly of this matter. I would have endeavored to stifle it in its inception. I omit nothing to induce them to surmount the prejudices they have formed, and flatter myself with having sufficient influence on them to induce them to forget the past. I beg you, Sir, to entertain for these Nations all the regard they deserve. Such is the King's intention. They have for a long time contributed to the honor of his arms, and the defence of the Colony. I have been much more affected, my Lord,<sup>1</sup> at the ill consequences which may flow from their dissatisfaction, than from any indiscreet conversations that have been held at Carillon against the government, and against me personally. They have been so public that I learn them from these Nations. As I am greatly above, and as I despise them, I make no enquiry into them, and I render you justice enough, Sir, to be persuaded that had they come to your ears, you would immediately punish proceedings so contrary to discipline, and which might tend to so pernicious a disunion in the Colonies.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Copy of the Marquis de Montcalm's answer to the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letter.
6th August, 1758.

Sir,

In answer to the letter you have done me the honor to write to me, touching the complaints which the Indians have made to you against me, I protest to you that I have not been surprised at these complaints, although I have well received those people, as is my custom, except that I had refused them M. Rumas<sup>2</sup> to command the party confided to M. de Courtemanche, had scolded them for disorders they were committing in the camp, killing and pillaging the provisions of the hospital and of private persons, and that I had adhered to your injunctions in sometimes refusing them brandy. As a witness of this, I have your brother, and as proof, the long sojourn of a great number of them at Carillon; the second detachment, in which they almost all marched anew with M. de St. Luc, and the third, which a portion of them is still making, at this moment, with M. Marin. Facts ought to be believed in preference to words. Indians, you are aware, do only what they like; but evil spirits often suggest to them and make them say in councils, things they do not think of. Let one instance be shown me of a large body of Indians having been, this season, to war three times or even twice, one after the other, without returning home.

The respect I owe you, Sir, has prevented me writing to you that they have, in full council, complained of you having detained them whilst wishing to fly to our succor. They stated so both in public and in private. I made the public keep silent. I felt how I ought to treat that imputation, whilst you write me as being persuaded that I have not behaved well towards them. I despise these miserable concerns. I shall show no symptom of this feeling either to the evil minded or to the Indians. Speeches can avail nothing against my conduct, and I shall continue to do by them whatever I shall consider useful to the good of the service.

You are right, Sir, to despise gossip; supposing that there had been any, no person would presume to make me his confidant in this matter. Although I heard that I was cruelly torn in pieces, in your presence, on account of my retreat from the Portage, yet I do not attach any credit to it. I wish always to keep aloof from whatever may create disunion. Do you so, likewise. Afford public proofs of your confidence in me. The country and circumstances require it, as well as the friendship of which I cannot divest myself, notwithstanding all that go-betweens may do and say to destroy it. With these sentiments, and those of respect, I have the honor to remain,

Sir,

Your most humble, &c.

M. Bigot to M. de Massiac.

Quebec, 13th August, 1755.

My Lord,

I returned from Montreal some days ago; I went there on official business, and at the request of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, whom I found much piqued against the M<sup>de</sup> de Montcalm. He has been informed of a thousand things the army had said of him after the action of the 8th of July, and pretends that the Marquis de Montcalm has been the author of them, having been the first to express them.

The Marquis de Montcalm, on his side, complains that M. de Vaudreuil has no confidence in him, and does not communicate his plans to him; he has even written to me recently from the army on this subject; I mentioned it to M. de Vaudreuil, who told me that he was always careful to communicate to him everything he proposed to do.

I am doing my best with the one and the other to induce them to conceal from the public the little reproaches they believe themselves justified in making against one another, and I excuse them reciprocally whenever I write to them; a report of a rupture would be as dangerous to the Colony as the entrance of an English army. Too much jealousy has already spread among the different corps.

The Marquis de Montcalm and the Marquis de Vaudreuil are both necessary parties for the preservation and defence of Canada. The former has made himself known as a good General and a man of vast detail, smart and active, zealous for the service. The latter does what he pleases with the Indian Nations and the Canadians, and he is thoroughly conversant with the nature of the fighting in this country; he also knows how to turn to advantage the terror which the English have of the Indians. As I am equally attached to both, I should live on the best terms with them, but I doubt if they will do the same; their hauteur is too much opposed the one to the other, and for a long time they have appeared to me to associate only politically.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil requests of you to procure the command of the French troops for Chevalier de Levis; he has the reputation of a good officer; he is beloved by the entire corps and by the Indian Nations, but in my opinion 'twould be necessary to send a third officer who would be superior to the commandants of battalions. The Marquis de Vaudreuil says, M. de Bourlamaque will be sufficient; that may do for war, he is the judge; but as regards police and the discipline of the troops, a third principal officer will maintain them better than the commandants of the battalions; they are too indulgent to the officers and soldiers of their corps.

The Marquis de Montcalm has just conferred a memorable service on Canada; he has defeated the enemy and prevented their penetrating into it; the grade of Lieutenant-General which that victory may acquire for him, will probably recall him to France. Should he return thither, I shall greatly regret it. I cannot too often repeat that he is an officer of great distinction, and that he possesses a detail and talents which are rare.

I have considered it my duty, my Lord, to submit to you what I know respecting the mutual discontents of these two generals. I should feel mortified were they to know that I have the honor to write to you on the subject, because they would perhaps believe me partial.

I am, with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed) BIGOT.

M. Daine to Marshal de Belle Isle.

Quebec, 31st July, 1758.

My Lord,

The most glorious and most brilliant action since the commencement of the war has taken place on the 8th of this month in the vicinity of Fort Carillon between the King's troops, commanded by the Marquis de Montcalm, and the English.

I propose having the honor to give you the details thereof. I have collected them from the letters of different officers, my friends, who were in that action.

The Governor-General having been informed, at the very commencement of May last, that the English had formed the design of attacking Fort Carillon, and afterwards Fort St. Frederic, thereupon took the best measures to give them a warm reception and to thwart their designs. He dispatched orders to all the settlements in his government to command the farmers whom he may need, enjoining on the Militia captains to order them to hold themselves in readiness for all events. These orders were executed in such a manner that, as early as the twentieth of May, all the farmers were ready, and the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who learned, by that time, from some scouts he had sent out, that a great body of English troops were assembled at Lydius and Fort George, and were seen passing from one to the other with a great number of wagons, dispatched then the battalion of La Reine, which was in garrison at Quebec, to St.

John, to encamp there until further orders; 8 or 10 days after, the battalions which were ready, those of Languedoc and Berry, filed off and went to encamp at the Falls; the other four battalions, which are La Sarre, Royal Rousillon, Guienne and Bearn, proceeded, also, to St. John and the Portage. The eight battalions assembled at Carillon, received orders the 30th June to advance on the 1st of July. The battalions of La Reine, Guienne and Bearn, went to occupy the Portage; those of La Sarre and Languedoc encamped on the left bank of the Falls; that of Royal Rousillon, and the second of Berry, encamped on the right bank, and the third battalion was destined to guard the fort. The Marquis de Montcalm thought by this bold manœuvre to give a check to the enemy, it never having been his intention to hold that position on account of the small number of troops he had to defend those posts.

On the evening of the 4th, M. de Langy, a Colonial officer, set off, with 120 men in bateaux, to discover the enemy's movements and to try to take some prisoners at Fort George; but he returned on the 5th, about ten o'clock in the morning, without having been able to get any, having been pursued by fifty barges full of soldiers, who were approaching with drums beating. Men were busy, the whole day, watching them, and M. de Bourlamaque detached 250 men, under the command of Captain Detrepezet of the Bearn regiment, to Bald Mountain, in order to be advised of the enemy's manœuvres. Our posts on the right bank were reinforced, and the camp passed the night in bivouac. Some shots were fired by the advanced posts during the night. At 5 o'clock on the morning of the 6th, the enemy's army landed opposite the Burnt Camp, to the number of 1,000 @ 1,200 barges, having about 3,000 men on board. They ranged themselves in two lines to attempt a landing at four different places; that is, on the left and on the right of each of their lines. As our numbers were very small, we did not offer them any opposition, and they landed at the Burnt Camp, where they formed, gradually, into columns. We waited a long time before retreating, out of consideration for M. de Trepezet's detachment which had not returned, and fell back on the Falls in very good order, but abandoning our baggage. The desire to extricate M. de Trepezet still retained us at that place until 6 o'clock in the evening, when the wreck of that detachment returned by wading, to the number of 12 or 15. Some prisoners whom we took, told us that the enemy was marching against us, and was constructing bridges on the river Berné which separated us. This determined us again to make our retreat under the cannon of Fort George<sup>1</sup>, where we bivouacked. On the 17th<sup>2</sup> our little army were employed constructing an abatis at the entrance of the fort. The 5th; continued the work until one o'clock in the afternoon, when the enemy, as 'tis stated, to the number of 14,000 men, charged us, although since the 6th, when we lost about 350 men in killed and wounded, which occurred only through the accident of M. de Langy, we effected our retreat with considerable precipitation and boldness, and at the moment of the landing of 6 thousand of the enemy's troops, we reached M. de Montcalm's position on the evening of the same day. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Pontleroy and Desandrouins, Engineers, conducted the work at the intrenchment, covering the heights, the left on the river and the right on a curtain. The second battalion of Berry having been entrusted with the guard of the Fort and with all the details of that quarter, under the command of M. Trecesson, who has rendered, on that occasion, important services to the army, according to the report of those who were there, our 7 battalions worked with incredible activity in forming an abatis of trees, which was finished that day.

Chevalier de Levy's pickets arrived on the 7th, also, and he, himself, at 5 o'clock of the morning of the 8th. The small numbers of Canadians and troops [of the Marines] with Marquis de Montcalm, were stationed at an opening between the abatis and the river. The arrangements for the reception of the enemy were made on the 7th; our guard and grenadiers were outside the whole of the day to protect the work, and the companies of volunteers drawn from our troops commanded by Mess<sup>rs</sup> Benard and Duprat, an officer of the regiment of La Reine, were always in advance watching the enemy's movements. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Langy and d'Ailleboud, Colonial officers, went on a scout and the army bivouacked through the night.

On the 8th the abatis was perfected; our volunteers exchanged shots with the enemy's advanced guards. The arrival of Chevalier de Levy, who had previously been destined to proceed to Corlac, and whose destination was changed because the Marquis de Vaudreuil did not wish to divide his forces, through fear of being overwhelmed by the multitude of reports, [made no] other change in the Marquis de Montcalm's arrangements, than that of entrusting to him the defence of the right, and of changing M. de Bourlamaque to the left. Chevalier le Mercier, commander-in-chief of the Artillery of New France [and all the officers] under his orders, were employed in arranging the cannon at the places indicated by the Marquis de Montcalm.

At half-past twelve the columns of the English commenced to deploy against our guards, who immediately came in without confusion with the grenadier companies and workmen. A gun was fired as a signal and in a moment all the soldiers were at their posts.

At one o'clock the enemy attacked us with great impetuosity. They made six consecutive assaults, approached even the abatis. They were formed in three principal columns; the firing was extremely brisk on both sides until six o'clock in the evening and continued until nightfall.

Our army which consisted of only 2,900 combatants of French Regulars and 400 Canadians, has resisted all the different attacks, my Lord, with a courage worthy of heroes.

We ran many risks for 2 or 3 hours; fortunately our troops did not flinch; all our officers have performed prodigies of valor; the soldiers, following their example, have done things which posterity will scarcely credit. It is to be regretted that there was not a greater number of Colonial troops and Canadians. Chevalier de Levy, under whose eyes they have fought, speaks highly of them; as they were the most alert, he made them make two sorties, led by some indefatigable officers; M. d'Hert, Adjutant of La Reine, headed one, and M. de Noes, Captain in the same regiment, the other.

M. de Remond, Captain of the troops of the Colony, has commanded the Colonial troops in this action; he has afforded, on that occasion, proofs of his zeal and intelligence; the same is generally the case with the Colonial officers who were there.

We are indebted for this victory to the courage of the troops, to the sorties which Chevalier de Levy had executed on the right by some pickets and a company of grenadiers, at the same time that he sent some active Canadians into the opening (of the intrenchment); to M. de Bourlamaque's firmness and his excellent arrangements on the left; all the Commandants of corps and generally everyone, my Lord, behaved very well, and furnished proofs of their zeal and valor.

Fearing that the enemy would land some men in barges, which they attempted at the commencement of the attack, Bernard and Duprat's volunteers were guarding that part of our abatis, and M. de Louvicourt, an Artillery officer, who was serving three pieces of cannon at the fort, sunk a pontoon and a barge. This, with the fire of the volunteers, caused the retreat of twenty barges which the English had sent forward.

Chevalier de Montreuil, the Adjutant-General, caused to be transmitted with the greatest activity, the orders necessary to animate and encourage the troops, and for the distribution of the ammunition, which the gentlemen of the second battalion of Berry and the officers of the artillery sent forward with the greatest diligence. That battalion had its grenadier company defending the abatis, and although the officers belonging to it have been much mortified at not being there, they have been most useful elsewhere, and have lost several soldiers in the different journeys through and fro.

M. Duplessie, a Colonial officer, who landed at the moment of the action, proceeded immediately against the enemy with 80 soldiers of his company that were with him.

Assurances are given that the enemy retired in the night, and that they have abandoned a portion of their wounded. Our troops passed the night in order of battle, to avoid all surprise and prevent the enemy, who had fresh troops, re-commencing the fight under cover of the night, which they might easily have done.

From the report of different prisoners, it is estimated that the enemy amounted to fourteen thousand men at the least, eight thousand of whom belonged to their best troops, and that they had the remainder behind abatis between the Falls and our field of battle, to secure their retreat. Their loss exceeds five thousand men, killed or wounded; two thousand dead bodies have been found along our abatis. Lord Dawh,<sup>1</sup> who commanded the attack, is reported killed. Our loss, the exact amount of which we have not yet ascertained, is five @ six hundred killed or wounded in the affairs of the 6th and 8th. Only thirty-eight Canadians are among this number. M. Lusignan has informed the Marquis de Montcalm, the day after the action, that the deserters sent to him report the enemy's army to have been composed of 18 @ 20 thousand men, which is verified, 'tis said, by a letter found in the pocket of an English officer who was killed, and that Lord Dawh,<sup>1</sup> the Major-General, and 3000 men have lost their lives on the occasion. We are assured that numbers besides have been wounded. You may infer from this, my Lord, that their loss must be very heavy.

It had been much to be desired that we had had some Indians to pursue them at the close of the action; these joined to a detachment that the Marquis de Montcalm could have confided to Chevalier de Levy, might have crushed and cut in pieces the rest of the English.

All those who have seen that general officer in the fire say, that they have never known a man more tranquil and more intrepid, and it can, with justice, be said, that he behaved like a General perfectly acquainted with the art of war.

Our enemies, my Lord, are greatly humbled; these braggarts had 500 Indians, whom they had requested to be spectators of their bravery and of the capture of our forts, but these Indians have been witnesses of their defeat.

I have just received a letter from Carillon, informing me that a great number of English have been discovered dead two leagues from Carillon. It is presumed that dissensions broke out among them.

I think, my Lord, that they have no longer any project to conceal.

We have at present several detachments of Canadians and Indians roving in the neighborhood of Lydius and Fort George.

One of our soldiers who deserted to the English assured them that Chevalier de Levy was going to Corlac with 2,000 men, which made them resolve on sending 7 @ 8,000 men thither; if they go there, they will be grossly deceived, as they will not find any one.

You must be already informed, my Lord, that the English presented themselves at the latter end of May before Louisbourg, in the design of besieging it, with 24 ships of war, 11 frigates, three fire-ships, one bomb-ketch and 130 transports, and that they had effected a landing on the 8th of June in the Bay of Gabarus, to the number of 12 @ 14,000 men, when we were driven back and repulsed to the very walls of the place, and their [force landed] at Point Blanche, situate west of the above bay.

I am not sufficiently well informed, my Lord, to furnish you an exact detail of what occurred at these landings, but the captain of a small craft, arrived here on the 9th of this month from Port Dauphin, has reported that the English had fought the islot, which is at the mouth of the port, during 26 days, without any success, whilst we lost only one man, and that they had abandoned that enterprise; that we have had sunk in the channel of Louisbourg three frigates and one ship from St. Malo, to obstruct their passage; that that manœuvre had created considerable misunderstanding between the Military and Naval commanders; that no trench had been opened and that they were not further advanced than the day they landed.

We learn this moment that the English have still 10,000 men in the intrenchments which they have thrown up at old Fort George and at Lydius, but we are assured that they will not make any new demonstrations against our forts this year.

The people of this Continent demand peace; they declare openly that they cannot stand against us. All their Militia are beginning to disband.

M. Albert Combey,<sup>1</sup> who was reported to have died of vexation, is wonderfully well.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DAINE.

17th August, 1758. A courier has just arrived this moment, my Lord, from Carillon with intelligence that a detachment of 400 men, consisting of Canadians, Colonials and Indians, commanded by M. de la Corne St. Luc, attacked on the Lydius road, the 30th July last, at one o'clock in the afternoon, a convoy of about 150 men who were conducting 54 wagons loaded with provisions, which they captured and destroyed, not being able to save them; they killed 230 oxen and took 80 scalps and 64 prisoners—men, women and children. We lost only one Iroquois; two others have been slightly wounded.<sup>2</sup>

M. Doreil to Marshal de Belle Isle.

Quebec, 31st August, 1758.

My Lord,

Since the great day of the 8th, the M<sup>re</sup> de Montcalm has always had some detachments in the field to harass and watch the enemy. These detachments had likewise for object to place themselves between the enemy's intrenched camp on the ruins of Fort William Henry and Fort Edward, to attack and destroy their convoys. They have had divers success. The first, which marched on the 16th of July under the orders of a Colonial Captain, returned the 21st with 10 prisoners and 24 scalps. The impatience of the Indians prevented this detachment destroying a party of 300 English which had taken refuge in a stockaded inclosure lately erected to serve as a dépôt on the Fort Edward road.

The second, likewise under the command of a Colonial Captain, which left the camp the latter part of July, fell in also on the Fort Edward road, at the enemy's camp, with a convoy of 40 carts, each of which had from 4 to 6 oxen yoked to it; these carts were loaded with provisions, effects, merchandise, &c.<sup>ca</sup>. They destroyed them entirely. The oxen were killed; the carts burnt; the property pillaged by the Indians; 110 scalps were secured and 84 prisoners taken; of these, 12 are women or girls. The escort, which was defeated, consisted of 40 men, commanded by a Lieutenant, who has been taken; the remainder of the men, who were killed or taken prisoners, consisted of wagoners, suttlers, traders, women and children. The English, 'tis known, feel this loss very sensibly. Some baggage and effects belonging to General Abercrombie, as well as his music, were among the plunder.

On the news of this defeat, the English General sent a very considerable force in pursuit, under the command of the partisan Robert Rogers, but he was too late. He was on the point of returning, when, on the advice of a Colonial gunner, a deserter, he received orders to lay in ambush to surprise a third detachment which the Marquis de Montcalm had just dispatched under the orders of M. Marin, a Colonial officer of great reputation. This detachment was composed of 50 Regulars, 100 Canadians and 150 Indians. That of the enemy, of about 700 men. They met in the woods, about seven o'clock in the morning of the 8th of August, and in spite of superior numbers, M. Marin made his arrangements to fight the enemy. He forced them to waver by two volleys, which killed a great many; but having been supported by the Regulars, they rallied and the firing was brisk on both sides for nearly an hour. M. Marin, perceiving that they were receiving a reinforcement, and the Indians, who feared that they would not be able to carry off some wounded, demanding to retire, he was obliged to think of retreating, which he did in good order, and without being pursued, after having, for an hour longer, kept up a fire with such picked men as he had, who performed prodigies of valor. The Indians, in general, have also behaved well; but of 100 Canadians, more than 60 deserted M. Marin, no one knows wherefore, at the very moment when the English were wavering. This somewhat astonished the Indians, and prevented that brave officer deriving all the advantage he could from the circumstance.

Meanwhile, our loss is but trifling in comparison with that the enemy must have suffered, which is estimated at over 200 men. Scouts, sent on their trail, have seen a great many wounded, whom they were carrying on litters, and a great many dead on the field of action.

M. Marin took some prisoners, 2 of them officers, now here. On our side we have had 3 soldiers, 3 Canadians and 4 Indians killed; two Cadets, one soldier, 5 Canadians and 4 Indians wounded—the majority of them very slightly.

This, my Lord, is what has occurred of interest since the great event of the 8th of July. Some other detachments have gone out, two of them under the orders of Chev: de Levis, but their object was only to reconnoitre the position of the enemy, who numbered 12,000 men, intrenched on the ruins of Fort William Henry since the latter part of July, retaining all their artillery, ammunition, &c., having sent back only the Militia, and receiving succors from Fort Edward and Orange. It appears they intend attacking the Marquis de Montcalm anew and rebuilding Fort William Henry. We are not able to oppose this. M. de Montcalm is nearly as weak since the . . . of this month as he was when attacked. The Canadians and Indians, to the number of about two thousand, who arrived at his quarters only on the thirteenth of July, have departed for the harvest. This is a very critical time for him, my Lord, until the 15th of October, should the enemy wish to profit by it. Miracles cannot be always expected.

Louisbourg was taken the 27th of July; a pilot who had made his escape from that place, brought us this bad news three days ago, without any particulars. We only know that our men-of-war have been burnt, except le Bienfaisant; that the officers, soldiers and crews are prisoners of war; also that the garrison was reduced, according to the report of this pilot, to 1,500 men, after the most gallant resistance. Nothing, my Lord, prevents the General of the Louisbourg army detaching in the latter end of July a considerable corps to reinforce General Abercrombie, and the latter making a combined movement to fight the Marquis de Montcalm's little army, cut off all his communication, and again advance before the 15th of October into the interior of the Colony and even near Montreal, where assuredly there would be no means to stop him. The English are perhaps at this very moment masters of Fort Duquesne and the whole of the Beautiful river. At least they will be so in a short time, as a force of twelve thousand men with two pieces of cannon and two mortars must have arrived there. Six thousand have marched by General Bradok's road, and six thousand by another shorter and easier communication in the direction of the River aux bœufs; another body of six thousand men, under Colonel Johnson's orders, is actually on Lake Ontario, to rebuild Chouaguen and seize Fort Frontenac, where we have a garrison of only 50 men. It is idle to flatter ourselves any longer, my Lord; Canada is lost if peace be not made this winter. The English have at this moment over sixty thousand Regulars or Provincials in America; we have not five thousand to oppose them, including land and Marine troops, near one thousand of whom are dispersed in different posts and garrisons. We have never seen more than two thousand Canadians together; the remainder have been always employed either in the posts of the Upper country or in transportation, or in practices equally detrimental to the King's interests and the good of his service. The fall of Isle Royale increases the enemy's means, already too powerful, of closing the mouth of the River St. Lawrence and preventing the arrival of all succors from Europe, and, without coming by sea to Quebec, perhaps rendering himself next year, by the Upper route, master of the entire country. The capture of Fort Duquesne and the neighboring posts, that of Fort Frontenac, at the mouth of Lake Ontario, where the whole of our navy lies, of the lakes, Chouaguen and Fort William Henry, assure, from this moment, the conquest to him the more readily, as he can, when he pleases, increase still further his considerable forces. The English Colonies are able to furnish, independent of the troops, more than two hundred thousand men, and by calling out the ban and arrière ban of Canada, ten thousand would not be mustered capable of bearing arms, which, joined to the Regular troops with us, would form a total of 14 @ 15,000 men. And, in order to be able to employ them in the field, we must abandon all sort of work, keeping posts for the peltry trade, the cultivation of the soil; consequently renounce the harvests, the sole resource against perishing of hunger.

Such, my Lord, is the true point of view in which Canada must be now considered. The Minister of the Marine has been always too much flattered, and perhaps people will dare flatter him still. Ten or twelve thousand troops may be called for; a considerable fleet of ships of war to convoy them and the necessary provisions and stores; all this might, indeed, enable us to hold out a little longer, and postpone our utter ruin, but the King would not be indemnified for the enormous expense this new reinforcement would occasion. War continuing, Canada would always finish by being taken sooner or later. We know, beyond a doubt, that the Court of England, impelled by the frenzy of the nation, is resolved to invade it, at whatever cost. That Court has the means and will use them to the last farthing; besides the continuation of the war in this hemisphere is ruinous to the King, more in consequence of bad administration and great cupidity than of indispensable expenses. 'Tis, therefore, absolutely necessary, my Lord, to think only of making peace, without being very particular about the boundaries. It had been desirable that their extension into Acadia, and the building of Fort Duquesne had never been thought of. Excuse, my Lord, all these reflections of an honest citizen; [attribute them] to my zeal for the King's service and my respectful attachment for yourself. They are written as much at the Marquis de Montcalm's suggestion as at my own, and were I my own master I would depart in order to have the honor of communicating them to you vivâ voce, and to inform you of a thousand most important things, too long and too hazardous to be communicated to you in writing. 'Twould be one of the most essential services I could ever render the state. M. de Moras' retirement which we have just learnt, and M. de Massiac's appointment to the Ministry may promote the peace policy. I have the honor to be known so well to the latter as to flatter myself with his confidence were I near him, but I shall take good care not to entertain him by letter; 'tis to you alone, my Lord, that I must address myself, and I do so in all confidence, relying fully on your goodness to be assured that I shall not be compromised.

I have had the honor to mention M. Péan to you in my letter of the 12th instant. Regard him as one of the principal causes of the bad administration and ruin of this unfortunate country. I have told you he was worth two millions, I have not dared to say four, although I might say so, according to public report. His wealth does not create, in my breast, any more envy than that of many others, but I groan at it through love for my master's interest and service.

Permit me, once again, my Lord, to beg of you to preserve my letters in the secrecy of your desk. The motive which induces me to communicate such sad truths to you, is too laudable for me to apprehend being its unjust victim; besides, have the goodness to bear in mind that I am obliged, as well by duty as by zeal, to make up for the Marquis de Montcalm's inability to write to you from the army, where he has not his cipher. Should he permit me to go to France this fall, it would be a great advantage; I could tell you more; nothing would suffer by my absence, owing to the arrangements I should make.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

P. S. 1st September. News from Montreal of the 29th informs us that the English force which proceeded to Lake Ontario with cannon, rendezvoused at the Bay of Bombaouare<sup>1</sup> and sent a vanguard of 2,700 men against Frontenac, a miserable bicoque, having a garrison of only 50 men. It is our entrepôt of provisions and goods for all the Upper country posts, which constitute the entire resource of Canada; it is the key of Lake Ontario, the port which holds all our navy, consisting, in part, of the vessels taken at Chouaguen, by M. de Montcalm, two years ago. The enemy is, no doubt, master of it at present, whilst another force is proceeding, perhaps, against Niagara, a very important post which has been skilfully fortified by a Captain belonging to the battalion of La Reine,<sup>2</sup> but equally bare with the other. All the Upper country posts, of which Fort Duquesne forms a part, fall of themselves. We have more than two thousand men scattered among them, and that accelerates the total ruin of Canada. All the Canadians who were beginning their harvest, are put in motion to proceed to that quarter, but they will, certainly, arrive too late; the harvest will suffer, and the M<sup>te</sup> de Montcalm who, since the fall of Louisbourg, is menaced by the strong army in his front, will not be reinforced. What would it be, were he beaten and cut off? 'Tis impossible, reasonably, to conceal the fact, that everything is to be feared, and very little to be hoped. M. de Vaudreuil has remained in too great security in regard to the important post of Frontenac, and he is the dupe of the over confidence he has placed in the Indians, whose services he needs, but they must always be treated with caution and distrust. More foresight, activity and vigilance are, besides, necessary, when one has to do with a powerful enemy who is always superior in forces and means. I tremble with fear that we have not had the precaution nor time to burn the sloops and bateaux which we had at Frontenac, and that the enemy will profit by them to cut us off, absolutely, from all access to Lake Ontario, whereby all our people beyond it will be made prisoners. It is no less to be feared, that the Indians, who usually side with the strongest or most fortunate, will all abandon us to range themselves alongside the English.

DOREIL.

3rd September. My fears are too well founded, my Lord; the enemy is master of the post of Frontenac or Cataracouy since the 27th of August. No precaution was taken with our navy. The English, more careful than we, have burnt it, with the exception of two 20 gun brigs, which they have preserved, the more effectually to exclude us from Lake Ontario. The provisions and merchandize destined for supplying all our posts in the Upper Countries, to which Frontenac, bad as it was, served as an entrepôt, are lost, and what is still more vexatious, is the loss of a considerable artillery. This principally consisted of the cannon taken from the enemy at Braddock's affair in 1755, and at that of Chouaguen in 1756; there were at least 80 pieces of cannon there. Everything is now to be feared for Fort Niagara which, indeed, is good, but as bare as Frontenac. And what must be a greater source of uneasiness, is the frontier of Lake St. Sacrament, where M. de Montcalm is menaced by as considerable a force as the first, whilst he has so weak an army. It is easy to see, my Lord, from the different movements of the enemy, that if the General had not arrested and beaten them on the 8th of July, almost the whole of Canada would be at present in the power of the English. I forgot another unfortunate circumstance, and what I have equally foreseen. The Indians have attacked us; they seized, on Lake Ontario, three canoes on the way down loaded with peltries and have murdered the hands. A melancholy precursor of what we have to fear from them. Peace! Peace! My Lord, pardon me, I cannot too often repeat these words.

DOREIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Massiac.

Montreal, 2nd September, 1758.

My Lord,

By the letters I have had the honor to write you per the frigate La Valeur, you will have seen :

1st The motives which led me to dispatch, towards Corlac, at the opening of the campaign, a considerable detachment, under the orders of Chevalier de Levis, to profit by the favorable disposition of the Five Nations to make them take up the hatchet and excite against the English new enemies who might be able to prevent them penetrating in these parts.

2nd The absolute necessity I found myself in, by the delay of the provisions which obliged me to postpone the departure of that detachment, to recall them whilst on the march in order to send assistance to the Marquis de Montcalm's army.

3rd That since our success of the 8th, at Carillon, I had successively caused troops to be forwarded to that quarter, according as provisions permitted, both to enable the Marquis de Montcalm to oppose any new efforts of the English and to place his fort and intrenchments in a state of defence as well as to have the means of forming large detachments which could disquiet and destroy the convoys of the enemies, hoping, thereby, to be able to make them abandon Lake George and fall back on Fort Lydius.

4th M. de Longueuil's mission, whereof I have had the honor to render you an account in one of my letters of the 20th ultimo.

Since then, my Lord, the greatest event about Carillon is the detachment of about 250 men under the command of M<sup>r</sup> Marin, who encountered one of 800 English from which he extricated himself very handsomely, as you will have the means of seeing by the account I have the honor to transmit to you in one of my letters of the 18th of August. The Marquis de Montcalm has continued corresponding with General Abercromby on the subject of exchanges ; you will find annexed to my despatch of the first of this month, copy of the different letters which have been written on the one side and the other.

The season of harvest having arrived at last, the Marquis de Montcalm has sent me back a portion of the Canadians belonging to his army ; as I was afraid the English might profit by that moment to attack Carillon anew, I had vehicles prepared at St. John and renewed a general order to every farmer to be ready to march at a moment's warning. Such were the measures I had adopted for that quarter.

That of Lake Ontario was engaging my attention, but the assurances the 5 Iroquois Nations had given M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil that they would come to me in 20 days ; that the English were thinking at the time only of reëstablishing Fort Bul ; the idea that they might indeed attempt to reconstruct ancient Choueguen and that they would not dare to enter the lake on which we had vessels, were, for me, motives of tranquillity on which, however, I should not have relied had I had any force; but the enemy I considered most to be feared was the continuation of the scarcity to which the Colony is reduced for more than a year.

In view of being instructed as to the movements of the English, I sent, in spite of the prayers of the 5 Nations, some parties from the village of La Présentation and some Mississagués whom M. de Noyan dispatched from Frontenac agreeably to my orders. One of these parties, consisting of four Mississagués, espied a well armed barge in which the English were gone on a scout, but those Indians were too few to be able to pursue them; they found, on that occasion, two papers written in English, whereof I have the honor to transmit you the translation. They fell in, farther on, with two English, whom they killed, as those men were unwilling to march; the Indians then set out with the news for Frontenac.

Those papers, as well as a letter from M. de Noyan did not reach me until one o'clock in the morning of the 26th of last month.

I ordered la générale to be immediately beat, and without any regard to the harvest, levied 1,500 men, soldiers, farmers and Indians, in the government of Montreal, the command of whom I committed to M<sup>r</sup> Duplessis Fabert, Major of this town. They set out the next day, a part from La Chine to relieve Frontenac, but the English had marched thither a corps of 4,500 men under the command of Colonel Broadstreet, with so much despatch that M<sup>r</sup> de Noyan was obliged to capitulate on the 27th, after having had one of his bastions opened; he did not adopt that course until after he had assembled a council of war, at which all the opinions accorded. That fort, as I have had the honor to report to you on a preceding occasion, was incapable of making any resistance. Therefore I consider the loss we have suffered at that place to consist only of two of our largest sloops, whereof the English are in possession. I admit to you, my Lord, that I should never have foreseen the occurrence of the latter event, supposing, if the winds did not admit of their being sent to Niagara or La Présentation, that, at least, they would have been burnt. This is the sole reproach I have to make against M. de Noyan, and the only thing that now affords me any serious uneasiness for Niagara, which finds itself bare of men and ammunition, M. de Vassan having sent a portion of them to defend M. de Ligneris at the Beautiful river.

The enemy have found at Frontenac considerable provisions, goods and artillery, which were intended for the posts on the Beautiful river and for Niagara. One of the sloops was loaded with those articles; that fort being the entrepôt of our Lake Ontario navy, it could not happen otherwise; even though I should have had 5 or 600 men at that post, they could not defend it in consequence of its construction; and in order to avoid a check there, it would have been necessary for me to have an army on the spot able to fight that of the English; otherwise, once shut up in Frontenac, numbers would only hasten its surrender.

The English have sent back here all who were found in that place, although prisoners of war.

The Captains and crews of two large sloops who had been sent to shelter themselves from a battery, having been obliged by the fire of that battery to abandon them, escaped in their boat without being included in the capitulation. M<sup>r</sup> Despinassi, an officer of artillery, who came from Niagara to that fort in quest of materials, has performed his duty very well, according to the report rendered me by M<sup>r</sup> de Noyan, who has spoken to me in equal terms of commendation of all the officers, soldiers, militiamen, and of the few Indians he had with him.

As soon, my Lord, as I was aware that the sloops were in the hands of the English, my uneasiness for Niagara increased in consequence of the difficulty of getting to that place. I have at the moment dispatched 30 bark canoes to overtake M<sup>r</sup> Duplessis and have ordered him to deliver them to M<sup>r</sup> de Montigny whom I have intrusted to repair to Niagara with 5 @ 600 men, some additional gunners and 20 thousand weight of powder. I hope that if time be given to this detachment to arrive at Niagara, 'twill be out of danger, and that, as the bark canoes can be hid in the woods, they will escape the vigilance of the sloops. I could not confide this detachment to a more active officer than M<sup>r</sup> de Montigny.

I likewise, my Lord, ordered up 1500 men from Quebec and Three Rivers. A camp is about to be formed at La Présentation to protect the Colony at that side; annoy the English at Chouaguen; prevent them going to Niagara for fear of being attacked in the rear; guard the entrepôt I am about establishing there to provision all our posts this fall; have parties out from whom I shall obtain information respecting the movements of the English and their force.

As soon as harvest permits, my Lord, I shall send off all that will be fit to march, and endeavor to oppose, if possible, the reëstablishment of Chouaguen, either at the end of the season or in winter.

I have written to the Marquis de Montcalm, requesting him to come and confer with me on the measures to be adopted in order that his troops may support patiently the great fatigues they will experience in the execution of my projects. I had in like manner a design to make an attempt on Beautiful river, should the English have become masters of it.

You can, my Lord, assure the King that I shall not neglect any thing to place, during the winter, his Colony in the same condition it was before the war, so that, should peace be concluded this winter, we would retain our own possessions and the English not be established at Chouaguen, but in spite of all my efforts I dare not flatter myself with success on account of the number of enemies I have on my hands from all sides; the newspapers announce 60 thousand in these parts, including Regulars and Provincials.

Peace appears to me an absolute necessity for this Colony, and should it not be concluded, 'tis important, my Lord, that you call attention to the vast consumptions we are about to make this winter for our armies; the exhaustion of our soldiers, the new enemies I shall have on my hands in the troops who have been occupied at the siege of Louisbourg, in those on the Beautiful river, should the English be successful, and maintained there by the Nations who defend it, whom we should infallibly lose.

If the English should make their appearance at Toronto, I have given orders to burn it at once, and to fall back on Niagara. I shall have sloops built this winter, either to fight those of the English or to serve as transports on our lakes.

After having examined our situation, my Lord, in the Upper countries, it remains for me to speak to you of the river [St Lawrence.] Public intelligence and the depositions of prisoners from all parts, announce to me that after the fall of Louisbourg, the victorious army will enter the river, either for the purpose of operating there or at least of engaging me to a diversion. You know the total of the forces of the Colony; subdivide them, my Lord; calculate besides combatants, those who are by their age and infirmities incapable of serving, those employed both in transportation and stores, religious houses, the families dispersed on all sides along the river, women and children, cattle, the necessary abandonment of the houses, barns and grain, the misery to which these people are reduced, and the impossibility I am in to oblige them to furnish their subsistence in such case, and you will easily form an idea of the situation I find myself in, having charge of the Colony.

As the ships of war at present at Quebec, will soon have only provisions sufficient for their return to France, I have determined, on the requisition of M. Duchaffaut, to permit him to return home, but I give him orders, in case he be informed in the river that the English fleet design to enter it, to return to Quebec and to leave two ships embossés at Ile aux Cudres, as ordered last year; the others would serve to furnish our batteries, oblige the ships of war to pass the Traverse and thereby expose them the more to the rafts and other stratagems which would be resorted to in the river and might enable us to reach the bad season which will assuredly rid us of them.

Such, my Lord, is a rough draft of my general plan, whence 'twill be easy for you to conclude that if the war continue next year, His Majesty will be obliged to send us powerful assistance in provisions, men and ships, so as to be able to cope with the enemy's forces.

I am with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

Conditions on which M<sup>r</sup> de Noyan, Knight of the Royal and Military order of Saint Louis, King's Lieutenant for the town of Three Rivers, Commandant for the King at Fort Frontenac, proposes to surrender it to his Britannic Majesty.

1.

Sieur de Noyan promises to surrender Fort Frontenac generally, with all its dependencies, to Colonel Broadstreet, Commandant of the troops of England.

2.

The officers and soldiers of the garrison and others actually at this post, shall remain prisoners of war, until an agreement be concluded for their exchange by the Marquis de Montcalm and the English General.

3.

The sick and wounded shall be attended at the expense of the King of Great Britain.

4.

He shall guarantee against all insults on the part of the English soldiers and Indians, the officers, soldiers and all other persons whatsoever now actually in the fort.

5.

The Colonel shall permit the ornaments and sacred vessels of the chapel to be removed in the baggage of the Chaplain, and Sieur de Noyan promises to give up faithfully all the munitions of war and provisions, and generally all the goods & implements that are actually in the magazines of said fort.

Sieur de Noyan demands that there be furnished him his soldiers and the rest of the persons with him in the fort, conveyances to transport their baggage and necessities for the voyage.

Frontenac, 27th August, 1758.

Colonel Broadstreet, in consideration of the infirmities of M<sup>r</sup> de Noyan, Commandant of this fort, permits him to return to Mont Real, and to take four men ; the same to M<sup>me</sup> Duvivier, Mdme. Barollon and the other women belonging to this fort who are without men.

(Signed), JN. BROADSTREET and DE NOYAN.

M. de Noyan engages to procure Colonel Schuyler in exchange for himself, or some other person, should it happen that M<sup>r</sup> Schuyler has been already exchanged.

After the capitulation was concluded, Colonel Broadstreet permitted all the French in Fort Frontenac to depart for Mont Real in Canada, under the promise M. de Noyan has given, to have a like number of persons and ranks surrendered as soon as the same can be done, and conveyed to Fort George.

Colonel Bradstreet's Instructions to the Commander of a Scouting Party.

Sir,

I have given orders to Captain Wells, who is in the Bateaux department, to join you to-night with eleven men in one barge, and you will take your company and the barges you have, so as to advance in the manner following, viz: You will to-morrow descend Wook creek, pass in the night Lake Oneida* as far as the mouth of the Onondaga river, and the following night proceed as far as the Island, one mile and a half above and on this side of the Chouegen rapids, which Captain Wells will indicate to you ; and from that place you will scout continually as far as Choueguen, to see what can possibly be discovered, until I join you, observing not to allow yourself to be seen by friends or others, and your scouts will not follow the ordinary route as far as the Choueguen rapids, nor in going to Choueguen either.

Private.

Quebec, 31st August, 1758.

My Lord,

The special favors with which you have honored me, the gratitude I preserve in return, and the respectful attachment I have vowed to you long ago, are for me most powerful motives to impel me with joy and ardor to commence a correspondence to which I shall devote myself still more by inclination than by duty. My position, the mission which the King has been pleased to entrust to me in America, oblige me to report to the Minister of the Marine. I have endeavored for more than four years to do so with exactitude with the Keeper of the Seals and with M. de Moras. The former, who has been pleased to express to me his satisfaction therewith, has had the goodness to honor me with his answers on the points appertaining to the service which required them, and to concur in procuring for me, in 1756, a favor from the King. This is a real consolation, and a great motive of emulation for a zealous subject. I have been deprived of it by M. de Moras, and I dare to say, without having deserved it. I hope, my Lord, I shall not experience a similar mortification at your hands. I have not solicited the mission to Canada. You will remember, my Lord, that I did not determine on it except forcibly, in obedience to the King's orders and in response to the choice Count D'Argenson was so good as to make of me. I have, through zeal, abandoned children in the cradle, my domestic affairs, which are more and more in danger and occasion me serious losses. I am in the fourth year of a severe service, and the more painful as I have attended to it alone during an exile as long as it is disagreeable, and which that Minister had assured me would not exceed two years. The least, indeed, that ought to be expected is some mark of approbation for one's service. This is what touches the nearest a right thinking man, who occupies himself only with serving honestly and affording proofs more and more of his zeal.

As I must suppose, my Lord, that you will call for the letters I have had the honor to write to M. de Moras on the 15th June and 28th July of this year, I have dispensed with any additional details in these, having no particular matter to report since my last. No more recruits have arrived, which, however, we greatly need to reinforce our feeble battalions. The flyboat L'Outarde, which is sometime in the river, has a few, but sickness prevails on board that vessel, and a portion of them have already died.

Things have been greatly changed, my Lord, since the signal victory gained by the Marquis de Montcalm and the French troops on the 8th of July—a day ever memorable, which has saved the Colony for the time. The capture of Louisbourg, the movements of the enemy on the Oyo and at Fort Duquesne, those which they are making on Lake Ontario, where our posts are absolutely bare, and General Abercrombie's powerful army, which continues opposed to the Marquis de Montcalm, place it in great danger this very year, and will bring down its total ruin if peace be not concluded this winter. 'Tis evident that the Indians of the Five Iroquois Nations and even some of our domiciliated tribes have deceived the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who has perhaps confided too much in them, and who, on the strength of their promises, had scarcely any person at Niagara or at Fort Frontenac. The latter is, no doubt, now in the hands of the enemy, and unfortunately 'tis the door of Lake Ontario, the key of the Upper countries and the entrepôt of the provisions and goods destined for those parts and of our navy. The English have actually more troops on foot in this Continent than Canada has people, old men, women and children included. What means are there to enable us to resist this multitude? Besides the disaster in the Upper country, we have yet to fear a new attack at Carillon on the Marquis de Montcalm, and that the enemy will be more successful than it was at first. 'Tis probable that they are again reinforced by a part of the army employed at the siege of Louisbourg, which terminated on the 27th of July. Reliance can indeed be placed on the superior talents, activity and prudence of the Marquis de Montcalm, seconded by Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Levis and de Bourlamaque, as well as on the valor of the troops, but people must not always expect miracles, such as those which have been wrought hitherto. 'Tis by these, my Lord, that the Canada machine, ever ready to fall, has kept itself up for three years, but there is no longer reason to flatter oneself; we are approaching its total ruin, and nothing but peace can guarantee the country against such a fate. I owe these reflections to my zeal for the King's service and to my attachment for you, my Lord. I should extend them farther, and would add many other very important ones thereto if I had the cypher of the Marine, as well as that which I have of the War. I should, perhaps, have already expressed too much, did I not confide this letter to the secrecy of your cabinet; wherefore, I take the liberty to address it to you private, under a double envelope. Should I obtain leave to proceed to France this fall, as I propose doing only through zeal, you will see, my Lord, that my presence will not be useless, and that it is, perhaps, the greatest service I can render. I have the honor to be sufficiently known to you to be very desirous of meriting your confidence. I am much so to Marshal de Belleisle and most particularly so to M. de Cremille.

I shall take the liberty, my Lord, to submit to you, immediately, a just representation in favor of M. la Rochette, formerly commis à la majorité of the Marine, at Toulon, who has accompanied me hither, with the promise of an allowance, by order of the Keeper of the Seals; he has been and is still essentially useful, and without his assistance I could not have got through the work with which I have found myself burthened; he remains, up to this time, without any recompense. As he has the good fortune to be known to you, my Lord, and to have positive promises from the Ministers, your predecessors, he expects all from your justice and protection. The Commissaries of the War Departments who left with me or were sent since, have been taken. M. Bernier, whom the Court has sent this year, fell ill on his arrival, of a deadly sickness from which he has not yet recovered, and I cannot expect any assistance from him for some time, the rather as he is very inexperienced in the commissariat, being only appointed last March. Time will be required to instruct him; 'tis a duty which I shall confide to Sieur la Rochette whenever my occupations, for I have a great many, will not permit me attending to it myself.

I am, with the most profound respect, -

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

3<sup>d</sup> September. My conjectures and fears are only too truly realised, my Lord; the enemy are masters of Frontenac since the 27th of August: and what is worse, of our barks which have not been burnt; and of the provisions and goods stored at that post for the Upper countries. There was, also, unfortunately, a numerous artillery of about 60 guns, of which those taken at Braddock's affair in 1755, and at the siege of Chouaguen in 1756, formed a part. The Indians have begun attacking us. They have taken, on Lake Ontario, three canoes on the way from the Upper Countries, loaded with peltries, and have murdered the crews. I shall not enter into any further detail, my Lord: you will receive some from another source. Fears are entertained for Niagara and for the Marquis de Montcalm's army, likewise for the Beautiful river.

DOREIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Massiac.

Montreal, 6th September, 1758.

My Lord,

I received, this moment, the letter General Abercromby writes me dated the 2nd of this month at midnight, copy whereof I have the honor to annex, from which you will perceive, my Lord, that he will not treat for the exchange of our respective prisoners. M. Wolfs, who has been the bearer of my letter to that General, has seen a thousand barges and the camp of the enemy in the same state, as regards the number of men, as I have already reported to you. They have constructed a sloop (barque) which M. Wolf has seen at anchor out in Lake St. Sacrament.

According to the New-York Gazette, which has reached me, the capture of Louisbourg, on the 26th July, is very certain, and the fleet which has been employed in besieging that place is about to enter the River St. Lawrence. I address this last Gazette to M. Bigot and request him to get translated all that it may contain relative to this Colony and to give you an account of it.

My Lord, from all this you can judge that the situation of this Colony becomes, every day, more sad and critical, and that I have not exaggerated, in my letter, which I have had the honor to write you on the 2nd of this month. I must, in fact, expect to be attacked, simultaneously, on all sides. Be fully persuaded, I beg of you, my Lord, that there is nothing I will not do to preserve this Colony for his Majesty.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

Copy of General Abercromby's letter to M. de Vaudreuil.

Camp at Lake George, 2nd September, 1758, midnight.

Sir,

I am this moment honored with a letter from your Excellency of the 27th instant, by Mr. Wolf. However it happened, we have both ill understood the letters. Your Excellency must perceive that the power which authorizes me to annul the capitulation, orders me, also, not to do anything in conflict with such power. Wherefore I cannot, in any manner, agree to an exchange of prisoners which would exclude either those of the King, my master, or those of yours, taken before the 9th of August, 1757; consequently, as your Excellency does not choose to accept the exchange I have proposed, we must refer the whole matter to the decision of our respective Courts.

Your Excellency will now regard the power I have given Colonel Schuyler as null; permit me to recommend to you the enclosed letter for him.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,

Sir,

Your Excellency's obedient and

Most humble servant,

JAMES ABERCROMBY.

Montreal, 9th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1758.

My Lord,

The enemy, who we knew had dispatched a body of six thousand men toward Chouaguen, after the affair of the eighth of July, took possession, on the twenty-seventh of August, of Fort Frontenac, which in truth was good for nothing; but what is most unfortunate is, that they have taken considerable provisions, quantity of merchandize, eighty pieces of iron cannon, large and small, many of which they left after breaking the trunions, and destroyed the navy, for which we were indebted to my capture of Chouaguen; burning five of our sloops and carrying two of them away; we had only twelve men on each of these sloops. M. de Noyan, an officer of the Colonials, was in command at that post, with a feeble garrison of about seventy men, all of the same troops. That navy assured to us the superiority on lake Ontario, which we now lose. 'Twill be still worse should the enemy reduce Niagara, which is a strong post for this country; it is due to M. Pouchot, captain in the Bearn regiment, who had built it, and was in command there with some pickets of our troops and was relieved last fall by an officer and too small a garrison of Colonial troops. You will find it difficult to understand, my Lord, why only twenty iron guns remained at Frontenac, why our sloops were not kept armed and cruising. I can give no answer to your astonishment, except that I am, myself, as much surprised and astonished, who am on the spot, who have the honor to command the King's troops in this country under the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and I am as much affected by it as if the misfortune could be imputed to me or to the troops of the line, who have no share therein, and as if I had neglected to give my opinion and to communicate my predictions.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil has sent me a courier, who arrived on the evening of the 6th at the Camp of Carillon, with orders to deliver the command of the army to Chevalier de Levis and to come and confer with him, and I have just arrived. I hasten to write to you, as a courier is leaving and my letter may reach you by the vessels of war which are on the eve of sailing. I shall give such advice as will appear to me best, and will execute to the best of my ability whatever duty is confided to me.

I had demanded my recall after the glorious day of the eighth of July, but since the affairs of the Colony are getting bad, it is my duty to endeavor to repair them or to retard their ruin to the greatest extent of my power. I wish my intentions may be seconded; I dare not be responsible for that.

I shall not write by this conveyance to the Minister of the Marine. It is sufficient for me to write to you, my Lord, to whom I must report all events and my conduct.

I am, with respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,
MONTCALM.

Marshal de Belle Isle to M. de Vaudreuil.

Paris, 23rd September, 1758.

Sir,

I have received the letters you have done me the honor to write me on the 17th June, 30th July, 2nd, 3rd and 6th of August; the last brought me by M. Péan, Town Major of Quebec. Although I have not yet consulted with the King on the detail of our Canada despatches, I hasten to reply to you, in order not to lose the opportunity of a vessel which M. de Massiac informs me is to sail immediately for that quarter. I begin by thanking you for the compliment you pay me on my advent to the Ministry. I shall promptly coöperate in whatever will be required of me to contribute to the preservation of our Colonies. The battle of the 8th of July is an event the more interesting, as, in addition to the glory resulting to the King's troops from it in consequence of the vast disproportion of the forces we had to oppose the English, who were repulsed on that occasion, it compensates, in some sort, for the loss we have experienced at Louisbourg, or will, at least, put it out of the power of that Nation to gain any other advantages from us during the rest of the campaign. The King is well persuaded that in continuing to act in concert with M. de Montcalm, the same success is to be expected eventually from your wise arrangements and from the firmness a general officer exhibits in the command of the troops under his orders.

I have the honor to be most perfectly, &c.

Marshal de Belle Isle to M. de Montcalm.

Paris, 23 7<sup>bre</sup>, 1758.

Sir,

M. de Massiac sends to inform me that he is sending a courier to-night with his despatches to Brest, whence a vessel is to sail forthwith for Canada. Although I have not yet had any consultation with the King on the details of your last despatches, yet I do not wish to forego an opportunity of expressing to you all the satisfaction his Majesty feels with your services. We have learned here, almost at the same time by way of England, the loss of Louisbourg and M. Albercrombie's defeat, the news of which came to cast a gloom over the rejoicings people were making at London. Such a gallant defence, executed with forces so disproportionate, can be attributed only to the wisdom of the measures you have adopted for the protection of the Colony and to the courage with which you inspired the troops by your firmness. You must not doubt the King's paying every possible attention to what you propose in favor of the officers who have distinguished themselves under your orders, and yourself being personally included in the favors his Majesty will distribute on so important an occasion. I reserve to myself to report to him what M. Doreil has written to me from you, and to advise you of the measures his Majesty will have thought proper to adopt to enable you to display your zeal with more freedom, and not to experience contradiction in what you will judge most useful for the good of his service. Meanwhile, I exhort you to continue to conduct yourself with all the circumspection you are capable of, and to employ in preference all the means of conciliation which can contribute to the greatest success of the affairs that are entrusted to you, and you have too well managed up to the present time, to permit his Majesty thinking of taking them out of your hands.

I have the honor to be most perfectly, &c.

Chevalier de Druccour to M. de Massiac.

Andover, 23 September, 1758.

My Lord,

Since the landing of the English on the 8th of June, I have had the honor to write you by the Comet, the Glocester, the Arethusa, and after the capture of Louisbourg, by two frigates which Admiral Boscawen sent to Europe before we embarked on board the Terrible. I gave M. Prevost, who sailed directly for France, copy of my journal to hand you; I am now impatient to learn whether you have approved my conduct, particularly in what relates to the King's ships. I shall not enter into a detail here of the reasons that determined me to that course, having sufficiently explained them to you in my letter by the Arethusa which I know has arrived; I referred you there to the King's letter, to your own and M. Desgouttes' instructions. My principal object has been to prolong the defence long enough to prevent Mess<sup>rs</sup> Boscawen and Amherst having time to carry on any operations against Canada. I was the more impelled to it by the certain intelligence I had received from Quebec, that M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm was marching against Fort Lydius, and that he was to meet the enemy at latest from the 15th to the 20th July; as I had not surrendered until the 26th it will be out of the power of the Generals, no matter what diligence they make, to undertake anything by the St. Lawrence and to forward troops to Lydius.

As for the situation of the place and the defence it was susceptible of, plenty of officers have come there the last 3 years, to know and admit that 23 ships of war, 18 frigates and a land force of 16,000 men were more than sufficient to master it, and the condition the place was in when they took possession of it, must afford the proof of the good will and bravery of the garrison. In all besieged towns, the soldier is one day in three beyond the enemy's fire; there was no such place at Louisbourg, and after the two barracks had been burnt, the troops slept at the foot of the rampart; the fortifications of the places attacked had totally crumbled down and were so accessible in many places, that even the women did not enter by the city gate, but at different points, the Dauphin's, King's and Queen's bastions. This, my Lord, is what is knowing to all the troops; and General Wolf himself, placed sentries at all these places to prevent disorder, and to save the town from being inundated by all the besiegers.

You will have observed by my journal that we made only one sortie, and the reasons which caused the failure of our other two.

I shall await with the greatest impatience, the moment of reporting myself to you, and beg you to tell me if you approve of my applying to the Admiralty for my return to France on my parole, which I shall not do without your orders.

I am with the most profound respect,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Abstract of M. de Vaudreuil's Despatch of the 2nd September, 1758.

CANADA.

[Omitted, as the Despatch is printed in full, supra, p. 822.]

M. Daine to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Quebec, 17th October, 1758.

My Lord,

On the 24th of last month we received news from Fort Duquesne. M. de Lignery, who commands there, informs the Marquis de Vaudreuil of his situation and observes to him that he is able to resist the enemy's efforts, should he be attacked, although he has learned from deserters, that the English were encamped at Fort Cumberland in pretty considerable numbers; but he is afraid of being in want of provisions. In consequence of this news, our Intendant is taking measures to have some conveyed thither.

We have been cramped in the direction of Lake Ontario by the unfortunate affair of Frontenac, whereof I have had the honor to inform you, my Lord; the English have since abandoned that post, having set it on fire and reduced to ashes the provisions, merchandise and ammunition for supplying the posts and Fort Niagara.

Nearly about the same time we learned that Lieutenant de Montigny, of the Colonials, who had set out to relieve Niagara, which was threatened, had fortunately arrived with his detachment and that he had not seen any English.

Four Xebecs of six four-pounders with two twelves, are to be immediately built on Lake Champlain, near Fort St. John, and two schooners of 10 guns, also, of 12, at La Présentation. We are assured that the English have actually, on that Lake, four well armed half-galleys for the expedition against Carillon.

You will doubtless have been already informed, my Lord, that they have seized on Gaspé where they are forming a post; they were there on the 20th of last month with 9 ships of war, 6 frigates and 15 transports. Only four men escaped, one of whom arrived here the 10th of this month.

M. de Vaudreuil has just received a letter from M. Prévost, formerly Commissary at Louisbourg, whereby he informs the Governor that the English have taken possession of the Island of St. John, and that they give out that they will come next spring with a formidable naval force to conquer Canada, and that they will attack us at the same time with such a superior army, at the upper part of the Colony, as easily to succeed in their enterprise. Despite of all their rhodomontades, I do not think, my Lord, that they will dare attempt any attack by the lower part of the river on account of the dangers to be incurred there. An idea may be formed of them by the three ships we have lost there this year, although having very good pilots; they will confine their operations, in my opinion, to the upper section and to blockading the lower passages so as to intercept, effectually, our succors.

The English of this continent, even the principal officers, admit that Holland has declared for us, and commenced hostilities against England; if this news, which we do not know, is true, we flatter ourselves we shall have peace next year.

The New England newspapers state that the King of Spain continues quiet, and that nothing can make him throw off his lethargy, and that the Kings of Sardinia and the two Sicilies appear very indifferent to what is passing in Europe. These same papers announce that the English troops sent to the Beautiful river were to be, on the 15th ult., within 35 miles of Fort Du Quesne by a different route from that taken by General Braddock.

They contain half an English gazette; the other half has doubtless been suppressed, to deprive us of a knowledge of what people were unwilling we should learn.

I am, with most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DAINE.

Journal of Occurrences in Canada, 1757, 1758.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Journal of Occurrences in the Garrisons or Camps occupied by the Regiment of Béarn, from the 20th October, 1757, to the 20th of October, 1758. [By Adjutant Malartic.]

[1757. October] 20th M de Boulamaque has sent off the troops of the Marine and the Militia belonging to the three districts; he embarked at noon with the grenadier company of the Royal Rousillon, three pickets of 60 militia for the Two Rocks,<sup>1</sup> the two battalions of the Royal Rousillon and Béarn have worked at the fort, cut wood and palisades.

21st Worked at the interior of the buildings of the wooden fort; finished the palisades; M. de Bourlamaque returned at 9 o'clock at night with a small detachment, very glad at having reconnoitered the Bay and Wood creek, on the banks of which he found no traces of the enemy.

22nd The Béarn regiment embarked at ten o'clock in 17 bateaux.

24th I arrived at St. John where I found the regiments of La Sarre and Languedoc encamped. La Reine had left there that morning to go and garrison Quebec.

25th I sent my bateau to Chambly to descend the river of that name, and took, with a small detachment, the La Prairie road, which I found almost impassable on account of the quantity of water in the swamps. Arrived at three o'clock at Laprairie, and at 5 at Montreal, where Chev. de Levis commands<sup>2</sup> in the absence of the Marquis de Vaudreuil.

28th The regiment landed at Point St. Charles; the 6 companies have gone to Lachine, Pointe Claire, St. Anne, and St. Geneviève; the remainder have come into town and been quartered there and in the suburbs.

29th The regiment has had rations at the rate of one pound of bread, half a pound of pork and  $\frac{1}{4}$  pound of pease.

1st November. The soldier's ration has been reduced to half pound of bread, one pound of meat and a quarter of a pound of pease a day. Chev. de Levis has learned that the English fleet, which had returned to cruise before Louisbourg since it had abandoned the siege of that place, had been overtaken on the 22nd September by a tempest which has driven several of the vessels on shore.

5th I have been to pay a visit to our cantonments, which I found passable and very extensive, reaching to the end of the island and across its entire breadth. The soldier is much better off there than in town; the farmers are obliged to feed him, like themselves, at 10 sous per day, which the contractor pays.

7th The Marquis de Vaudreuil has arrived from Quebec.

11th He has sent M. de Blurry to Carillon with six bateaux in quest of flour.

15th News from the Upper Countries. The Commandant of Fort Duquesne writes that a deserter had given notice of a party which he had sent to Fort Cumberland; 150 men marched out of the fort to cut off that detachment, which perceiving that manœuvre retired with the loss of one man and two wounded. He of Fort [Machault] writes that a party of Indians he had sent out with his son to fight had returned with 3 prisoners and some scalps, and that his son<sup>3</sup> had gone astray in the woods.

18th M. de Belletre, who had gone, at the end of September, with 300 soldiers, Canadians and Indians to attempt something in the direction of Corlac, arrived with 150 prisoners; he reports having carried 3 stockaded forts; burnt a Palatine village in which his detachment had gained considerable booty and killed nigh 40 men.

22nd M. de Bleury, who arrives from Carillon says, the English shewed themselves there to the number of 300, intending to burn the outer posts; that they have not been able to force a guard of one sergeant and 15 men who were in a little intrenchment; that they only opened the vent of the charcoal pit, after which they retired, and that one soldier of the Béarn regiment had been killed.

25th Reduced the soldier's ration to half pound of beef and half pound of horse flesh, in lieu of a pound of beef.

20th December. Sent a detachment of one hundred Canadians and Indians to Carillon.

1758. 2nd January. A courier from Carillon reports, that the English shewed themselves there on Christmas eve to the number of 150, with the design of setting fire to the houses under the curtain of the fort; that the cannon prevented them doing so; that they killed some fifteen beeves, to the horns of one of which the commander had affixed a letter couched in these words: "I am obliged to you, Sir, for the repose you have allowed me to take; I thank you for the fresh meat you have sent me; I shall take care of my prisoners; I request you to present my compliments to the Marquis de Montcalm. (Signed), ROGER, Commandant of the Independent Companies."

18th A clerk of the contractor set out with a detachment of 22 Regulars and some Canadians to inspect the stores at St. Frederic and Carillon. The Marquis de Vaudreuil has sent a Captain of the Colonials and the Lieutenant-General of police to take an account of the grain in the district of Montreal.

28th A Cadet, arrived from Fort Duquesne, reports everything pretty quiet in that quarter, except that the Indians, to whom large presents cannot be made, as the stores are empty, begin to dislike going out to fight.

9th February. The Governor-General has received news from France by way of Isle Royale, the Governor of which island informs him that he expects the English early.

14th The Commissary who went to Carillon has returned; reports having found the stores of both forts in good order; the English did not show themselves in that quarter for a long while, the great quantity of snow preventing any expedition.

22nd M. de Montcalm arrived from Quebec with M. de Pontleroy.

24th The Marquis de Vaudreuil has dispatched the courier entrusted with the answers for him of Isle Royale.

30th A courier from Carillon has arrived, who reports that M. de Langy, with the Iroquois, has attacked nearly 200 men who were at work near Fort Lydius, whom he put to flight, taking 25 men who were guarding them, 22 of whom the Indians have killed.

March. In the forepart of this month a detachment of 200 Canadians or Indians set out for Carillon, to try from thence to cut off some of the convoys which pass from Fort Frontenac<sup>1</sup> to that of Ledijs.

16th M. de Vaudreuil has had news from Carillon informing him that M. Wolff, sent with letters for Fort Lydius, has returned; he speaks in high terms of the civilities he has received; Captain Roger, whom he saw, quizzed him on the fresh meat they let him eat at Carillon; M. Wolff answered him to be careful of himself when he come again, and that he must have heard from him; that M. de Langy had been with the Indians on the Sarasteau road; that the Iroquois, having taken an onion pedlar, wanted to return home; that four Outaouis had attacked a convoy which they dispersed, killed four men, took one prisoner and plundered several sleighs.

19th A Cadet, detached from Carillon, came to inform the General that M. la Durantaye's party had arrived the 12th, on which day an old sorcerer had assured them that they would see the English before long ; on the morning of the 13th, 5 or 6 Indian scouts came to say that they had discovered fresh tracks of 200 men, whereupon the chiefs raised the muster-whoop and set out immediately with their warriors, some soldiers and Canadians, who traveled nearly 3 leagues without meeting any one ; suspecting that the English had taken the Falls road, they took the same course ; M. la Durantaye, who had joined them at the Bald Mountain, was with the vanguard ; he received the enemy's first fire, which made him fall back a little, and gave them time to scalp two Indians whom they had killed ; meanwhile, M. de Langy, having turned them with a strong party of Indians, and having fallen on them when they felt sure of victory, had entirely defeated them ; the Indians having discovered a chief's scalp in the breast of an officer's jacket, refused all quarter, and took 114 scalps ; the opinion is, that only 12 or 15 men escaped, and that this detachment was composed of 170 @ 180, commanded by Captain Roger, who is supposed to be among the killed.

27th Some Indians arrived from Carillon.

28th All the Indians arrived at Sault St. Louis ; M. la Durantaye came to report to the General the action of the 13th.

29th The Governor-General sent some surgeons to Sault St. Louis for the wounded Indians who had arrived there.

30th Some Indians came to see Ononchio.

31st The grand chief of the Sault with several warriors, have asked a talk with his father, to set before him the loss his village has suffered. Ononchio has opened his ears, cleansed his throat, wiped away his tears and covered the loss of his dead with some large presents.

News from Acadia stating that the Acadians have taken 20 oxen, 1 bateau, in which were 5 Englishmen, and missed a boat-load of provisions.

April 2nd The officer of artillery, appointed to put the train at St. John to rights, came to give an account of his work.

3rd Two couriers from Carillon have carried to the General letters from the Commandant of that fort, informing him that M. Wolff, who had accompanied the Abenakis to the Boston government, having been discovered, could not take a prisoner ; that he had killed 40 beeves, a great many other cattle and desolated a part of that country ; that a Captain and Lieutenant of the grenadiers of Bleknis regiment had surrendered themselves prisoners on the 19th, half dead of hunger and cold, having roved through the woods since the 13th without finding the road by which they had come with Captain Roger ; they say, in their deposition, that they think Lord Loudon has returned to England. M. de Langy will start in a few days with some Iroquois towards Orange to take a prisoner, and he will be followed shortly afterwards by M. Wolff and the Abenakis.

4th Two Englishmen have been flogged and one Spaniard hanged ; rare examples, although robberies are more frequent in this country than in any other, and many of the farmers think it no sin to rob the King.

7th A courier from Quebec who returned on the 8th with orders from the General to dispatch the first division of M. de Boisherbert's detachment which is to embark immediately for Acadia and proceed thence by land to Ile Royale.

10th News from Niagara and Fort Frontenac. It appears that the English are sparing no pains and are making great efforts to detach the Five Nations and Delawares from our alliance. The Governor of Philadelphia has held a great council with them at which he has distributed a great quantity of belts, calumets of peace and more than 40 silver gorgets. A chief of the Five Nations has carried to the Commandant of Niagara one of those gorgets on which was engraved a Sun, with an Indian and a Squaw feeding a fire, and an Indian smoking a great calumet with an Englishman under the shade of the Tree of Peace. The same chief has raised a party to attack and carry off a drove of oxen the English are sending to the Loups of Theoga.

14th The ice has broken up and the navigation is clear on the 15th.

17th The soldiers have received 15 pounds of beef for fifteen days and salt to salt it, horse flesh being no longer fit to eat. News from Quebec, where great distress prevails.

18th News from Frontenac and La Présentation stating that Colonel Johnson has held a council with the Five Nations, at which he has assured them that the English cared little for the destruction of the village of the Palatines, who were bad people and had richly deserved it; that they had found means to reduce Canada by preventing the arrival of succors and provisions; that people there are dying of hunger; that the English had last year taken a great many ships loaded with succors which, however, do not console them for the loss experienced before Louisbourg; that after the council, the Colonel wanted to go through all the villages, to carry them presents, from which purpose two Onnontagues had dissuaded him by telling him that Ononthio was coming with some warriors and that his scouts were at hand. The Mohawks send answers to the belts which the Iroquois of the Sault have given them, whereby they promise to observe an exact neutrality and invite them to come to a grand council they are about to hold in the Great Wigwam.

22nd Dispatched a courier to send off a schooner to France. Some Iroquois, Nepissings and Algonkins set out for Carillon with the design of going to avenge the death of their brethren killed in the affair of the 13th, or to make prisoners on the road from Orange to Lydius.

24th M. Chabert has started with some officers for Niagara, thence to proceed on an embassy to the Five Nations; a commissary of supplies has accompanied him to inspect the stores of all the forts and to see in what condition the provisions are.

26th Sent workmen to Carillon.

2nd May. News from Frontenac and Carillon; the former report that an Onontagué who was going to Orange had been arrested by an English detachment, which would have killed him, had he not found some one who spoke Iroquois and saved him; that he complained of the matter to the commandant at Orange, who answered him that the English had determined on avenging all the treacheries the Five Nations daily perpetrate against them. Those from Carillon say that M. de Langry saw a train of 200 wagons file off on the Lydius road without being able to take a prisoner; that he has set out again from Carillon to endeavor to take one.

3rd A courier from Quebec assures that when he left, no ship had been heard of. An officer of the Corps Royal has gone with 25 bateaux full of provisions and goods, to work at a revetement of Fort Niagara.

5th A courier left with orders to send the regiment of La Reine from Quebec to Carillon, and to form pickets of the soldiers of Languedoc and Berry whom the farmers cannot feed, to be there also.

6th A Colonial officer arrived from Carillon with the two English officers, who have told the General that they believe Lord Loudon and M. Webb are recalled.

7th A courier from Quebec with money for the Treasury, who says that the greatest distress prevails in that city, and that the ships are expected with great impatience. M. de Vaudreuil has held a council with some Nepissings who are going to make an attack near Orange.

9th Dispatched a courier to send off another vessel to France.

10th News from La Présentation, to the effect that 84 Indians of that village have returned with 46 scalps and 3 prisoners whom they took in the government of Corlar; that one Iroquois had been killed and an Onnontagué wounded; that the prisoners pretend that the English are constructing a new fort near the Palatine village.

12th A courier from Quebec, where exceeding great distress continues, as well as the impatience to witness the arrival of some ships; there is some talk of sending a third one to France, if news be not soon received.

15th The Indians of La Présentation have arrived with prisoners; also a courier from St. Frederic, sent by M. de Lusignoun who writes that the Mohawks have taken four men belonging to his garrison; killed or taken 17 of Carillon who had gone to the left side of the lake in quest of wood.

16th A cadet detached from Carillon with two prisoners whom M. de Langy captured on the Boston road; we learn that M. d'hebecourt having need of timber to cover the storehouses, had caused the banks of the river to be reconnoitred where the timber was to be cut; that he next day sent a detachment thither of 45 men in 3 bateaux, one of which, containing 17 men, was fired at on approaching land, by 40 hostile Indians, who took or killed the entire; that the other two bateaux prepared to fire and to return to the fort pursuant to the signal which had been made to them; that a gunner and a soldier of the Colony who had gone to hunt, notwithstanding the prohibition of the officers, had been taken; that M. de Langy had gone on a scout to the banks of the River of Orange where 70 loaded bateaux have been seen on their way down by the Indians.

News from all the Upper posts; everything is quiet at Fort Duquesne where considerable provisions are expected from the Illinois; nothing new from the forts at Presq'isle and River au Bœuf.

The Commandant of Detroit is dying; the Five Nations go rarely to Niagara; there is a little fermentation and discontent against us among the Indians of St. Joseph, the Miamis and Outias. The Folles Avoins have killed eleven Canadians at The Bay; missed the Commandant and pillaged a storehouse. A great many Indians have died at Michillimakinac. The Commandant of Louisiana writes that they have had no ships from France for two years, and that he is greatly embarrassed, having nothing to give the Nations.

18th A trader set out with four canoes for Detroit; and a courier with orders for all the posts. M. de Vaudreuil has sent an order to the regiment of La Reine to remain at St. Johns until further orders, and to detached pickets to proceed to Carillon.

19th Some Nepissings and Algonkins who were to go to Carillon came to chaunt the war song at their father's.

20th The Five Nation Indians and those of La Présentation have held a council with the General, to communicate to him the dispositions of their brethren, some of whom are favorable to us, and others to the English, and have assured him that it will be easy to bring them back, if provisions and goods arrive soon. An order has been sent to the officer commanding the detachment of artillery at St. John, to send back a part to Quebec and to proceed with the remainder to Carillon. It is reported that four English barges have entered Lake Champlain. The Nepissings and Algonkins are gone thither scouting, and a Colonial officer has embarked for Detroit whither he will carry the General's orders and transact some business.

21st A courier from Quebec who says that great impatience and uneasiness prevail there for the ships.

22nd News from France. We learn that a frigate and eight merchantmen have anchored before Quebec; that they sailed in March from Bourdeaux to the number of 12; that they were separated on the Great Bank; that they have not seen any English vessels, and that they took an English prize which informed them that it had fallen in with M. de Boissier and 5 ships within one day's sail of Louisbourg.

23rd Dispatched a courier with orders to send the regiments of Languedoc and Berry from the district of Quebec to Carillon, and to send back to the latter place, the gunners and workmen who had halted at St. John. M. Péan and the Commander of the Artillery have started for Quebec, to transact their business on the arrival of the ships.

24th We learn that the regiment of La Reine has arrived at Chambly where it will find orders to repair to Carillon.

25th A courier from Quebec, who announces the arrival of two vessels from Louisbourg with provisions; letters from that place state that a battalion of foreign volunteers has arrived there and that the battalion of Cambis is expected; that appearances there are rather offensive than defensive, in consequence of the confidence which prevails, and the quantity of provisions and ammunition daily landing there; that Count Desgouttes entered the harbor with five ships of war, and the day following his arrival, eight English vessels hove in sight of the Island.

26th News from Quebec announcing the arrival of two ships, one of the first division, the other of the second, which report having been attacked with the vessels of the same division by 5 English privateers off the coast of France; that the frigate gave the signal of Sauve qui peut and engaged the largest ones; that it had seen three of them in tow and does not know what became of the others.

27th M. d'hebecourt sends from Carillon the answers General Alberkombis had addressed to him for the Marquis de Vaudreuil; reports that he had received them by 1 officer and 15 soldiers, who have stated that the English army is assembled at Halifax; that there is at Fort Lydius only the usual garrison and a Scotch regiment; that Captain Roger is not dead; that 'twas he who took the 4 men belonging to the garrison of St. Frederic; that those of the garrison of Carillon have been taken by some Iroquois who have killed 7 of them and carried 10 to Fort Lydius. The English General writes that he has not sent back Mess<sup>rs</sup> Schuller and Martin, who had given their parole to return the 15th of this month, and proposes to the General to send him 6 Cadets or Canadians in exchange.

29th News from Fort Duquesne. M. de Ligneris writes that the English Indians have taken two men and killed one of his garrison; that his Indians have revenged him by bringing him in 140 prisoners or scalps, and that he has still more than 100 Indians in the field in different parties; the information of the prisoners is, that the English desire to come and besiege Fort Duquesne with a force of 4,000 men; there is every disposition to receive them well.

30th A courier from Quebec who informs us that a ship, freighted with provisions, has been wrecked at Isle aux Basques, and that some small craft have been sent to try and save the cargo.

1st June. M. de Langy, who arrives from Carillon, says he had not been able to take any prisoners in his last foray; that the English have a small camp at Fort Lydius as well as at the other forts on the River of Orange, for the safety of their convoys. The General has held a Council with some Iroquois who are desirous to go out to fight.

2nd We learn that 30 Algonkins or Nepissings, with M. Outétat, had fallen on the trail of an English detachment which was returning on the right shore of Lake Champlain; surprised it; killed two Englishmen and two Indians, and took 9 prisoners, 7 of whom were Indians. A courier from Quebec, dispatched by the Intendant to report that Le Zelindoe, a ship belonging to the 2nd division, had arrived at Saut Cochon<sup>1</sup> after having touched and lost her rudder, and that he had sent down assistance.

3rd M. Péan, who arrives from Quebec, assures that La Judith anchored there when he left; that she had captured two English vessels on the Great bank, whose Captains report that a large French craft was lost on Newfoundland.

4th The Marquis de Vaudreuil has held a Council with the Algonkins and Nepissings; has engaged them to go and strike a blow at Fort Lydius and to return in 25 days, telling them that he shall then require them for another expedition. The Nepissings have arrived with their prisoners, whom the Iroquois wished to kill on landing, had they not been prevented. The General received them very cordially and made them some presents.

7th The seven companies of the regiment of Béarn, who were in garrison in town, have marched to encamp four companies at St. Gabriel with a picket of troops of the Marine and the three others near the Lachine mill, to repair the roads of that place. M. de Bourlamaque has arrived from Quebec.

12th A courier from Quebec without news. M. de Bourlamaque is gone to command at the Lake St. Sacrament frontier.

13th Many Indians, of different Nations, have come to the Council. The General has prevailed on them to go in quest of prisoners at Fort Lydius and to bring them promptly to him.

14th Some voyageurs have given notice that a fresh trail of 30 men had been discovered near the Cedars, in search, probably, of an opportunity to strike a blow in that quarter.

15th Some officers are sent to the Sault St. Louis for Indians to go in pursuit of the detachment whose trail has been discovered.

16th A courier from Quebec, who announces the arrival of the flyboat Le Rhinoceros from Rochefort, which reports having left a three-masted ship at Kamarasca. The promotion in the Colony has been received; it is satisfactory and unsatisfactory.

17th News from Carillon stating that whilst two deserters were pursued, an English detachment was discovered, which, M. de Lusignan reports, came and fired some shots near Fort St. Frederic; that he did not allow any one to go out against them through fear of some ambushade.

The regiment of Guyenne marched from its quarters on the 14th; that of La Sarre on the 16th, and that of the Royal Rousillon on the 15th for Carillon; that of Bearn mustered the same day at Montreal; one part has quartered there, the other encamped under the city walls.

19th The regiment of Béarn has received bateaux and the necessary rigging for its embarkation. News from Carillon announce that a detachment of 35 Englishmen had approached the Falls; that M. Wolff, with 30 soldiers or Indians, had gone to meet them and killed one-half and took some prisoners. Worked busily at the preparations and arrangements relative to Chevalier de Levis' detachment, which is designed to go to the Five Nations and thence on some other expedition. A courier from Fort Duquesne informs us that the Katabas had surprised some Canadians that were cutting timber, one of whom they had mortally wounded, who, however, broke the thigh of an Indian that wanted to scalp him; that the other Canadians, who had taken to their heels, returned on hearing the cry, scalped the Indian and brought the wounded man back to the fort; that a train had arrived from the Illinois escorted by 600 men. The depositions of the prisoners, taken at Fort Carillon, are, that the English had sailed for Louisbourg with 22 ships of the line, 17 frigates, a considerable number of transports; that they have 5,000 men at Fort Lydius and are expecting 3,000 more; that they will go and camp at Lake St. Sacrament; 7 pickets of 67 men each of Regulars, the battalion of La Reine not furnishing any, have arrived to form part of the detachment of M. de Levis.

20th A courier from Quebec who announces the arrival of the frigate Le Valeur, of the third division, which sailed from Bourdeaux, and reports having had a knowledge of 5 other sail. The regiment of Béarn embarked in 26 bateaux for Carillon, and went to camp on the right bank of the river, eight leagues.

22<sup>d</sup> The regiment broke up camp at 5 o'clock; halted at St. Ours, and encamped at St. Antoine, 5 leagues.

23<sup>d</sup> Passed St. Charles, and encamped at the entrance of the Chambly basin.

24th Arrived at 6 o'clock at Chambly, notwithstanding the rain; made the Portage of the baggage and rigging; embarked in other bateaux at St. Thérèse, and encamped at St. John, 5 leagues.

26th Broke up camp at day-break; halted near Fourcalte's mill; made the Point au fer traverse, and encamped at Black rock cove,<sup>2</sup> 12 leagues; some bateaux have passed, the conductors of which report that the English are coming in force to Fort George.

27th Embarked at daylight, and, by favor of a light breeze from the Northeast, reached Capon island,<sup>3</sup> where we halted, and encamped at Gravelly bay, opposite the Islands of the Four Winds,<sup>4</sup> 11 leagues.

28th Wind Southwest; beat down until noon; steered to make the traverse of Split rock, behind which we could not camp, because the bateaux would not be sheltered from the wind there, and at 6 o'clock entered Bottle bay, 6 leagues, on the right shore of the lake, after having reconnoitered it.

29th Some bateaux which had camped a little higher up, overtook us at 6 o'clock at Sloop island; halted at the first settlement of St. Frederic; landed at noon opposite that fort, and, in spite of the wind, reached the peninsula on the right bank of the Carillon river, 6 leagues and a half.

30th Started at daylight and arrived at 8 o'clock at Carillon, and encamped on the bank of the river of the Falls. The Marquis de Montcalm arrived at 3 o'clock in the afternoon with the officers of the Royal corps, and has been saluted with 12 guns.

1st July. The whole army moved at 5 o'clock; the regiments of La Reine, Guyenne and Bearn to occupy the head of the Portage, under M. de Bourlamaque's orders; La Sarre and Languedoc the left bank of the Falls; Royal Rousillon and a battalion of Berry the right bank, where they encamped; the Marquis de Montcalm and the third battalion of Berry the old camp of La Reine, between the fort and the redoubt of Carillon; the troops have been occupied all day in arranging the camp and bringing over their baggage. Some Indians who come in from scouting say, that the English are making a road communicating with that of the Mohawks, back of the mountains. M. de Langy, who has been farther, assures the contrary. At 7 o'clock in the evening put 30 men on board 2 barges, to go scouting on the lake.

2nd At 5 o'clock in the morning heard the report of two muskets, followed by Indian whoops; which caused the regiments to stand to their arms; they were ready to march forward, when the Captain of the guard belonging to La Reine sent word that his Lieutenant, at an outpost with 6 men, whilst looking for his hunting knife, had found a feather, and promptly ran behind a tree to avoid a shot fired at him by an Indian who was nearly ready to pounce on him, hatchet in hand, had he not anticipated the fellow by taking aim at him; that the Indian evaded the shot by throwing himself on his belly on the ground, and did not retreat until the officer had cried out A moi, Volontaires! M. de Bourlamaque went to reconnoitre the mountains flanking the left of the camp; transported some ammunition and artillery stores. The Marquis de Montcalm ordered two companies of volunteers, 24 men each, to be organized under the command of Captain Bernard, of the regiment of Bearn, and at the Falls by Captain Duprat, of the regiment of La Sarre.

3rd The scouting barge saw no one during the night; reduced the guard between the lake and the mountain to 70 men; went in quest of provisions to Carillon; collected timber to build a bakery and repaired the ovens; M. de Raymond arrived with a detachment of 118 men, Canadians or soldiers; some Indians came to camp in front of La Reine. M. Mercier informs us that Chev. de Levis' expedition has not taken place, and that he is on the way to join us with his detachment; that there are several men-of-war and merchant-men in the river; a drunken Indian killed one of his comrades and has decamped.

4th Usual transportation. M. Bernard went scouting on the right bank of the lake, fifteen leagues from camp, and returned without making any discovery; worked at an intrenchment at the head of the bridge over the rapid. The Marquis de Montcalm visited our camp and left it at 10 o'clock. M. de Raymond joined us with his detachment and encamped near the bridge. M. de Langy embarked at 7 o'clock in the evening with 128 volunteers, soldiers, Canadians or Indians, to observe the enemy's movements at the head of the lake.

5th At 2 o'clock in the afternoon, heard a shot fired on the mountain, bordering on the left of the Bearn camp, and saw a white flag hoisted and lowered, which is the signal given by the Lieutenant detached there to announce that he discovers barges or bateaux on the lake. An hour afterwards, M. Langy came with news that on the morning he left Ganouské bay,<sup>1</sup> he had been perceived from Fort George, whence were dispatched nearly 60 barges in pursuit of him, which followed pretty steadily for a time and afterwards slackened; that M de Langy had remained with his bateaux to observe them. M. de Bourlamaque immediately sent off Captain M. de Trepezee, of the regiment of Bearn, with three pickets of volunteers of the Marines and Militia to Bald Mountain, to watch the movements of the enemy and to prevent their landing lower down. M. de Langy, who has arrived, accompanies him. Captain de Germain, of the regiment of La Reine, has been sent at 5 o'clock with three pickets, between the mountains and the lake, to sustain our advanced guards and prevent the enemy taking up a position thereabouts; all the troops are ordered to be very much on the alert. A Lieutenant embarked with 15 men in a barge to go and pass the night on the lake.

6th At one o'clock after midnight, heard twelve musket shots fired at the outposts, which caused the brigade to run to arms; a quarter of an hour afterwards 'twas ordered to dismiss. We have learned that the English have fired on the sentries and the corporal going to the relief, whom they attempted to take prisoners and were repulsed at the point of the bayonet, although they had already collared the corporal and one sentinel. At daylight saw the flag move up and down repeatedly; a great many barges were descried traversing from one side to the other, apparently in search of a proper place for landing. The scouting barge returned to confirm the news. At 7 o'clock M. Germain's detachment returned. M. de Bourlamaque has ordered the baggage to be removed, not having heard any news of M. Trepezee, who is expected; sent the grenadiers to relieve the outposts, and had fire set to the baggage that could not be removed. The brigade moved at 8 o'clock, the grenadiers and volunteers forming the rear guard, after having fired some shots at the barges which had approached. Arrived at the Falls at  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 9; defiled in front of two brigades which were in order of battle and took up a position en potence at the base of the mountain, to the right of La Sarre. The Marquis de Montcalm has withdrawn the Royal Roussillon brigade from the right bank, orders the bridges to be broken up, and has directed batteries<sup>1</sup> to be sent for to Carillon, to convey the troops and allow them to rest. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de St. Ours and de Raymond have arrived with a detachment of Colonials and Militia to cover our flanks when we shall retire. About four o'clock heard several shots, and soon after a considerable firing, which we judged was directed against M. de Trepezee. Remained undecided about marching to his relief; prudently resolved not to attempt it; a quarter of an hour afterwards saw some soldiers of that detachment wading towards us, and M. de Trepezee arrive next mortally wounded, who states that M. de Langy, who was guiding them, as he was acquainted with the way through the woods, had gone astray, and did not find out his mistake until three o'clock, when they undertook to cross the River of the Falls, opposite a little island, whence he was returning to the same side, on finding that there was too much water to admit of reaching the other bank; they were attacked, on landing, by considerable corps, and after defending themselves for some time, about 50 men escaped; that the remainder have been killed, taken or drowned. At  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 9,<sup>2</sup> set out for Carillon; at 7 o'clock arrived at the entrance of the clearing, where we formed ourselves in order of battle and bivouacked through the night.

7th Beat the generale at day-light; some regiments took provisions; the three brigades proceeded at 6 o'clock to the edge of the wood, where they commenced an abatis, at which they worked industriously throughout the day, animated by the presence of our Generals and all the officers. This abatis includes the entire ground between the River of the Falls and that which terminates at the reserved wood lining Lake Champlain or the Carillon river. At 5 o'clock, the line of abatis was equally divided between the seven battalions, and each had 127 paces of it to guard; they have had permission to make a fire in the rear of some tents and cook the soup there; orders were issued to bivouac along the abatis; the guard lining it to, make frequent patrols without, and to keep the fires which were lighted there. At 7 o'clock the pickets we had left for Chev: de Levis' expedition arrived, and, with the two volunteer companies, encamped in the rear of the three brigades.

8th The generale was beat long before day; Chev: de Levis arrived; at five o'clock each battalion set to work to strengthen the abatis, 150 paces in front of which the guards were posted to cover the workmen. At 9 o'clock a body of troops was discovered on the summit and at the foot of the mountain, on the right of the River of the Falls, whence they were examining our position, and fired a few shots at us. Bernard's volunteers gave them a few shots in answer. Chev: d'Arenes, Lieutenant of that company, had his arm broken on that occasion. Our Generals made a tour of inspection of the abatis, which they found in a pretty good condition, and made arrangements for the defence. At  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 12 the regiments of La Reine and Bearn were going to construct some epaulements to protect themselves from the heights, when a heavy firing was heard on the left; a moment after, at the centre, and next at the right. The discharge of a cannon from the fort, announcing the arrival of the enemy, brought every man to his post. The companies of grenadiers and guards came in again without the loss of a single man. The battalions lined the abatis, three deep, having their grenadier companies and pickets in line of battle in their rear, ready to march wherever needed. La Sarre's brigade, commanded by M. de Bourlamaque, responded by some effectual firing, to a column that had shewed itself; the Royal Roussillon and Guyenne regiments, to two that attacked the centre where the M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm was posted; and the regiments of La Reine and Bearn, to a fourth that had an anxiety to attempt the right. Several barges defiled from the River of the Falls, to come and land some people and to turn our left. The company of the Royal Roussillon grenadiers and the Volunteers, went down to the bank of the river to fire at them. A few cannon shot were fired from the fort which, after sinking two, forced the others to retreat up the river whence they made no further appearance. The fire was pretty hot on each side, though a little more active on ours. The attack and defence were sustained with incredible valor. The enemy's columns, though strengthened by the reinforcements they were continually receiving, and though often combining to make united efforts, one time on the right, the centre and left, were not making any progress and experienced every where an obstinate resistance sustained by the attention of the Generals to send the grenadiers and pickets to the exposed points, and the bravery of the troops who minded only to aim sure and fire at the proper moment they saw a head. Chev: de Levis posted himself very apropos with the regiment of La Reine behind that of Guyenne, where the enemy were appearing in force, desirous of making an impression; he checked them and sent out the soldiers of the Colony and the Canadians who lay in reserve in the wood, to fire on the enemy's left flank. At  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 5 o'clock the enemy's fire began to slacken; some soldiers were allowed to go out who took some prisoners; at 6 o'clock the enemy made a new attempt with no better success than the first. At 7 o'clock they bethought them of a retreat, leaving their best marksmen to cover it. Fatigue and our small numbers prevented our offering any opposition. Firing was forbidden, because 'twas perceived that the shots we were receiving proceeded only from a few men in ambush behind the trees. The loss of the enemy is estimated at 5 or 6000 men, in killed and wounded; and ours at 500 killed or wounded, including 44 officers and whatever is missing of M. de Trepezee's detachment. This memorable victory is due to the goodness of the Almighty, who has manifested Himself so often and so visibly the defender of the country; to the wisdom of the General's arrangements and their activity and attention in watching the enemy's movements; to the bravery and willingness of the officers and soldiers. M. de Bourlamaque has been dangerously wounded. The Marquis de Montcalm and Chevalier de Levis have passed in front of all the battalions and expressed to them how pleased they were with their conduct. The General ordered wine and beer to be brought on the field of battle to refresh the soldier, who greatly needs it.

9th The generale was beat an hour before day; the troops lined the abati anxiously hoping for the arrival of the enemy. Some detachments were sent out, which dispatched some of the wounded that wished to offer resistance, and brought in some prisoners. A very thick smoke was perceived at the Falls, which led to the supposition that the enemy were abandoning that place, and were occupying themselves only with their retreat. M. de Bernard who went scouting with his company, sent word to the Marquis de Montcalm that, on the road to the Falls, was an intrenchment which he could set on fire. That General immediately sent him the orders to do so, which he executed at once. Some Indians who had gone ahead to plunder, came to give notice that the enemy were thinking only of reëmbarking. Buried all our dead. At 5 o'clock M. Wollff arrived with his detachment; reported to the Marquis de Montcalm that he found no one at old Fort George on his landing, but two leagues from that fort he fell in, without being discovered, with a considerable party encamped in a hollow square, commanded by Lord [How], Major-General (who has been killed in M. de Trepezee's affair), with all the barges, bateaux, artillery and ammunition in the centre; that the General had demanded his orders, had shown him a great deal of civility, and had him forwarded next morning to Fort Lydius, where General Aberkombick had received him politely and detained him, telling him that the Marquis de Vaudreuil's letters required an answer which he could not give him for some days. That he was well aware he was detained to prevent his coming to inform us of their manœuvres; that they had conducted him back to Fort George, on the assembling of their army there, which, he believed, consisted of 25,000 men; that he saw there nearly 2,000 barges, 1,500 of which have been employed in transporting troops, and the remaining 500, in coming and going; that the entire army had been embarked in an instant, and had taken the Portage road, marching thither as to a certain conquest; that he had followed along, and when their troops had arrived at the Falls, he was taken to Bald Mountain, where he had been nearly three days, very dissatisfied with the little attention paid to him and his detachment; that Colonel Johnson arrived the 7th with 400 Indians belonging to the Five Nations or Mohegans; that a courier was sent off that same day who proclaimed everywhere that Cape Breton was taken; that on the eighth at night, he had seen a great number of barges file off, loaded apparently with wounded; that the officer who was guarding him, hailed many of them, and discontinued, evincing great regret; that on the 9th the whole army had, without making much noise, resumed the march to Fort George, whither he was conducted, and having complained of it to the Major-General, the officer in whose hands he was placed, received orders to lead him back to his canôe, in which he repaired to the Portage and thence here, himself and his detachment exhausted by hunger and fatigue. The prisoners were sent off to Montreal, and the Marquis de Montcalm dispatched M. de la Roche, one of his Aids-dé-Camp, to convey to the Marquis de Vaudreuil the news of the enemy's retreat.

10th Chevalier de Levis went to the Portage with the grenadier companies and pickets; found some intrenchments on both sides of the Falls, at the head of the Portage and at the Burnt Camp; had 200 barrels of flour removed; saw a great many which had been thrown into the water; also considerable other stores; the soldiers and Canadians returned, loaded with plunder and an immense quantity of shoes and buckles; had the English buried who were beginning to infect the outside of the abati; a courier set out for Montreal, and a despatch arrived from there by M. de Rigaud.<sup>1</sup>

11th The scouts saw nothing; the six battalions came to camp in front of the fort at the end of the wood, and the two of Berry at their old camp; the Marquis de Montcalm has sent some Canadians to St. John that have not been equipped; M. de Langy arrived with some Canadians in a canoe; 23 Abenakis have gone to strike a blow.

12th Began to work at the abatis and to give it the form of an intrenchment; M. de Rigaud arrived with 300 Canadians and as many Indians, Iroquois and Abenakis.

13th The schooner has set sail for the 1st of June; M. de Lavaltee and Chev: de la Corne have arrived with 1,200 Colonials and as many Canadians; two workmen discovered an English sergeant, said to be a deserter, whom they conducted to the Marquis de Montcalm, who had him examined; whereupon he answered that the English have lost 5 or 6,000 men in the affair of the 8th; that they retired much frightened; that Lord Haw, Major-General Spitead,<sup>2</sup> Colonels Lancé, Brastree<sup>3</sup> and Bebert have been killed; that Colonel Johnson had set out the day after their arrival at Fort George, with all the Indians and 7 or 8,000 Militia for Corlar, to oppose the expedition they know we wish to make to that quarter; that they have 11 or 12,000 men intrenched at Fort George; that they transported the heavy artillery and some barges over land; that they have 5 of our officers and 144 soldiers or Canadians prisoners, belonging to M. de Trepezee's detachment.

14th Scouting and ordinary work; the Marquis de Montcalm has been occupied forming two battalions of Colonials and Canadians, and quieting the Indians.

15th Sent a courier to M. de St. Luc not to come to-morrow until late with the Indians he is bringing; a courier has arrived from Montreal.

16th M. de Courtemanche has gone with 300 Indians and 200 Canadians to lie in ambush between Fort George and Lydius to annoy and intercept the English trains; M. de St. Luc and Chev: de la Roche arrived at 3 o'clock in the afternoon from Montreal with 200 Iroquois, Algonkins and Nepissings of the Sault and Lake, and some Canadians.

17th M. de Rigaud went to encamp at the Falls with the first Colonial battalion, composed of 1,200 soldiers or Canadians; two musket-shots were fired from Cape Diamond; sent off a bateau which has brought back two Abenakis, who give up, having sore feet.

18th Chev: de la Corne is gone to camp at the head of the Portage with the second battalion, composed like the first; M. de St. Luc has sent off a Cadet and 6 Indians to find out what is going on at Fort George.

19th Three English deserters, forwarded from the Portage, confirm the depositions of the sergeant and add, that 6,000 men were missing the day after the affair, and that it was forbidden, on pain of punishment, [to give out] that they had lost more than 1,900 men; that the soldiers are very badly treated in their camp.

20th M. de St. Luc is gone to the Portage with the Indians; a detachment of the Montreal Militia has arrived, under the orders of their Lieutenant-Colonel; the Marquis de Montcalm makes them camp in the rear of the battalions; the Cadet sent to scout has returned; says he was at Ganaouské bay, where he descried a great many fires that prevented him going any farther; the large sloop has anchored before the storehouse.

21st Chev: de Levis is gone to inspect the camp at the Portage and to reconnoitre its vicinity with a company of grenadiers; a great many bateaux have arrived, loaded with provisions; two returned Abenakis say, that their party went to the banks of the River Orange, where they saw a drove of 600 oxen and several barges going up; have not been able to take any prisoners; killed three men; at 6 o'clock descried the bateaux of M. de Courtemanche's detachment, which landed at 7 o'clock; he reported to the General that the Indians, having discovered a patrol of 7 or 8 men, rushed to the attack; that 300 men came out from an intrenchment, behind which they had placed themselves on seeing the Indians and Canadians disposed to pounce on them; that they were unwilling to advance any farther, and that 35 scalps or prisoners had been secured by the Indians, one of whom has been killed, two wounded mortally and three slightly; the depositions of the prisoners accord with the foregoing; the deserters have taken their departure for Montreal; the Indians made an Oneida dance and sing, whom they captured in battle.

22nd The Marquis de Montcalm has held several Councils with the Indians to induce them to remain; has closed the road to Montreal on them by a Belt; has assured them that he has nothing on his mind against them as they suppose; that he will be very glad to keep them, and if a number of them join the Nepissings and other Indians who will accompany M. de St. Luc to-morrow to strike a blow.

23rd New Councils, at which the Iroquois told their Father that they thought he was angry with them because he had uttered reproaches against them; but as he liked them enough to undeceive them, they would leave a portion of their warriors with him and send some others to Montreal. At 6 o'clock, the Marquis de Montcalm learned that an English detachment had arrived at L'isle au mouton, where it hoisted the French flag. The officer in command has sent to inform him that he has orders to bring him Mess<sup>rs</sup> Schuler and Martin, prisoners whom the Governor-General had permitted to spend six months at home; and that General Abbercombrik has given a like permission to one of our Militia Captains, who is a prisoner with them. The Marquis de Montcalm and Chevalier de Levis embarked at 8 o'clock for the Falls, where they had the officer and English prisoners brought to protect them from the ill-usage to which the Indians wished to subject them. The Militia Captain reports that, on his arrival at Orange, he had been assured that Carillon, was taken, and that three days after a general consternation prevailed on the first news they had received of the total rout of their army.

24th Some Indians left for Montreal. The officer in command of the English detachment has inquired for several officers whom he supposed to be prisoners, and it appears, from his questions, that their loss has been considerable. Chevalier de Levis is gone with a detachment to reconnoitre the swamp on the left bank. M. de St. Luc went with 500 Indians or Canadians to try to carry off some convoys on the Lydius road. The Marquis de Montcalm has sent his answers to the English officer, who thereupon proceeded on his return to Fort George. The prisoners have been forwarded to Montreal.

25th Ordinary work and service; some Indians have taken the route to Montreal. Abbé Piquet, with the other Missionaries, has returned from the Two Rocks, where he took leave of M. de St. Luc; an officer has arrived from St. John with some bateaux; an Interpreter, who has returned from scouting with 12 Indians, reports having seen more than 400 dead bodies two leagues from Bald Mountain.

26th M. Mercier has set out for Montreal; a Colonial officer embarked, with 8 Indians and as many Canadians, for Ganaouské bay to proceed thence by land on a scout in the neighborhood of Fort George. Three shots were fired at the Falls at 10 o'clock at night.

27th Sent some wounded off to Montreal. M. Jacob has exercised the gunners at the piece he has mounted on board a bateau; the Marquis de Montcalm sends an officer to Quebec for the recruits.

28th A grenadier company is gone to the right bank to protect some wood cutters; the little sloop is anchored in front of the store.

29th The Marquis de Montcalm and Chevalier de Levis are gone to visit the camp at the Falls; at 9 o'clock in the evening, heard some Indian whoopings, and a bateau arrived with M. Marin, who reports that M. de St. Luc has done a great deal and will arrive early to-morrow.

30th M. de St. Martin, who had gone with 200 men towards Fort George, returned at one o'clock in the morning; reports having fallen in with 15 barges, which wanted to attract him, and that he did not dare embarrass himself, knowing that there are a great many troops on the Island. M. de St. Luc arrived in good order at 8 o'clock with his detachment, and reported to the Marquis de Montcalm that he had attacked on the 25th a train of 44 carts, drawn by 240 oxen, loaded with flour, pork, wine, rum and considerable refreshments, conducted by 150 drivers, suttlers and traders, and escorted by 50 men; that his detachment took 111 scalps, and 80 prisoners; that he knocked in the heads of all the liquor barrels, killed the oxen, gave the remainder up to plunder and retired without being pursued, having had one Iroquois killed and three wounded. A bateau brought Midshipman de Bleury and a contractor's clerk with money to pay the provision savings.

31st Several bateaux arrived with provisions; the Indians got drunk and made considerable noise in camp. Word was sent from the Portage that some barges had been seen. A deserter came in.

1st August. The deserter who has been examined, has answered, that there are 1500 men at Fort George; 700 at the half-way dépôt, and 100 at Fort Lydius; that General Alberkombrick wanted to reëmbark his army eight days after his return; that the Militia had refused to march and that he had concluded to wait for 7000 regulars from Old England, or from the army which is besieging Louisbourg; that they occupy two islands in the Lake, in each of which are 400 men; that they have a guard of 200 men on a mountain on the right bank; that Captain Roger is out every day scouting; sometimes North, at other times, South; that they have intrenched themselves with trees; that there isn't any cannon in their intrenchment, but in the little fort, so that they have had some cannon and mortars conveyed to Fort Lydius with 200 barges, having placed the others in the swamp between the fort and the intrenchment. Chev: de Levis is gone to the Portage with several divers, to search for cannon which, deserters report, had been thrown into the water. 42 Nepissings have arrived.

2nd Ordinary works. The Marquis de Montcalm inspected them, after having held a council with the Indians. He sent off a courier to Quebec and another to Montreal.

3rd M. de Pouchot has traced a redoubt to secure the right of the intrenchment. The Indians set out for Fort George and came back, preferring the route by the head of the Bay. A detachment of gunners arrived.

4th M. Marin set out with 400 Indians or Canadians to intercept some trains; fancied we heard the report of the cannon of Fort George.

5th Some Indians went to join M. Marin. M. le Borgne set out by water from the Portage with 36 men for the Sugar Loaf, and proceeds thence as far as Fort George.

6th Sent some Indians to scout; an officer arrived from Montreal.

7th M. de Bougainville embarked for Montreal; a bateau set off for Quebec; fire broke out in the intrenchment, and was eventually extinguished. A deserter arrived who says there are 10,000 men at Fort George; that a ditch has been added to the intrenchments; that Captain Roger has marched with 800 men to intercept M. de St. Luc.

8th Two Indians came who report having seen the marks of a small camp near the Two Rocks.

9th Two Colonial soldiers who were deserting have been arrested. Two Indians belonging to M. Marin's party have returned with two prisoners; say that M. Marin has attacked a considerable English detachment, and that they, having taken two prisoners in the fore part of the action, had set out ahead with the news.

10th M. Marin has come back with his detachment, and reported that on his way towards Fort Ann, where he expected to strike a blow on a road very much frequented by the English, he heard the report of three shots; that the scouts came in to inform him that they had seen 100 English who were coming towards him; whereupon he immediately ambushed his party, who fired two volleys at the English; the latter scattered themselves in the woods and behind trees, where they kept up a very brisk fire, and had been joined by Captain Roger with 500 men, and a Major of Militia with 200; that he had taken 5 prisoners; that seeing the English were too numerous to be forced, he ordered his wounded to be removed and retreated in very good order, leaving thirteen men on the field; that some Indians had returned thither in the course of the night to try and take some scalps, and found the English drinking and singing. The Marquis de Montcalm has sent 200 Militia to St. Frederic to cut fuel for the garrison.

11th M. Wolff set out to carry despatches from the Marquis de Vaudreuil and the Marquis de Montcalm to General Alberkombik.

12th 200 Militia embarked to relieve those at St. Frederic, who are ordered to St. John.

13th M. de Bougainville has arrived from Montreal, and acquaints us of some merchantmen having entered the river under the Spanish flag. M. Wolff returned at 10 o'clock at night from Fort George, and brought back a surgeon who was taken prisoner at Chouegen.

14th 400 Militia went to St. Frederic. M. de Bougainville embarked at daybreak for Fort George. I left at 10 o'clock; met a clerk of the contractor and some bateaux; at 2 o'clock passed Fort St. Frederic, where I learn that the English have recently carried off a man who was going to the left shore to make his harvest; at 7 o'clock, stopped at Split Rock to prepare supper for my men, and set out at midnight; at daybreak landed at Capon Island; dined at Point au fer, where I met two officers who are on their way to Carillon; arrived at 6 o'clock at Fourcault's mill where I fell in with some Indians who were in want of provisions; supplied them with some and left at eight o'clock, and on the 15th Arrived at daybreak at St. John; proceeded without delay to St. Therèse, where I had some of the men and some baggage put ashore in order to run the Chambly rapids more easily, and arrived in half an hour at the Fort, though the distance is two leagues, so rapid is the stream. At eleven o'clock I was placed on a litter and arrived at 5 o'clock at Laprairie, though five leagues travel and the roads very bad; but the Canadians, anxious to get home, ran. Met some Indians who are going to Carillon.

17th Embarked at 8 o'clock and at 9 landed at Montreal, where a courier from Quebec announces the arrival of a ship at Bic.

18th A party of the city militia arrived from Carillon.

19th A courier from Carillon, entrusted with the English General's answers to M. de Bougainville, who has bet a considerable wager with several officers that Louisbourg was not taken on the 15th.

21st M. de Montigny, who arrives from Quebec, informs us that a Marseilles ship is in the river, which reports having witnessed the capture of one from the same port.

23rd News from the Mississippi and all the posts except Fort Du Quesne, where we are assured that the enemy is on the march; 'tis hoped he will meet a warm reception, as there are a number of Indians there; it seems that business was good at all the posts. The aid of certificates is a gold mine for those who have no other resources, and 'tis said everybody is at work.

24th A courier from Quebec with news of the arrival of two ships from Rochelle, which sailed, with ten others, from the same port, at the end of June, under the convoy of a man of war. The news from Louisbourg is, that the town is briskly cannonaded; that many buildings are in ashes; that M. de Boishebert's detachment has not done anything, the Indians having left him and the Acadians having fallen sick; that M. Marin made a sortie in the night of the 8th and 9th of July, in which he has penetrated as far as the third parallel; lost 70 men and the enemy 500.

26th At one o'clock in the morning a courier arrived from Fort Frontenac with word that the Indians who were going to fight in the direction of Fort Chouagen returned there to tell M. de Noyan that they had discovered in and above the Bay of Niaouré a great many barges; that there is a considerable party there with views probably against that Fort or La Présentation. The General called out all the Militia of the town and a portion of that of the district. News by a courier from Carillon, where all is quiet.

27th Major Duplessis, of Montreal, went to Lachine with all the Colonial and Militia officers, a great many Militia and Indians.

28th Had word that M. Duplessis was not yet gone; the getting on board is slow work as they are delayed by the want of many things which are represented as having been sent to Lachine; forwarded thither some more Militia and Indians.

29th Remainder of Militia set out for Lachine under M. de Contreven's orders. A courier arrived from Frontenac with assurances that when he left, the English were crossing over towards the fort; he thinks, from the number of barges, that there are 1,500 or 2,000 men; that M. de Noyan dispatched him with the intelligence, after having made the best defensive arrangements; that the sloops are in the bay in the rear of the fort; that on the night of his departure, he had heard the report of cannon; this stupid courier had caused the return of 150 Indians or Canadians who were going to the relief of the fort.

30th Heard that Fort Frontenac surrendered on the night of the 27th; that M. de Noyan has capitulated after 48 hours' attack; that he is prisoner of war, and sent back on parol with his garrison; that the English carried off two armed sloops, which they had caulked; that they burnt the other five; that they were busy loading the provisions and ammunition found there in great abundance; M. de Noyan speaks in high terms of the handsome treatment he has received.

31st All the Frontenac garrison arrived; a courier from Quebec confirms the capture of Louisbourg; it was reported, when he left, that some ships were in the river; the Marquis de Vaudreuil has issued an ordinance to prepare 30 bark canoes to be sent to La Présentation, whence they are to convey 500 men to Niagara.

September 1st Sent off the bark canoes with ammunition, which is wanted at La Présentation; some Indians of the Five Nations came to see the General, and told him that the English were intending to amuse us only by seizing the islands in Lake St. Sacrament; that they were only contemplating seriously restoring Chouagen and the forts on that river; that, on learning there was only a feeble garrison at Frontenac, they sent a considerable force to seize it; that, in their opinion, they are still there, as the report of cannon was heard when passing in front of the islands that are opposite; advised to send some young men to Niagara to prevent its being lost; stated that the Cayugas were complaining of not having received a share of the presents brought by M. de Longueuil; that they had, nevertheless, left some of them at La Présentation, who have assured the Commandant that, hearing he was going to be attacked, they were come to assist him to defend himself and to die with him and their father, the Black gown, and their brethren of that village; the General thanked them, made them presents and engaged them to leave to-morrow for La Présentation; canoes which arrive from Michillemakinack report that they are followed by several others which will be here in a few days, and that the Indians of that quarter continue to give a good deal of occupation to M. de Beaujeu; news from Carillon, announcing that the English are strongly intrenched at Fort George, and have built a sloop of 18 guns.

2nd Sent a courier to request the Marquis de Montcalm to come and spend a few days here; the remainder of the bark canoes have been sent to La Chine, whence they, as well as the Indians, are to set out.

3rd A courier from Quebec, without news.

4th The Indians assure that the English have retired from Cataramouy; that M. Duplessi must be arrived at La Présentation, and that the remainder of his detachment will have reached there to-morrow. News from Carillon, where people are busy making the intrenchments proof against cannon. The Abenakis have brought thither three prisoners taken near Fort Couarient.<sup>1</sup>

5th M. de Lacquepé writes from St. John, that there is an English detachment within 5 leagues of that fort. The General immediately sent him a party of Militia from Three Rivers and the Abenakis.

6th Heard that a bateau loaded with provisions has returned to St. John; that the conductors say that on perceiving some tents near the Fourcault Mill, and nearly 150 Indians or English, they did not dare to approach it. An officer who comes from Carillon, assures that he saw nothing on the Lake, and that M. Sabrevois, who has been scouting near Fort George [has returned and reports] that the camp of the English does not appear to him any larger than half of ours. General Alberkombrik's Aid-de-Camp writes to M. de Bougainville to acquaint him of the capture of Louisbourg.

7th The Canadians and Indians who return from St. John report that they have arrested 10 men who left Carillon without permission, and who were the cause of the alarm in that quarter. A great quantity of provisions has been forwarded to Lachine.

9th The Marquis de Montcalm has arrived with Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Bougainville and Pontleroy; a courier has been sent to Quebec to dispatch the six men-of-war lying there; the General has had a great many Indians; he has engaged some to go to La Présentation and others to Carillon.

10th A detachment of Militia has arrived from Quebec; also some gunners; news from La Présentation announce that M. de Montigny, who commands the detachment for Niagara, had not left there yesterday.

11th They write from Quebec that two other vessels have arrived from Rochelle and St. Barnabé and that two others have been seen under sail which were not yet recognized. A courier from La Présentation reports that all the bark canoes had arrived there, and that M. de Montigny was to have left that place yesterday.

12th A courier from Quebec confirms yesterday's news; some recruits and Militia belonging to that government have arrived, also a Colonial officer from Detroit with 6 canoes; says he left Niagara the 1st of the month; that the commandant of that fort was much surprised at not seeing anything of the sloops; that he was ignorant of the capture of Frontenac, and that he had not heard anything of it except from some Nepissings at the Couy islands. M. de Boishebert writes that he has returned to Miramichi with almost the whole of his detachment.

13th The Marquis de Montcalm has returned to Carillon with M. de Bougainville; a detachment of Militia has arrived from Quebec; also several canoes from Michillimakinak and other posts. Considerable provisions, ammunition and merchandise are conveyed to la Chine, whence bateaux loaded therewith are daily dispatched for La Présentation and the Upper forts.

14th Arrival of a detachment of Militia from [the city] and government of Quebec. That of yesterday has been sent off for Lachine.

15th A courier from Quebec informs us that the St. Dominique which is anchored before Quebec, reports having no knowledge of any other ship; arrival of a detachment of Militia from the government of Quebec.

16th A courier from Carillon reports that eight barges had come to Isle au mouton and created considerable alarm at the Camp at the Falls, and that a detachment was sent by land to take those in the barges should they land. The Abenakis have brought in a prisoner whom they took near Corlar, who says, that the English have nearly 10,000 men at Fort George; that 6,000 from Cape Breton have landed at York; that they have 5,000 in the Chouaguen district who are working at the Carrying place, and that he does not think they will rebuild Fort Oswego this fall.

17th M. de Bleury, arrived from La Présentation, and says that he had accompanied M. de Contre [ven] to Cataracouy; that they found the fort easy of repair, some parts of it being scarcely at all injured; that the force<sup>1</sup> is entire as well as some of the buildings; that they have discovered six 12 pounders in good condition which the English, no doubt, overlooked; that the others either have their trunions broken or have been spiked. A detachment has left for La Présentation.

18th M. de Langy arrived in the course of the night to report to the General that he has been as far as Chouaguen with his Indians and Canadians; that he found it evacuated; that he has seen the wreck of our burned sloops; that he thinks the other is lost, as well as a great many barges, by the quantity of masts and rigging that he perceived on the water. The General has ordered the officers who were making arrangements to go to La Présentation, to hold themselves in readiness to proceed to Carillon.

19th M. de Pontleroy has gone to reconnoitre the Lake Ontharie frontier and a good position to build a fort there; Abbé Picquet who returns triumphant to his mission, embarks with him; a detachment of Militia has taken the road to Carillon; considerable transportation and carting to Lachine.

21st News from Carillon, where everything is quiet. M. de Repentigny has been embarked during four days, without getting an opportunity to strike a blow.

23rd A great many loaded bateaux have been sent off to La Présentation and 30 bark canoes to the Beautiful river.

24th News from the Beautiful river assure us that great tranquillity prevails in that part; that the English have sent a great many Belts to the Delawares and Indians, to induce them to remain neutral, and that the Indians have carried them to M. de Lignery, commanding at Fort Duquesne. The Courier who belonged to M. de Montigny's detachment says, that although he had been becalmed two days, yet he arrived at Niagara the seventh after his departure; that M. de Vassan knew of the fall of Frontenac only eight hours, that he was preparing, with 40 men he had, to burn whatever was outside the fort, and to make the best defence he could. A courier from Quebec without news.

26th M. de St. Luc who comes from Carillon, informs us that there is nothing new; two parties are out, one towards Fort Lydius, the other towards Fort George.

27th The Marquis de Vaudreuil has sent an officer to Carillon.

29th The officer who had gone, has returned from St. John with letters from the Marquis de Montcalm, and to conduct an English deserter who reports he has left 6000 at Fort George, 800 in the entrepôt fort, and 1500 in that of Lydius; that there is a considerable train of artillery in the intrenchments; that all the barges and bateaux to the number of 1500 are repairing; that five regiments are expected which are on their way from Louisbourg and one from York, and he thinks that as soon as that reinforcement will have joined, they will return to attack Carillon; that he believes two battalions winter in the intrenchments. An Indian who arrives from the neighborhood of Fort Bull, says there are 8000 men in those parts and that many of the Indians of the Five Nations and Delawares (Loups) have united with ours who are going to strike there. News from the Beautiful river, where everything is quiet.

30th A courier from Quebec, entrusted with the care of an Acadian who reports that a ship captain has told him that he had seen nearly twenty English sail in the vicinity of Gaspé.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Creuille.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Sir,

Camp at Carillon, 21st 8<sup>ber</sup>, 1758.

Since the affair of the eighth of July, of which I have had the honor to transmit you a Narrative, General Abercromby has constantly occupied the head of Lake St. Sacrament, as we, the camp on the heights of Carillon. He has spent the campaign in fortifying himself and threatening us with a second visit. On our side, we have thought only of protecting this frontier during the remainder of this campaign. The war has been a mere partizan one and we have had some advantages in it. The obstinacy of the enemy in remaining in force in his camp, will oblige us to wait for the ice before entering into cantonments.

You will judge of our works by the detail I annex to this letter.

Whilst the enemy was always showing us an army prepared to attack us, a second time, he has endeavored to make us take our change in a diversion on Lake Ontario. He has taken the post of Frontenac, in which were seventy Colonials, and has immediately abandoned it, in order to rebuild that of Fort Bull, destroyed in 1756. I have been as much affected at this occurrence [ which is owing to the desire to seize ] our navy on Lake Ontario that we have lost, as if I had to reproach myself with it, and had not foreseen and not given warning of it. Niagara must experience the same fate; the same blunder was committed there of leaving, as it were, nobody at that post, but the enemy has not been informed of it, and M. de Vaudreuil has had time to send three hundred men thither.

We are expecting news from the Beautiful river where a corps of 8000 men was to operate under the orders of General Forbes.<sup>1</sup>

Since the capture of Louisbourg, an English fleet has continually occupied the lower part of the river St. Lawrence; they have made a descent on Gaspé where it appears they have established themselves. According to what the Intendant writes me, the King's ship L'Aigle has been wrecked on the rocks of Quequampoix, eight leagues from Mercatina.<sup>2</sup> The crew escaped, and 'tis hoped the ship will be got off; 'tis a real loss; she was armed en flute and was bringing flour, pork, ammunition, muskets, brass guns and mortars.

The Five Nations are sending embassies to us, to negotiate; they are receiving presents, at the same time from the English, and whatever the Marquis de Vaudreuil may say about it, I believe them more disposed in favor of the latter whom they fear, and who give them considerable; let us never expect anything from them beyond neutrality, that would be a great deal.

Such, Sir, is the state of things at this moment. This will be the last letter I shall have the honor of writing you this year; I am one hundred and twenty leagues from Quebec, whither I send an express with it, and to profit by the last ships which sail between the fourth and tenth. Your reflections will suggest to you more on our situation than I could write to you respecting it.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil has wished, under existing circumstances, to send an officer of intelligence and capable of instructing with truth the Minister of the Marine on every point. I have been sufficiently fortunate to induce him to send M. de Bougainville and to prevail on him to consent to the passage of M. Doreil, commissaire ordonnateur, on his own business. It is to be wished that the one and the other will arrive, and I request you to attach confidence to what they will tell you. M. de Bougainville proposes to return to us, for his zeal for the service knows no difficulty.

I have no need of recommending to you M. Doreil, with whom I have been very well satisfied; a disinterested commissary, capable of and loving work, and qualified to be entrusted with all sorts of details, his is a case entitled to procure for him some distinguished favor; I should be particularly obliged thereby. He will not leave you in ignorance of anything respecting our situation and will depict to you the impossibility of living, to which our officers are reduced. I know not what the Intendant will take upon him to do in their behalf, upon the letter I have written to him, the duplicate whereof I annex hereunto. You, Sir, who have always occupied yourself with the good of our troops, will favor those which serve the King in America, and who maintain their ground there these four years against an enemy who possesses great means and very superior forces. Our battalions would require recruits, and of a good description. Their companies, far from ever having been as high as fifty, according to the ordinance which had been sent us in 1757, have never been able to be completed to 40. We should require at least 600 recruits this spring. Although I have made an exact review of them in the fore part of the month, I leave to M. Doreil the care of sending you a circumstantial detail of our situation. We have not received this year any despatches from the War Office respecting either favors or appointments; this afflicts our officers. I cannot say too much good to you of Chevalier de Levis and of M. de Bourlamaque; the latter is actually at Quebec, much incommoded by his wound. I doubt if he can make the campaign next year. 'Tis a pity. There are neither superior officers enough, nor sufficient Engineers, nor enough of troops nor of gunners. The English have had, independent of the Louisbourg army, thirty-six thousand men in the field, opposing our forces, and I have always had at least fifteen or sixteen thousand men opposed to me.

My health is wearing away, my purse is becoming exhausted; I owe ten thousand crowns in a Colony where all those who are in office do not commonly devour their substance, nevertheless, M. Houart,<sup>1</sup> the Intendant, has left in it debts as unskilfully as I; my zeal and courage will never fail. I repose in your hands all that can regard me personally. You have honored me in France with your kindness; you have assured me of the same since I am in America. I have served under Marshal de Belleisle; 'tis for the one and the other to procure for me what they think can be granted to my age, thirty-seven years of service, to the commission I am honored with and to the success of three campaigns. I dare hope no one in Europe will envy me the favors you will be pleased to bestow on me. Be assured of my gratitude and of my attachment as constant as it is inviolable, and of the respect with which I am, Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

Abstract of Despatches received at the War Office complaining of M. de Vaudreuil.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

The Marquis de Montcalm, in reporting the action of the 8th of July, in which, with 3,858 men, whereof 3,370 were Regulars, 472 Canadians, or troops of the Marine, and 16 Indians, he repulsed 20 @ 25 thousand English, who lost 5 @ 6,000 men on that occasion, Demands that it may be pleasing to the King to permit him to return to France. He adduces as a reason, the exhausted state of his health and purse, and especially the annoyances and contradictions he experiences at M. de Vaudreuil's hands.

He complains in his letters that, although M. de Bourlamaque had a long time before notified M. de Vaudreuil that the enemy were collecting considerable forces in the vicinity of Lake St. Sacrament, M. de Vaudreuil, instead of concentrating those of the Colony so as to be able to resist the enemy, had divided them for the purpose of sending Chev: de Levis, with 1,600 picked men and a number of Indians, on a special expedition which could not be carried out.<sup>1</sup>

That, on writing to M. de Vaudreuil on arriving at Carillon the 30th of June, to inform him of the enemy's arrangements and to demand some reinforcements, he could obtain only 400 Canadians or Marine troops and the recall in advance of the soldiers and battalions that had been detached with M. de Levy, who arrived on the eve of the action, and that he did not send him a single Indian, although there are 800 domiciliated in the Colony.

That M. de Vaudreuil excused his refusing those reinforcements by the necessity of economising the provisions, and that since the affair of the 8th, he had unnecessarily sent him 2,000 Canadians and 600 Indians, whom he had neither desired nor demanded, and who were going to consume unprofitably all his provisions.<sup>2</sup>

By the copies of the letters he had received from M. de Vaudreuil and of his answers, 'tis to be seen that the latter urges him to send out large detachments to force the English to retire, by cutting off their communication with Fort Lydius, and that M. de Montcalm represents that, with the few troops he has, it is not possible for him to dislodge an enemy, who, notwithstanding the check they have experienced, are still infinitely his superior.<sup>3</sup>

M. de Vaudreuil reproaches him in one of these letters with having rebuffed, by ill treatment, the domiciliated Indians who had been sent to him, to which M. de Montcalm answers, that he indeed scolded them for the disorder they were committing in the camp, killing and pillaging provisions belonging to the hospital and private persons, and that he had sometimes refused them brandy, as they are intractable when drunk.<sup>4</sup>

M. de Montcalm writes that the contradictions he experiences will not prevent him acting in every respect for the greatest advantage of the King's service, until recalled, and that he has sent M. de Bougainville to Montreal to cement their reunion, whereunto M. Bigot had already labored at his request.<sup>5</sup>

M. Doreil, commissaire ordonnateur, states, in letters written in cipher,<sup>6</sup> that M. de Montcalm had instructed him to say,

1st That M. de Vaudreuil cannot excuse the refusal to send M. de Montcalm some troops, on the ground of want of provisions, inasmuch as the first convoy from Bourdeaux of ten thousand barrels of flour had arrived on the 19th of May, and that there was a quantity of it at Fort Chambly and St. John prior to the 1st of June.

2nd That M. de Levis having arrived at the camp before the action of the 8th of July, with 400 men detached from the battalions, the other troops of his detachment could come there also, had they not received orders to the contrary.

3rd That the Indians themselves and some of the Colony had complained of having been left at Montreal and of having been obliged to spend their time uselessly at Laprairie de la Magdeleine, St. Johns, and elsewhere.

4th That M. de Vaudreuil was sending to Carillon, since the 13th, Canadians who could no longer be employed; and that with a view to be able to write, that M. de Montcalm did not know how to profit by his victory, as if 14 thousand men could be attacked with six thousand.

5th That M. de Vaudreuil has, last year, accused M. de Montcalm with not having laid siege to Fort Lydius after that of Fort Orange,<sup>1</sup> at a time when he was obliged to dismiss the Canadians to make their harvest and was in want of horses and carriages for a portage of six leagues that had to be made.

6th That Fort Carillon has cost the King immense sums, yet is very bad and that the person who had it built, who is a relative of M. de Vaudreuil, has made a fortune by that contract.

7th That if the Colony be not lost this year, which is not yet certain, as the enemy are able to return to the charge, and adopt better measures, it may be expected to fall inevitably next year, if peace be not concluded this winter.

8th That a great gain would accrue from such a peace, no matter at what sacrifice as regards boundary it would be made; but peace once made, 'twill be necessary to change the whole of the administration; and if it is to be postponed, the Governor-General must be recalled at once.

M. Doreil adds, from himself, that nothing better can be done, whether for the safety or reëstablishment of Canada, than to confide the general government of it to M. de Montcalm, who is as good a statesman as a soldier, a great worker, just, disinterested, clear-sighted, active, having only what is good in view, in a word, a virtuous and universal man; but that M. de Montcalm would perhaps be displeased with him had he known that he hazarded that proposition, which he submits only out of pure zeal for the advantage of the King's service.

That the qualification for Governor-General of being a Canadian, so far from being necessary, is on the contrary, a defect which is of greater consequence than can be supposed; that M. de Montcalm is, at present, thoroughly acquainted with the country, beloved and respected by the Indians, and is perfectly conversant with the manner of treating with them and of profiting thereby.

M. de Montcalm and M. Doreil make very feeling remonstrances respecting the allowance of the troops.

They complain, first, that the provisions which had been allowed them as well as those of the Colony, have been greatly diminished during the campaigns of 1755 and 1756.

That they have ceased, since the first of October, 1757, being paid in specie, according to the promise made them at their departure.

That the prices of necessaries of life are excessive; the officers being absolutely unable to live on their pay, and obliged to contract debts, which he will be unable to pay; M. de Montcalm owes already more than ten thousand écus.

They ask an increase of pay for the regular troops in Canada, the same as those in Europe have been allowed, and observe, that the pay of those troops is not to be compared with that of the Colonial troops, as the latter have resources from their families, from trade, from contracts, the intrigue of the country and trading posts.

In another Memoir will be mentioned the special favors M. de Montcalm requests, exclusive of those whereof he had sent a list on the 12th November of last year, and which he supposes has been suppressed in the bureaux of the Marine. He cannot send a duplicate until he returns to Montreal, where the minute is lying in his desk.

Camp at Carillon, 27th 8<sup>ber</sup>, 1758.

My Lord,

My last letter, written from Montreal on the ninth of September, was to inform you of the taking of Fort Frontenac and of my fears of the consequences that might result from that event to Fort Niagara. Fortunately, the English have not marched thither; having been satisfied with burning our sloops, they left Lake Ontario, where they can return at any moment by the River Chouaguen. The Marquis de Vaudreuil profited by the circumstance to send thither a pretty strong garrison of Colonial troops. At a review with the Governor-General, it was, so to speak, agreed upon to send thither some pickets of our battalions with Captain Pouchot, of the regiment of Bearn, who has superintended the works at Niagara and commanded there, and who assuredly is better qualified to defend that place than any Colonial Captain; but that has changed since I left.

M. de Vaudreuil has sent Sieur Pont le Roy, the Engineer, to place the ruins of Fort Frontenac in order for the reception of a garrison this winter. I do not know what is to be done there; I have given my opinion.

At last, people are at work building xhaves<sup>1</sup> at St. John. I have been proposing it since 1756, in order, if circumstances should cause us to lose the advantage of the forts we possess at the head of Lake Champlain, we may preserve, by means of a navy, possession of that lake, which, at all events, may, in case of misfortune, give us one campaign more on that frontier.

The enemy has manifested a desire to return here; the Marquis de Vaudreuil has treated me even better on this occasion than in the beginning of the campaign, for he had two thousand effective men dispatched with celerity to me, with whom I would have endeavored to do good business. The season and the news by prisoners who have been brought in by a detachment, induce me to believe that the enemy is thinking of retiring. Meanwhile I am uncertain whether they will winter a corps of troops in their intrenchment at Fort George or abandon it altogether, occupying only Fort Lydius as their head quarters. I have actually four parties in the field. I am very attentive to their manœuvres which will decide the breaking up of this army, that cannot, however, remain in the field, in this climate, after the 15th of November; even that is a great deal. I have not the Marquis de Vaudreuil's last orders respecting winter quarters, but if he do not make any change in what we have agreed on, two battalions [will be] in the district of Quebec; the remainder in that of Montreal where the harvest has been good; the soldier distributed in the country among the farmers, to economise the King's stores.

The garrison of the fort will be composed of pickets of our battalions. I have made choice of Captain d'Hebecourt of the regiment of La Reine, who has already commanded there; he is an officer of merit, exact, agreeable to all, even to the Indians. I shall leave him his fort in a little better condition, with extensive blindages, and have given him to understand that his good conduct may procure him some favors from the King.

The English, 'tis reported, have made their appearance at the lower end of the River St. Lawrence, [with] ten men of war and thirty transports, and have established themselves at

Gaspé, one hundred and twenty leagues from Quebec. I cannot guarantee this intelligence. That establishment would cause the fall of those we have at Miramichy and the River St. John, and increase the difficulties of receiving vessels from France.

We are, my Lord, expecting news from the Beautiful river; Brigadier-General Forbes was, according to intelligence communicated to us by the English, within thirty-five miles of it, on the 15th September. M. de Ligneris, who commands there, and M. de Vaudreuil are of opinion, that he will have a great many Indians; the Five Nations [who] are always assuring us of their attachment, are receiving presents from the English. Their hearts are with the latter, and their fears with us; a truth to which the Marquis de Vaudreuil finds it difficult to subscribe. The King has given and expends a great deal for the Upper Indians; were everything distributed they would all be on our side; but how many things are to be stated on this point!

The King's ship l'Aigle, which was bringing us guns, ammunition and clothing has been lost on the rocks of Querquampoix; [the crew] escaped on shore; a vessel has been sent from Quebec to take them on board.

Such, my Lord, is the state of affairs at this moment. This letter will be the last I shall have the honor of writing you this year. I am 120 leagues from Quebec, whither I am sending an express with this to profit by the last ships which sail between the fourth and tenth. I have received only two letters this year from you, my Lord; one conveying to me a commission for M. de Bougainville, of assistant Quarter-master General (ayde Mareschal de Logis). I tender to you in return all my thanks; the object is worthy of your protection. The other of the 13th April, to inform me that M. de Creuille is employed to assist you in the details of the Ministry of War. I shall address myself to him, agreeably to what you have done me the honor to write me, on many of the details. But I flatter myself that you will always approve of my keeping up with you, my Lord, a direct correspondence.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil has been pleased, under existing circumstances, to send an officer of intelligence, who is able to inform the Minister of the Marine, with truth, on all points. I have been fortunate enough to get him to send M. de Bougainville and to induce him to consent to the departure of M. Doreil, commissaire ordonnateur, on his private business. It is to be hoped that both the one and the other will arrive, and I request you to attach credit to what they will state to you. M. de Bougainville proposes to return to us, for his zeal for the service knows no difficulties. M. Doreil is an able, disinterested Commissary, capable of labor, a man of detail. I beg you, my Lord, to use him well. He leaves a new Commissary, Sieur Bernier, who has arrived this year; thus, the service will not suffer by his departure, and 'tis to be hoped that both, or at least one, will arrive in France, as they proceed thither in different vessels.

It only remains for me, my Lord, to mention the troops and their principal officers to you. The tone of the soldier is good, notwithstanding some little want of discipline, which is inevitable in this climate, considering the example and separation in winter quarters. The officers, especially the Lieutenants, are at their wit's end how to live, seeing no favors arrive, and no regard paid to my representations. Come, my Lord, to our relief. I encourage them by my example, tone, words and money, which finishes by being exhausted. Chevalier de Levis is an excellent second, in whose commendation I cannot write too much. M. de Bourlamaque, much inconvenienced by his wound, runs the risk of being hors du combat for the next campaign. He is an officer who possesses detail, a desire to do well, much theory; experience will render him very effective, and I have great reason to be satisfied with these two officers. Major-General<sup>1</sup> Chevalier de Montreuil, who is very estimable on account of his courage, coolness, sentiments, manner of living, honest and honorable, would do well at the head of a corps; brilliant in an engagement, but he would need more activity and detail for his situation; nevertheless, I employ him usefully, and request you, my Lord, to grant these officers some favors which may prove to them the exactness and truth of the reports I have the honor to make to you of them and of the distinguished manner they serve the King.

M. de Pontle Roy and M. Desandroins are two Engineers of great diligence; their disinterested conduct is commendable, but has the appearance of being epigrammatic in this Colony.

The officers of artillery sent from France have been very badly treated in return for expatriating themselves. I have had the honor to write to you in detail on the subject, and now to solicit you anew in their favor. I again renew to you my entreaties to deal favorably by a little body of troops, which, I dare say, has acquitted itself well and with glory, and which, for three years, resists very superior forces.

I make you, my Lord, no prognostic on our situation and the next campaign. I refer to what I have already had the honor to write you in my preceding letters (copies of which I have addressed you in quadruplicate), and to what Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Bougainville and Doreil will be able to tell you.

Be assured, my Lord, I shall never neglect anything for the success of the commission with which the King has honored me; my health, with difficulty, resists fatigue; I shall be fortunate if I can contribute to the preservation of a Colony which costs the State so much. I devote myself entirely thereto. I beg you to assure his Majesty thereof, and to guarantee an unbounded zeal for his service.

Continue to me, my Lord, your ancient goodness, and believe me, with boundless attachment and most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

Montreal, 30th October, 1758.

My Lord,

You will be pleased to allow me the honor of renewing to you the letters I have written to M<sup>r</sup> de Moras, rendering him an account of the zeal and services Chevalier de Levy has constantly exhibited since his arrival in the Colony; he is generally loved by the troops of the line and of the Colony, the Militia and Indian Nations; they have all the same confidence in him and a sincere desire to fight under his orders.

I would have greatly desired, my Lord, to be in a position to confide some very important mission to him, wherein he could exercise the zeal and experience I know he possesses, and of which he has given proofs on occasions of the greatest delicacy. You will be able to learn besides, from himself, my Lord, what he deserves, which gives me reason to hope that you will have the goodness to prevail on his Majesty to grant him a commission of Major General (Maréchal de Camp). The troops and the Colony in general, were flattering themselves with his promotion to that new grade at the commencement of this year.

I shall be infinitely flattered, my Lord, should the justice I render him induce you to procure it for him.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Massiac.

Montreal, 1 November, 1758.

My Lord,

I have the honor to transmit to you the requisition furnished me by Chevalier Lemer cier, of the ammunition to be sent this year from France. I have examined it, my Lord, with attention; have called for a report of what we have in the Colony, and have seen that it was impossible to make any retrenchment. I shall require that supply indispensably, to enable me to defend the Colony the King has confided to me, if attacked, as there is every appearance it will be. What is wanting in people can be made up by multiplying the fire of artillery and musketry, and taking up good positions; but 'tis impossible to avoid the consumption of powder in war; this is a truth I beg you to place in a proper light before his Majesty.

You will likewise be able, my Lord, to observe to the King that there is no country where so much of it is consumed, both for hunting and distribution among the Indians; burning of powder is equally a passion among the Canadians, but I think we gain thereby in the day of battle, by the correctness of their aim in firing. Were it not for the ammunition furnished me successively by the Beautiful river, Chouagouin and Fort George, I should not have had enough either for attack or defence. The Company of the Indies, which used to import annually and consume forty thousand weight, had no more powder. The consumption may, even in time of peace, be estimated at sixty-thousand weight.

It is essential for me to represent to you, my Lord, not only the necessity of this shipment, but even that it be made in sufficient season to anticipate the English, in case they should desire to re-enter the river; otherwise, it would be out of my power to be able to make a defence proportionate to that I propose, and which must be expected from a numerous artillery. I should despair were that the case, and were I obliged by such a circumstance to surrender the Colony to the English, being resolved to defend it to the last extremity.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant.

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Massiac.

Montreal, 1st November, 1758.

My Lord,

Divers Memoirs of
M. de Mon calin, and M. de Vaudreuil's answers on the plans of defence throughout all the parts of the Colony.

You will have seen, by the letter I wrote to M. de Moras, that I was making arrangements to afford the Marquis de Montcalm the satisfaction of consulting him on the position in which the Colony found itself by the reduction of Frontenac.

He came, in consequence, to this town, and to enable you to judge of the result of the different conferences I have had with him, I have the honor to address you herewith copy of:

1st The Memoir I transmitted to him, on his arrival, containing my plan respecting Lake Ontario, wherein my object was to put a stop to the consequences of the successes of the English at Frontenac, and to prevent them absolutely restoring old Chouaguin.

2nd The Memoir communicated to me by the Marquis de Montcalm on Lake Ontario, wherein he is of opinion that all offensive plans must be abandoned, unless the enemy be in a small number at Chouaguin; that it would be more essential to establish a post above our rapids; that even should the English take Niagara, his opinion would be not to change any part of his Observations.

3rd The Memoir which I transmitted to the Marquis de Montcalm in answer to that he had given me, wherein I observed to him that I shall never consent to the abandonment of the lakes; that if circumstances should reduce me to make a stand at the head of the rapids, such would never be except on the last extremity; that I was decided to reëstablish our navy on Lake Ontario, and resume the superiority there; that on the preservation of Lake Ontario depended that of Niagara and all our frontier posts; I was so settled in my opinion, my Lord, that the consequence of the bold proceeding I had recourse to, in dispatching forces successively to Lake Ontario, has been, that the English have not only not dared to remain at Chouaguin, but even to keep the vessels they had there, which they have burnt. I have profited by these forces to dispatch provisions to Niagara, and have ordered the reëstablishment of our Marine at La Présentation. The necessary preparations will be made during winter to permit the rebuilding of the stores at Frontenac, the repairing the walls (enceinte) to protect them against a coup de main, so that next spring Lake Ontario will, I hope, be at least in as good a condition as it was before, and the Colony will have suffered no other loss than the money it will cost the King and the fatigue of the Colonists who have coöperated therein with the best grace, knowing the necessity of preserving that lake for the security of the Colony.

4th A Memoir which the Marquis de Montcalm gave me at the same time respecting the course to be pursued at the moment on the subject of the Lake St. Sacrament frontier, wherein he appeared disposed to foresee the blowing up of Forts Carillon and Saint Frederic, in case the enemy should force his army to abandon the position it occupies at Carillon, and afterwards that of Saint Frederic and fall back successively on St. John. This project is a consequence of the former, and the resolution was well nigh adopted to abandon Carillon and St. Frederic previous to the action of the 8th, had it not been for the strong remonstrances made on that occasion by some officers of the Colony who were acquainted with my sentiments; the consequence would have been, that the English once masters of our waters, would have built a navy whereby we should be excluded from Lake Champlain; they would have shut us up at St. John, whence they would have been able to penetrate into our settlements, and, as a necessary consequence, the Indians would have decided in their favor, and that would be soon followed by the loss of the Colony, whilst now the English have, of themselves, abandoned the head of the lake, which leads me to hope that they will make no attempt, this winter, on Carillon, and will not be able to overawe me next spring. Had M. de Montcalm consented to send out the detachments I had projected between Lydius and the camp at Lake George, I believe that, in the course of the summer, that army would have been considerably diminished and perhaps would have been forced rather to retire; but no matter what I could adduce, I could not succeed therein. Meanwhile, I had sent 2,000 Canadians and some Indians, at the close of the campaign, on intelligence that the English were to renew their attack; in case such intelligence was not founded I directed that a large detachment be formed and the command of it confided to M. de Levy or to my brother, notwithstanding which, it was not done. Yet it is certain, it could have been on the passage at the beginning when the army was decamping from Fort George. I am obliged to conceal my regret at such an event, through policy towards M. de Montcalm. I can attribute his refusal only to the fear that the Colony would distinguish itself, as he did not wish the event of the 8th of July to be attributed to any but the troops of the Line; nevertheless, the reputation of the Canadians has been long since established, a reputation which they have just recently maintained at Fort Duquesne.

5th The Memoir I have transmitted to the Marquis de Montcalm in answer to his, concerning the frontier of Lake St. Sacrament, whereby I observed to him that on our abandoning those two posts, the enemy would immediately construct a navy there that would soon be superior to ours, and even be enabled to throw all his strength into that quarter, whence it would follow that the fate of this Colony would depend only on one battle won or lost; that I was positive in this opinion and resolved on the preservation of our forts.

6th The Memoir the Marquis de Montcalm communicated to me also at the same time, containing his general reflections on the measures to be adopted for the defence of this Colony. You will perceive, sufficiently, my Lord, the fallacy of this Memoir; the passion with which it is drawn up, the desire of carping at the government, the hankering after innovation, more particularly, that of domineering over the Colonists. I have pretended not to notice any of these designs, and you will be able to form an idea of the moderation of my answer.

7th My answer to the Marquis de Montcalm on the general Observations.

You will perceive, my Lord, by all those pieces, that if I had followed the Marquis de Montcalm's opinions, the bounds of the Colony would be soon restricted, since on the one hand we should abandon Lake Ontario, and consequently all our Upper Country posts, in order to confine ourselves to contesting the passage of our rapids; and on the other, the English, masters of Carillon and St. Frederic, would penetrate as far as they liked into Lake Champlain. The opposition we could offer their projects by keeping an army at Fort St. John, would be a very feeble resource, since, should we lose a battle there, the enemy would employ most powerful efforts to penetrate to Montreal, or at least, even should we keep them there in check, they would send detachments daily which would penetrate into and lay waste our settlements.

Essentially, my Lord, 'tis for the true and most solid interest of the Colony, that I essentially adhere to contesting the ground on our frontiers inch by inch with the enemy, whilst M. de Montcalm has made it appear that the troops of the line wish only to preserve their reputation and return to France without having experienced a single check; they think more seriously of their private interests than of the safety of Canada.

I beg you to be persuaded that it will only be at the last extremity that I shall cede to the English the smallest trifle, and then I shall have no other resource whenever I surrender any post to them, notwithstanding the excessive superiority of their forces. Though I have every thing to expect from the valor of the troops both of the Colony and of France, and from the Canadians' love of country, yet it would be rashness not to be apprehensive for events, but I beg you to assure his Majesty I shall make use of every effort to elude them.

I am with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant.

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil's Plan respecting Lake Ontario, to be communicated to the Marquis de Montcalm, 1758.

On receiving intelligence that the English had seized Fort Frontenac on the 27th August last, I immediately detached M<sup>r</sup> Duplessis with a party of 1,500 Canadian soldiers or Indians to La Présentation to oppose the enemy, protect the Indian settlement and the rapids of the Catarakoui river; I have since ordered out 1,500 soldiers or Canadians from the government of Quebec and Three Rivers, who are actually in motion and on the point of arriving at Montreal.

When I learned that the sloops were in possession of the English, I called for 30 bark canoes for the immediate conveyance to Niagara of 500 men, gunners, soldiers and Canadians, with the Indians who would volunteer to join them, all under the orders of M<sup>r</sup> de Montigny, hoping that, as those canoes could be concealed in the woods, they would easily escape interference on the part of the sloops, if they can reach Niagara. I dare make myself easy on that head.

I have also sent to Quebec for 9 iron 12-pounders and 6 six-pounders; I have at La Chine six small brass field pieces from Carillon; I get one brass 9-inch mortar from Quebec, 2 of 8 and 2 of six, and M<sup>r</sup> Lemer cier has required from Quebec or Carillon what is indispensable for that artillery in case I employ it to make an attack or to defend myself.

The first convoy that has gone off has carried with it only 40 days' provisions, on account of the dispatch with which it was to proceed; all that will leave in future will carry with 6 men 5,000 weight, in order that the men, provisions and ammunition may arrive at the same time.

The wheat harvest being finished, and nothing remaining but the small grains, I would be able still to send up 1,000 @ 1,500 men, which would give me 4,500, by adding thereto merely a picket of 50 men from the different battalions, which would give 400, and by giving a rendezvous at Niagara, I might still draw thence at least 500 men, inasmuch as everything will have been decided by that time at the Beautiful river; I should then have an army of 5 thousand 3 or 400 men which might operate as follows:

1st

If the English be not more numerous at Chouaguen than ours, I calculate on their being harassed, and consequently that their works will not be greatly advanced if they have wished to profit by the old fort; the Marquis de Montcalm knows the ground, and the difficulty of effectually intrenching it to protect it against being commanded; if, on the contrary, they have taken up a position on the Fort Ontario side, will it not be possible at least to destroy their sloops and reduce them to possess at this moment only some bateaux on the lake, the same as we? Would it not be proper, in such case, to attempt every possible means to drive the English thence, and prevent them rebuilding old Choueguen?

2nd

If the English have a superior army in numbers, and their post was considered impregnable, would it not be preferable to have at the Bay of Nioouray a camp of light troops and Indians, for the forming continually of detachments both against their workmen and their convoys, in order to retard them and oblige them to have strong escorts?

3rd

To convey the remainder of the army to Frontenac, where men would be employed on an intrenched camp for the protection of our troops, provisions and ammunition against a coup de main, in the construction of sloops during the winter, and resuming there the naval superiority we possessed on that lake.

4th

Convoys of 200 bateaux would be formed each voyage, which would pass and repass along the north shore to provision Niagara and the Upper countries, and, in order that these convoys may arrive safe, 6 or 8 guns would be added to them, ready to be landed at a moment's notice, which would oblige the sloops to move off again, supposing they would want to bar the passage.

5th

In case the enemy had marched to Niagara and reduced it before M. de Montigny's arrival, would it not be proper to proceed immediately to Choueguen, form an intrenchment there and send thither as large a force as possible to cut off all communication on the English and prevent them victualing Niagara; the course is an extreme one, but it appears to me to be the only one under such circumstances.

Such, in general, are my views, and I think of using every means to oppose the reestablishment of old Choueguen; I request the Marquis de Montcalm to communicate his reflections to me; 'tis idle for me to impress upon him the necessity I shall be under of making many of the troops spend the winter in that quarter, and he will arrange, as he will think proper, the manner in which the troops of the Line will proceed thither, desiring, as much as possible, that the officers and soldiers who will go, be willing and active, in order thus to admit of the Colonial officers, making all the detachments that circumstances will require.

Memoir respecting the Lake Ontario district. By M. de Montcalm.

According to the Marquis de Vaudreuil's Memoir, there are at present, fifteen hundred men in the Lake Ontario district; 1,500 are going up there from Quebec, and the Marquis de Vaudreuil mentions 1,000 others he could, in case of necessity, draw from the different governments. In regard to those on the Beautiful river, they ought not enter into any actual project respecting Lake Ontario.

Here, then, are 4,000 or at least 3,000 men who are going to be employed to finish the campaign in that quarter; from these, however, must be deducted the 500 men who have gone to Niagara with M<sup>r</sup> de Montigny. Their business is to remain in that fort until the arrival of the troops destined to garrison it, and to be occupied there, in the meanwhile, either in coming or going for victualing that post, or at the different civil and military buildings which M<sup>r</sup> de Pouchot, whom I shall send thither immediately to command them, would judge necessary for a long and vigorous defence; therefore, no more than 2,500 or 3,500 men must be calculated; I proceed to their employment.

Either it will be possible to attack the enemy at Chouenguen, this fall, or it will not.

In the former case, I shall collect all the above people in a post at the head of the river, which I shall have selected, and determined by M<sup>r</sup> de Pontleroy, whom I shall immediately send thither. That post would become the head of that frontier, and the entrepôt for every military expedition in that quarter, whilst Frontenac or the Bay of Niahouré can never be regarded as such; the English can enter the River St. Lawrence, without those posts being aware of the fact, and besides, they cannot be sufficiently important to prevent their being left, without any danger, in the rear; in regard to the objection that is raised, that the sloops would not have sufficient water at such a post, it is null; I shall build on the lakes better vessels for war than the sloops and drawing less water; if one large sloop is required for transportation, that does not prevent the chebeks, and I can guarantee that they go as far as La Présentation.

The post once determined, a post of war and not a fort, I shall employ in that quarter all the people now in the field and who are still to go up there before the 15th 8<sup>ber</sup>, the time for the expedition against Choueguen, in constructing a good intrenched camp capable of being defended by an army; in building in the inside, stores, sheds and huts for lodging the troops who would winter there; from the 15th of 7<sup>ber</sup> to the 10th 8<sup>ber</sup> there is time to effectually commence such a work, supposing at the head of the men those who know how to make the most both of the men and the time; with that view also, I shall this day dispatch to La Présentation a large quantity of tools of every description; I will add, that if the attack on the enemy at Choueguen be possible, it will be necessary to bring from Carillon a corps of Regulars to serve as a base to that army.

Let us pass to the case wherein it would not be possible this year to attack the enemy on Lake Ontario, and my advice would be not to think of it.

1st The enemy will remain in force at Choueguen until winter; in eight days they will have constructed there, as at the head of Lake St. Sacrament an intrenchment impregnable to an assault of 5,000 men, of whatever description.

2nd It will be impossible, between this and the 15th 8<sup>ber</sup>, to have completed the necessary preparations for attacking the enemy there in form, and so to speak, by siege.

3rd The advantage of having even destroyed their two sloops; of having retarded their works by harassing them, is utterly null, compared with the time lost by the men employed in those operations; the immense consumption of all sorts which such a movement would occasion, and finally with what we could effect between this and winter, either for the defence of that frontier or to place us in a condition to attack early in the spring.

I shall, therefore, give up, absolutely, every offensive project at present, unless the scouts I shall have out continually towards Choueguen, scouts made with one canoe only by reliable and cool men, and which follow each other without any interruption, should apprise me that the enemy have remained at Choueguen only few in number; a blunder which assuredly they will not be guilty of.

I shall always collect the three, even the 4,000 men above the Rapids, and the use I shall put them to is this:

1st I shall employ them in building at the head of the river, a post which would have a double object, both to protect that frontier and to serve as an entrepôt for offensive operations; no fort whatever will effect these objects; for a man cannot be conversant with the science of war, who pretends that the best fort of this country is capable of protecting a frontier, or who proposes to sustain such a fort by an army; it belongs to M<sup>r</sup> de Pontleroy and to the people of that department to furnish the details relative to the establishment of such a post.

2nd I shall send express to Quebec for Sieurs Levasseur and Pellegrin, who understand building and navigating on both seas, for I shall ever maintain, that in every department, men of science must be consulted. According to their opinion I shall immediately determine on the quality and quantity of the navy to be kept on the lakes, and whatever concerns the manner either of defending ourselves there, or attacking the enemy's vessels.

3rd I shall have brought up from Quebec also, immediately, (for there is not a moment to be lost, and officers must make up for short means and fewness of numbers, by an activity which multiplies them in some sort) a portion of the carpenters, masons, laborers, lock-smiths, in a word all the workmen who are employed in the towns only on matters of luxury, private enterprises, or on public works which appertain to peace, or will not serve for war except at a future time, and I shall employ all those men on the three frontiers of Quebec, La Présentation, St. John, in works of urgency and of actual necessity.

4th I shall retain here and render an account thereof to the Court, several merchantmen, the crews and rigging of which would serve from this day on the lakes, and furnish me hands for the proposed works.

5th At the post determined on above the Rapids, and in the meanwhile at La Présentation, I shall make the collection of warlike stores and provisions, bateaux, bark canoes, tools, either for an obstinate defence in that quarter, if attacked first, or for an attack on the enemy early in the spring; I wish the train of artillery to be such as to precipitate an attack by bombardment and red hot shot.

6th I shall employ a portion of the 4,000 men in victualing Niagara for a garrison of 500 men; in supplying all those who pass, a great many Indians, either those who will go by there, or those who will remain, with munitions of war, to defend themselves there a long time and to the last extremity, supposing even that that fort be reduced to have its communication with any other cut off; and with goods in proportion to the presents to be made to the Nations.

7th I shall observe that large convoys are prejudicial: 1st, because they move slowly; 2nd, because the defeat of such a convoy is absolutely ruinous to us; I shall form small convoys, but such as will follow each other without delay, until the last of the supply.

8th I shall place in command at the head of the river an active, intelligent, disinterested man, capable of prosecuting and accelerating works of urgency, and of reporting to me the movements of the enemy.

9th Supposing even that the enemy take Niagara this fall, I shall alter none of the preceding observations, except to suppress what concerns the victualing of that post.

Such are my ideas respecting Lake Ontario, according to the Memoir the Marquis de Vaudreuil has communicated to me. I annex to these ideas the present reflections on the other parts of this Colony.

M. de Vaudreuil's Observations on M. de Montcalm's Memoir on Lake Ontario.

I thank the Marquis de Montcalm for the reflections he has done me the honor to communicate to me; I shall make use of them according to circumstances, when I shall be exactly informed of the enemy's position and movements. The Marquis de Montcalm is not ignorant that superiority of numbers being on their side, I dare not promise myself any success except in surprising them by an attack in the inclement season.

As for the abandonment of the lakes, I shall never adopt that step, and should circumstances reduce me to guard the head of the rapids and defend its passage, which will never be the case except in the last extremity, I shall require for that only a very small force, the major part of which will be only Canadians and Indians.

I am, Sir, entirely decided to reëstablish the navy on Lake Ontario, and to reacquire, if possible, the superiority we possessed there. It would be too dangerous to confine ourselves to La Présentation; Frontenac, or some other place convenient to it, ought to be our entrepôt; supposing that the English were fixed at Choueguen, this is the only means to preserve the communication of the lakes by the north; there only can we observe them; in consequence of these resolutions, I am about to prepare an instruction to M. de Pontleroy which will have reference thereto.

The Marquis de Montcalm is too much of a military man not to admit that, no matter however well we may victual Niagara, were it reduced to the defence of its garrison alone, and should we abandon our lakes, neither it nor any of the other little posts could fail of being taken, if the English lay siege to them.

I have, as well as you, Sir, considered the necessity of confiding the command of the forces I shall have on Lake Ontario to an officer who combines all the talents necessary for war, and with that view, I ask of you Chevalier de Levy with only 400 troops of the line. I consent equally to confer the command of Niagara on M<sup>r</sup> Pouchot, as he is qualified to complete and even to defend the works, if attacked.

I shall continue with great activity to victual that quarter, and shall decide this fall on the operations necessary to be executed this winter, according to the report Chevalier de Levy will make me. It will afford me sincere pleasure to give the Marquis de Montcalm communication thereof afterwards. I was well convinced of the manner he personally, and all the troops under his orders, will concur in the execution of my plans.

Memoir on the course to be pursued at this moment in regard to the Frontier of Lake Saint Sacrament. By M. de Montcalm.

It is of the greatest importance that the Marquis de Vaudreuil should determine the course to be adopted between this and winter, and this day give orders relative to the Lake Saint Sacrament frontier.

The enemy can attack us yet at Carillon; no matter what intrenchment we have constructed there, they can force us to abandon it.

1st Then, must Fort Carillon be abandoned to its own strength and must the army fall back on St. Frederic and successively on St. John?

2nd Ought the garrison to be left there, be either strong or weak?

3rd Must we not from this day, prepare Forts Carillon and St. Frederic to be blown up in succession, in case the enemy should force the army to abandon its position before Carillon, and afterwards that before St. Frederic, and thereby deprive the English of posts already built, in which they could winter, and of considerable Artillery?

4th Supposing the enemy will not attack us there, or attack us unsuccessfully, what garrison, what force must winter at Carillon and St. Frederic? Must these two forts always be prepared for the contingency, when it would be necessary to have them blown up during the next campaign?

Precise orders from the Marquis de Vaudreuil on these points are necessary.

He alone is to decide thereupon.

M. de Vaudreuil's Answer to M. de Montcalm's Memoir on Carillon.

The Marquis de Montcalm having asked me for a precise decision on the subject of Lake Champlain, in order to know whether Carillon and St. Frederic will be abandoned, so as to restrict our defence to the river near St. John, and whether it would not be proper to have those posts mined in order to their being blown up, I have the honor to answer him, that having reason to flatter myself with being always able to keep 6 @ 7 thousand men there, I do not presume that the English will dare attack it, but even though such should be the case, that post always appears to me the most advantageous, since by building chebecks, even should we be beaten there, these would favor the retreat of our army.

2nd That were these two posts abandoned, the enemy, by taking possession of them, would immediately build a navy which would soon be superior to ours and enable him to throw all his forces into that quarter, whence 'twould follow that the fate of this Colony would depend only on one battle gained or lost; that indubitably, the Indian Nations, believing our defeat inevitable, would pounce from all points on the heart of the Colony and total ruin would be the result in a short time. That as to what regards the establishments the English will find already prepared, they may be considered of trifling moment; for, having had superiority sufficiently great to oblige us to abandon them, they ought not to be afraid of our being able to go and attack them, as the least intrenched camp, with stores, would be of equal advantage to them; they would construct such a post in so short a time that this labor may be counted as nought.

For these reasons, Sir, I am resolved on the preservation of our forts, and I refer, besides, to the M<sup>re</sup> de Montcalm to fix the strength of those garrisons as well as to arrange with the officer who is to command the artillery there, what quantity of cannon and ammunition, of every description, shall remain there, after which, the M<sup>re</sup> de Montcalm will order the surplus to be sent back to St. John, where the whole will be deposited for repair during the winter.

General Reflections on the measures to be adopted for the Defence of this Colony. By M. de Montcalm.

Three principles are, above all, to be established :

1st It is no longer the time when a few scalps, or the burning a few houses is any advantage or even an object. Petty means, petty ideas, petty Councils about details are now dangerous, and waste material and time; circumstances exact determined and decisive measures. The war is entirely changed in this part of the world according to the manner the English are attacking us; nothing less is at stake than the utter and impending loss of the Colony or its salvation, that is to say, the postponement of its fall. It is with this view we must act; 'tis this truth which must be unceasingly before our eyes.

2nd All private interests, every object of trade, ought to cease here; 'tis the trunk of the tree that's attacked; whatever concerns the branches is of the greatest indifference.

3rd Activity, scrupulous and well defined employment of men and time, can alone supply want of means and fewness in numbers; not a single instant must be lost. They are multiplied by being properly employed. Such are the principles; let us pass to the measures to be adopted, and to be adopted this very day.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil must calculate with precision the forces actually existing in this country, without reckoning on any reinforcement from France; should any come, well and good; that laid down, this is the detail; eight battalions of troops of the Line, computed in the actual return at 3,200 men.

The troops of the Marine, to judge of them by the number who have made this campaign, can be estimated at only 12 or 15,000 men.

Regarding the Militia, it is indispensable, 1st To order a census of them to be made at the end of the fall, by reliable, disinterested and impartial officers, on the following plan: 3 classes—good, middling, bad and men absolutely necessary for planting and harvesting, on the supposition that, in case of urgency, the women of the country and the idle in the town will be employed at those works.

2nd To order that all not strictly necessary at these works, make the entire campaign, to the number of 4,000 at least, picked from the best men.

3rd To distribute these 4,000 men in the following manner: To put fifteen of them in each company of the troops of the Line, who will imbibe the military spirit and perform the same service as our soldiers; and into each company of the Marine a number of Militiamen equal to that of the soldiers, it being well understood that the troops of the Marine will be continued to be formed into battalions. The advantage of this incorporation is, that each company of the Line and Marine will have with it and in it some excellent marksmen, some excellent canoemen and some excellent workmen; that, in emulation, the one of the other, the soldier and the Canadian will operate on each other as a spur to act well, and will mutually teach one another things they know; remedy the inconvenience of not having enough of officers in the Colony to lead the Militia, watch them and derive advantage from them. 'Tis not to be feared that these Militiamen will experience any bad treatment among the troops; 1st They live very well with our soldiers, whom they love; 2nd On the least complaint they would make either as to remarks or corvées, the Marquis de Montcalm would know effectually how to apply a remedy and prevent their recurrence. Besides, if the Marquis de Vaudreuil adopt this idea and make a regulation respecting it, which would be published and prevent every species of abuse, the incorporation would carry off about 3,000 Militia; the 1,000 remaining would serve to be detached under the orders of Militia officers d'élite, encouraged by the hope of honorable distinction. The Marquis de Vaudreuil should make an ordinance which would subject the Militia to the same subordination to their Militia officers as is established among the Regular troops.

4th To adopt measures to prevent all the Militiamen making the campaign entirely naked, but to provide for their having, like our soldiers, clothes to protect them from suffering through the campaign from cold and disease; to furnish them even with awnings, in which case the companies would be responsible for those incorporated, and the Militia officers for those not drafted.

5th To pay those Militiamen who would make the entire campaign; 'tis for M<sup>re</sup> de Vaudreuil to determine what it should be, and whether the King or the Parishes should defray the expense.

6th To attach to each company thus mixed, a certain number of tools for which the officers would be responsible.

7th To regulate the number of men to be allowed to the contractor for his transports; to prevent his taking the best of the entire Militia; to order that the same Canadians be employed throughout the campaign in that service and regularly receive one pay and one ration fixed by the Governor-General and the Intendant.

8th The census once made will show what number of men, exclusive of the 4,000 abovementioned, can be brought to march in case of extremity.

This, I believe, is nearly all that regards the Militia, and the detail of the forces of this Colony. I shall add, to prevent the departure of too great a number of Canadians to the Upper posts, private interest alone can oppose itself to all those views which are necessary for the preservation of the Colony.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil whilst making arrangements for the construction of a navy on Lake Ontario, ought also establish one, this very day, at St. John, on Lake Champlain; otherwise, I repeat, 'twill be impossible to maintain ourselves there. He ought, at the same time, have the greatest number possible of bateaux and bark canoes built and have them collected at all the entrepôts of the different frontiers.

That of Quebec deserves the greatest attention; it is the capital, the heart of the Colony. Louisbourg taken, our navy feeble, almost crushed, the reasonable and decisive plan of attacking Quebec may be attributed to the English. 'Tis to be hoped they will not make it this year; the season is getting late and permits us besides only to sketch out measures to-day which will not be applicable except to the next campaign. All the arrangements, then, ought to be made this very fall for putting into execution, immediately after the breaking up of the ice, the plan of defence submitted last year to the Marquis de Vaudreuil. 'Tis necessary that the redoubts, lines and batteries be traced and laid out in masonry before the frost begins; that stockades, palisades and planks be made and drawn to the ground so that the different works may be completed early next spring and allow liberty to attend to the other frontiers. M<sup>r</sup> de Pontleroy can, after having settled and laid out the works to be executed at the head of the river, immediately come down to Quebec to prepare for his defence. Besides, it will be necessary this winter, to give all the orders of detail which relate thereto, so that what every man, from the Commandant out of Quebec to the Militiaman can and must do, may be fixed and assigned.

It also appears essential that the Marquis de Vaudreuil do forbid, in season, any Canadian going fishing either at the lower part of the river or in the gulf; under existing circumstances, it is impossible for the interest of a few private persons to risk the safety even of these very persons, for, should the Colony be lost, all is lost. The crews of all those fishing vessels will do useful service on the lakes and in the defence of Quebec, and the strong arms which belong to the country are no longer to be employed to the gain of a few; all seamen, whether Canadian or settlers at Quebec, must also be regarded for the interior of the Colony, without any of them being permitted to swerve therefrom. I again repeat here, that I shall retain a certain number of merchantmen, and shall employ for the actual and urgent necessities of the Colony, not only the crews, but the rigging, and even hulls of those vessels; the Court cannot fail to approve this resolution, whose object is to postpone the loss of a Colony which has cost so much to France. Besides, the indemnities to be paid to the owners of those vessels are of nought compared with the advantages to be derived from them.

The article respecting the course to be pursued towards the Indians of the Upper country, is of the same importance as the preceding. I shall be of opinion that it would be proper to send them word immediately to come down early next year to Montreal, to get what they require, which will be given, instead of sold, to them; to enjoin on the officers of the posts to come at the opening of the navigation and to bring with them all the hired men at those posts, who are excellent in war, and the greatest number of Indians they can prevail on.

I do not mention the Beautiful river; nothing can be done now for it. Fort Duquesne no longer exists; whether it has been attacked or taken, whether we are yet masters of it, the determination respecting that frontier must be adopted this winter, when the plan of special operations for the campaign of 1759, will be agreed on.

Such are the reflections I have considered it my duty to present to the M<sup>de</sup> de Vaudreuil; 'tis for him, who has been a long time acquainted with this country which is confided to his care, to judge of their solidity, and to put in execution what he will believe possible and advantageous. I can be answerable to him for the zeal with which the troops of the Line, their officers and General will apply themselves to the defence of this Colony and execute his intentions.

M. de Vaudreuil's Remarks on the General Memoir.

I have read with attention the Memoir which the Marquis de Montcalm has communicated to me on the general views of the entire defence of the Colony. It assuredly abounds with principles all excellent, but the constitution of the Colony, the political views of the State do not permit me to decide on the major part of the propositions. I must, previously, weigh all their advantages and consequences; it is the same with some which are to be considered in company with the Intendant. Therefore, I postpone making use of them to another time. I am not the less grateful for the motives from which the Marquis de Montcalm acts.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Massiac.

Montreal, 3rd November, 1758.

My Lord,

I have the honor to send you, hereunto annexed, copy of,

1st The letter General Abercromby has written me on the 1st of last month.

2nd That which he wrote the same day to Colonel Schuyler.

3rd The letter I have written that General on the 19th of last month.

4th The parole of Captain Woodward of the English Militia.

5th The exchange I have concluded with Colonel Schuyler, who was authorised by General Abercromby, of a number of English prisoners equal to that which composed the garrison of Frontenac.

6th The letter I have written to General Abercromby on the 1st of this month, announcing to him the departure of M<sup>r</sup> Schuyler and the prisoners.

You will perceive, my Lord, by both my letters to that General, that I do not conceal from him that the conduct he himself observes in regard to the capitulation of Fort George, would have exacted nothing less than the non-execution on my part, of that of Frontenac. I did not in fact decide, my Lord, on observing this capitulation, except with the view of placing the English doubly in the wrong on the subject of that of Fort George, and to preserve to you the privilege to make good our just subjects of complaint in this regard, which are so much the better founded, as the English themselves cannot but congratulate themselves on the manner I have constantly acted towards those whom the fortune of war has placed in my hands.

I have moreover, determined on observing that capitulation in order to deprive the English of every pretext of refusing those terms we shall possibly be under the necessity of mutually granting each other; I am intent on obviating everything, so that the war may be waged between them and me in that good faith which ought to be inseparable from it.

It is likewise with that view, I permit Captain Woodward of the English Militia to return to New England, on parole, until General Abercromby reclaims Sieur Coriveau.

The sending back those prisoners cannot lead to any consequence for this Colony. I have paid particular attention to retaining those who appeared to me the most suspicious; as for the rest, the information those who depart will be able to afford General Abercromby, will serve only to convince him of the stout defence he will always meet from me. These prisoners moreover, do not know anything more than those I have been obliged to send back in packets to Old England. The scarcity of provisions induces me to get rid of them, the rather as otherwise the old garrison of Frontenac could not resume any military duties.

I flatter myself, my Lord, that you will please obtain the King's approbation for the course I have taken, and to lay in the most favorable light before his Majesty the powerful motives which have led me to adopt it.

I am with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

Translation of the letter written by General Abercromby to the Marquis de Vaudreuil.

Sir,

As it is at present over a month since the capture of Fort Frontenac by a detachment of the troops of the King, my master, under the orders of Colonel Broadstreet, I was in hopes that in conformity to the capitulation granted to that garrison and in consequence of the engagements of M. Noyan, Colonel Schuyler would have been sent ere this hither in his place, accompanied by a like number of his Majesty's subjects actually prisoners in Canada, equal in number and grade to those permitted by that capitulation to return to Montreal. The kind treatment and civilities your people have experienced on the part of Colonel Broadstreet and the troops under his command, though composed in part of different Indian Nations, had afforded me greater reason to hope, and I must avow that I cannot imagine any reason for the delay in the execution of that convention, unless it be that your Excellency has not been informed of it. To obviate that, I have the honor to send you herewith copy of the capitulation, with a list of the names and ranks of the persons who thereby have become prisoners of war. By that list your Excellency will see, that they consist, exclusive of M. Noyan, of 4 officers, 2 sergeants, 3 corporals and 41 soldiers of the line, not including two who are dead, and 51 commissaries' clerks, workmen, laborers, sailors and farmers, 10 women and 13 children; in all 125. Which number of the King, my master's subjects, if found actually in your possession and of equal grade with those above, I expect to see here without delay, pursuant to the aforesaid capitulation. Wherefore I demand your Excellency's permission to accompany this by a letter to Colonel Schuyler enclosing duplicates of the above copies, with authority to arrange that exchange agreeably to the conditions stipulated between Colonel Broadstreet and M. Noyan, whereunto I doubt not your Excellency's consent.

I have the honor to be, with all possible regard, &c.,

(Signed), J<sup>es</sup> ABERCROMBY.

Translation of the letter written by General Abercromby to Colonel Schuyler.

Sir,

Having honored your friend Colonel Broadstreet with the command of a detachment of his Majesty's troops to lay siege to Fort Frontenac, and he succeeding in that expedition, I have again the satisfaction of seeing your captivity drawing to a close. From the good treatment and civility the French garrison had received from Colonel Broadstreet and the detachment under his orders, though composed of different Indian Nations (an evident proof that the latter can be restrained), I did, indeed, expect that you would have been ere this sent back with a like number of his Majesty's subjects of the like grade to those who were taken at Frontenac. Could I have suspected the contrary, you may be assured I would have made earlier application to his Excellency the Marquis de Vaudreuil for the execution of the enclosed capitulation. I write him on this subject by this opportunity, requesting him to cause the capitulation to be fulfilled without delay, adding similar lists to those you will receive herewith of the names and rank of such as were permitted to return to Montreal, informing him, at the same time, that I should give you authority to arrange with him the exchange as stipulated between Colonel Broadstreet and M. de Noyan, which I do by these presents, and in consequence you will endeavor, without ceasing, to obtain your liberty as well as that of the other prisoners above mentioned; but should any unforeseen difficulty occur, you will demand of the Marquis de Vaudreuil your personal exchange, and you will be the bearer of the reasons which may prevent the above exchange, although, at the same time, I do not anticipate any. Meanwhile, I add to this clause that nothing ought to detain you any longer in a captivity so injurious to your private affairs, and flatter myself that M. de Vaudreuil, on this just and equitable request, will afford me occasion to rejoice that I had it in my power to convince him that my protestations of humanity and christianity are sincere; and, so long as I am not forced to act otherwise by different treatment of the King's subjects, whom the fortune of war may place in his hands, I shall adhere continually to these sentiments with exactitude; and, in order that he may not pretend ignorance, I leave this open so that he may read it.

By my last letters from England, I am empowered to grant your petition, which I shall willingly do in such manner as you will judge proper.

I am, with truth and regard, &c.,

(Signed), ABERCROMBY.

To Colonel Schuyler.

Copy of the letter written by the Marquis de Vaudreuil to General Abercromby.

19th October, 1759.

Sir,

I have received the letter your Excellency has done me the honor to write me on the 1st of this month. I should have had that of answering it sooner, did I not wish to procure for Colonel Schuyler, who is at Quebec, the pleasure of receiving the letter you sent me for him. What he has written me, has this moment reached my hands.

I have been, Sir, exactly informed of the capitulation granted by Colonel Broadstreet to M. de Noyan and the garrison of Frontenac. I have been penetrated with his generous proceeding, and am fully convinced that that Colonel has been particularly affected by the cruelty of the small number of Indians he had with him, who cut the head off a wounded Frenchman and scalped him at the same time. I attribute this proceeding only to the ferocity of the Indians, whom it is impossible to restrain on those occasions.

You could have given two interpretations, Sir, to my silence.

The first, that I expected your Excellency would have previously executed the capitulation of Fort George, in order to induce me to execute that of Frontenac.

The second, that you might at least presume that I deferred the execution of that capitulation until the King, my master, had given me his orders in that regard, since your Excellency has not considered it your duty to act otherwise by that of Fort George.

But, Sir, so far from making use of the right of reprisal, which I have legitimately acquired, I leave it to the Court of France to maintain it before that of Great Britain. I have therefore made it a point to execute the capitulation of Frontenac in its original state, feeling a sincere satisfaction in affording your Excellency new proofs that it will never be my fault, if we do not always carry on the war against each other with feelings of humanity and generosity, which we ought mutually exercise towards the subjects of the Kings, our masters, whom the fortune of war places in our hands.

I am pleased, Sir, that you have authorized Colonel Schuyler to negotiate an exchange of the prisoners in question with me. I have written to him that he was at liberty to go to town for that purpose; he will be present himself at Quebec. When the list of the prisoners will be begun to be made out, and when I shall have the pleasure of seeing it, I shall terminate everything with him, and accelerate, as much as in me lies, his departure and that of the prisoners exchanged for ours.

This letter has, then, no other object now than to renew to your Excellency the respectful sentiments with which I have the honor to be, &c.

Whereas, it has pleased the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of Canada, to permit me to return to England<sup>1</sup> to attend to my private affairs and on my word of honor that I shall remain there as long as his Excellency, General Abercromby, will permit Captain Corrivaux to remain in Canada;

I, the undersigned Peter Schuyler, ancient Colonel of the regiment of Militia of New Jersey, authorized by his Excellency General Abercromby, Commander-in-Chief for his Britannic Majesty in all New England, in virtue of the power given me by his letter of the first of October of the current year, to negotiate with his Excellency the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Commandant of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for his Most Christian Majesty in all New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana, for an exchange of the officers, hired men, soldiers, Militia of the garrison of Frontenac and the women and children who happened to be there, viz, M. de Noyan, King's Lieutenant of Three Rivers, commanding said post for me, Peter Schuyler, and other officers, hired men, soldiers, Militiamen of the garrison and the women and children who were at Frontenac, for a like number of English of the same rank,

Do certify that the Marquis de Vaudreuil has granted to me my exchange for M. S. de Noyan and that of the officers, soldiers, Militia, women and children mentioned in the preceding list, for officers, soldiers and Militia of the said garrison of Frontenac, and for the women and children who happened to be found there, in virtue of which I declare, always by the authority I hold from General Abercromby, that M. de Noyan, the officers, servants, soldiers, Militiamen and other persons included in the capitulation granted on the twenty-seventh of August of the current year, by Colonel Broadstreet to M. de Noyan, and the said garrison of Frontenac, are purely and fully discharged from their parole of honor, and are entirely free to serve each in his department, civil and military; that, moreover, the Marquis de Vaudreuil delivered to me, of his own free will, the women and children named in the above list, over and above the number necessary to complete said exchange.

M. Daine to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Quebec, 3<sup>d</sup> November, 1758.

My Lord,

We learn by a courier sent from the Beautiful river to the Marquis de Vaudreuil that the vanguard of the English, consisting of 1,000 of their best troops, destined for the attack on Fort Duquesne, would have surprised M. de Lignery, Commandant of that fort, that detachment having taken an unexpected route, had not some Englishmen in advance made a noise and set fire to a barn at a distance. The sentries, having heard that noise and seen the fire, awoke our men, who were asleep, crying out "Aux Armes!" In a moment they proceeded against the enemy and pressed them so vigorously, that the action lasted scarcely half an hour. The English, having taken to their heels, were pursued during 2 hours; the English lost at least 6 @ 700 men; 400 have remained on the field of battle; the remainder have been massacred by our Indians, who have brought off a great many scalps, which makes it to be presumed that very few escaped.

We have taken prisoners, the Commandant, 4 officers and 100 soldiers, and have lost only 8 men and 8 wounded, who, fortunately, have not fallen into their hands.

It had been previously asserted that the English had brought to Gaspé some frame houses ready to be put up, and were forming a considerable settlement there, but we have learned since from farmers who have arrived here in a boat on the 26th of last month, that they have abandoned that project, and contented themselves with burning all the settlements and ships which were found there, and taking the settlers and fishermen prisoners.

I have had the honor to inform you in one of my preceding letters, that the English had taken possession of the Island of St. John. I was in error, 'twas the River St. John I heard mentioned. They have built a fort there; this fact is asseverated.

We learn by another courier from Fort Duquesne that the English to the number of 6000 were again marching against that fort and were within three leagues of it; as it is not probable that the Commandant can resist such a superior force, I believe it is the part of prudence to burn that fort, and abandon it if he wishes to avoid falling into their hands. These, 'tis said, are the orders which M. de Vaudreuil has given in case that Commandant will not be able to act otherwise.

M<sup>r</sup> Wolf, a partizan officer, who had been deputed to go and carry the General's letters to M. Albert Cromby, reports that the latter has retired with his troops into winter quarters after having had all the barges conveyed to fort Lydius and the intrenchments thrown down. 'Tis also reported that they have scuttled their sloops and galleys.

An English deserter who has been examined, deposes that 13 thousand Regulars are still to come from Old to New England, and that the English, disappointed at the small success they have had up to the present time, were determined to organize a considerable fleet to come and besiege Quebec at the opening of the next spring, the rather as the reduction of Forts St. Frederic and Carillon could not lead to any result.

I believe, my Lord, that this deserter has wished to put us on a wrong scent and thereby induce us to divide our forces, for I cannot persuade myself that that nation, how enterprising soever it may be, dare attempt such an adventure, on account of the risk to be incurred in the River St. Lawrence, as I have already had the honor to remark to you.

The same deserter adds, that the Boston newspapers announce three battles won by the King of Prussia over the Austrian army, but that finding himself afterwards in a position by no means favorable to his plans, he had requested a suspension of hostilities, which had been granted him, but as the Austrian General perceived that the Prince had no other object than to take up a better position, he had attacked the Prussian army with so much vigor that he had routed them with considerable loss, and that the King of Prussia had lost his baggage in that great battle and had been also wounded.

We learn the moment I finish this despatch, that only 800 men are remaining at old Fort George, and 1,500 at Lydius, and that the five battalions of Regulars, who were there, have gone into winter quarters in the neighborhood of Orange, Corlac, New-York and Virginia, towards the Beautiful river.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DAINE.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Massiac.

Montreal, 4th 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1758.

My Lord,

Indecency of the Observations of the officers of the battalion.

Reasons which have led him to consent to give the captain 30 sous a day and 20 to the other officers.

Necessity of granting the same allowance to the Colonial officers who have to attend to all the exercises, who fight well and do not talk like the others.

The indecent observations made by the officers of the Regular troops, of which I have had the largest share, as I have had the honor to inform M. de Moras, have since then assumed new force; they have even become so public that they form the conversation of the soldiers and Canadians who are returning from the army.

The head of those troops is particularly mentioned as the real author of all this talk, but I pass the matter by in silence, I even affect to ignore it, in the sole view of the good of the King's service, being already aware of the consequences which might attend an open rupture with the Marquis de Montcalm. I must, however, my Lord, have the honor of reporting to you that the too great liberty his officers have experienced in giving an unrestrained course to their expressions, has insensibly led them to attempt to compel M. Bigot and me making a solid arrangement to procure for them the comfort of living in the Colony at a small expense. You will perceive, my Lord, by the annexed copy of the letter which the Marquis de Montcalm wrote me on the 5th of last month, on this subject, when sending me copy of that he was writing to M. Bigot, that he warns me that it is of the greatest importance that I induce that Intendant to concur in his representations, in order to put a stop to the consequences of the fermentation in the minds of the military, which may be fatal.

Nothing less than such a letter was necessary to unveil the secret sentiments of the major part of the officers of the troops of the Line. I expressed my displeasure thereof to the Marquis de Montcalm. I would assuredly have not stopped there, did circumstances not lead me to pacify.

As the thing appeared to me extremely serious, according to the Marquis de Montcalm's letter, I wrote to M. Bigot to induce him to make a proper arrangement to tranquilize those gentlemen, and we have conjointly enacted that thirty sous a day should be allowed each Captain, and twenty sous each subaltern. This expedient has in every respect, been much better than to have meat, bread and wine distributed among those officers at a low rate, since it would have cost at least three livres each a day.

I have, my Lord, the satisfaction of seeing that the officers of the Colony, who have not even half the pay of the officers of the troops of the Line, far from following their example, attend only to giving new proofs of their zeal. But as the King's intentions are, that except the special allowances made to the regular troops, the pay of the officers generally should be equal, I wrote to M. Bigot that it appeared to me proper he should grant the officers of the Colony the same indemnity that he has allowed those of the troops of the Line, until you, my Lord, should have ordered otherwise. That Intendant has admitted the justice of my proposition, and indeed were our officers excluded from that indemnity, it would have excited a jealousy which would be so much the more justified, as our officers are obliged to attend to all the corvées, and as under the title of Light Infantry, they are always destined to occupy the most exposed posts.

I cannot, my Lord, but refer to what M. Bigot has the honor of writing you on this subject and individually renew to you the representations we have the honor to jointly submit to you on the subject of the compensation which it is just to allow also to the staff of the Colony.

Such, my Lord, is an expense that can only be attributed to the fermentation the Marquis de Montcalm has apprehended on the part of the officers of the Regular troops, and which he has announced to me positively.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

Sir,

General, Chief, Protector of the troops, they rely on you and flatter themselves that you will be pleased to take their sad condition into consideration. The copy of the letter I write to the Intendant will advise you that it is impossible for our officers to live on their pay, and will make you acquainted with the fermentation of their minds, the consequences of poverty and discouragement.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Massiac.

Montreal, 4th November, 1758.

My Lord,

M. de Montcalm ought to have pursued the enemy, who have entirely vacated old Fort George, and whose retreat has been most precipitate. The officer sent by M. de Montcalm has not had the knack to retain the Indians.

The Canadians and Indians whom I sent to Carillon have made all the impression I could desire on our enemies, as the latter have entirely evacuated their camp at old Fort George.

I consider as certain that, if the Marquis de Montcalm had, according to my desires, sent a detachment of two thousand men on the Lidius road, it would have done wonders; it would, in fact, have attacked an English force that was thinking only about its retreat, and of hastening it. So evident is it, my Lord, that this retreat has been made with the greatest precipitancy, the English had formed caches, some of which we have even discovered; the others would have easily been discovered, more especially as an English deserter, who had pointed them out, had voluntarily joined a detachment sent to that effect by M. de Montcalm; but as he had assigned the command of it to an officer of the Line, the Indians who accompanied him were unwilling to remain until all the caches would have been discovered—a circumstance that would not have occurred, had that officer been agreeable to them, and qualified to make them listen to reason.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. de Bougainville to M. de Creuille.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Quebec, 8th November, 1758.

Sir,

When I left Carillon on the 21st October, the date of the Marquis de Montcalm's last despatches, he gave it in charge to me, as the distance of places did not permit him to write you again, to give you an account of the latest occurrences in this Colony, up to even the moment when the vessels would be ready to set sail.

A detachment of 800 English, partly Regulars, partly Militia, had marched very secretly from Pennsylvania to within a quarter of a league of Fort du Quesne, by a very different road from General Braddock's. Their object was to attack, in the night, the Indians encamped around the fort, guiding themselves by the fires the latter are accustomed to have in front of each of their huts. But these fires being extinguished, and the night already advanced when the English arrived, they could not execute that attack; they posted themselves at day-break on a mountain near Fort Duquesne, and made arrangements to facilitate its reconnoissance by an Engineer whom they had brought along.

But the troops of the Marine and the Canadians, to the number of 7 @ 800 men, did not give them time. They pounced suddenly and from all sides on the English, and immediately threw them into disorder. Our Indians, who at first had crossed the river, fearing to be surprised, then returned and also charged right vigorously. It was nothing but a route on the part of the enemy. 500 of them have been killed or taken, and almost all the officers. On our side, only eight men have been killed or wounded.

This fortunate adventure has, however, produced an unfortunate and inevitable effect; the Indians, immediately on returning from the pursuit, have quitted Fort Duquesne, to return to their villages. It was found impossible to retain them; yet, the Beautiful river is almost certain of being attacked. An army of 6 @ 7,000 men, under the orders of Brigadier-General Forbes,<sup>1</sup> was to assemble at the close of September to move and operate against Fort Duquesne on the 15th @ 20th October. The English have even built a chain of posts from Pennsylvania to the Ohio, to secure their communication and to spend the winter in them, in case their expedition should not succeed. Its success is more than probable.

Colonel Broadstreet's detachment, which had taken Frontenac and our sloops, retired, after having burnt the latter, to old Fort Bull, and occupied themselves only with reconstructing it solidly. The detachment we had sent under the command of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Duplessis and Contrecoeur, to reoccupy Frontenac, fell back, we know not why, on La Présentation. Nevertheless, this manoeuvre, made by chance, is said to have been from choice, for the season was too far advanced to restore Frontenac, and the sloops destined to secure us the position of Lake Ontario, will be built at La Présentation more easily and at less expense.

The Onondagas have sent an embassy to Montreal. The ambassadors, according to the custom of the Five Nations of which the Onondagas are members, have said a great deal, but nothing clear and positive, and have gone back loaded with presents and after drinking a great deal.

The English fleet which had been to take Gaspé and would, it was feared, make a settlement there, retired and quitted the river in the middle of October, after having destroyed the settlements, carried off the inhabitants, also burned the Mission of Mount Louis, and made an attempt on Miramichy. Father Germain, Missionary of Acadia, is to return here with 80 Indian families. 'Tis supposed that he will settle at Mount Louis.

General Abercromby abandoned, in the last days of October, his position at the head of Lake St. Sacrament. He retired after having burnt the intrenchments, barracks and storehouses which he had had erected there, and which led us to believe that his design was either to attack us again at the end of the fall, or to occupy that position with considerable force all winter; on the report of a deserter and the probability of that report, that the English had buried artillery, shells and shot, and sunk, in the lake, some barges and a sloop of twelve guns they had there, the Marquis de Montcalm has sent a strong detachment with some people of experience, to examine into that circumstance, and obtain any portion possible of those articles.

This retreat of the enemy has left us at liberty to go into winter quarters also. The battalions of La Reine and Berry, which are to be quartered in the government of Quebec, have left Carillon on the 1st, 2nd and 3rd November; Languedoc, which winters in the district of Three Rivers, marched on the 4th; La Sarre, Royal Roussillon, Guyenne and Bearn, destined for the district of Montreal, were to clear out in succession, and the Marquis de Montcalm to compose the rear guard of the entire army.

As Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil and Montcalm report to you my voyage and the motives which have determined me to make it, I confine myself to requesting you, Sir, that a voyage so difficult, taken by order of my superiors, and for the good of the service, may not, in case I be taken, be any impediment or obstacle to my promotion.

I am, with respect, Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DE BOUGAINVILLE.

M. de Loebinière to Marshal de Belle Isle.

Remarks by the Minister.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

This Account is filled with falsehoods and deception.

Letter of M. de Loebinière to the Minister, with an Account of what occurred, &c., in Canada up to May, 1758.

My Lord,

This Colonial officer says he has the honor to be known to the Marshal and to be in correspondence with him since some years.

He has only just been made Captain, even to the prejudice of some Seniors, and is not in a position to expect, as yet, the Cross of St. Louis.

He has officiated as Engineer; lacks not

This is the Narrative I announced to you in my first letter, interrupted by a journey unexpected by me, which kept me away fifteen days. On my arrival I find the only remaining ships ready to sail. Having no time to enter into a fuller detail than of the 8th of July at Carillon, I have endeavored at least to complete it, and this is all that I have been able to do. As for the remainder of the country, I have deferred until next year, to give you the particulars of all that has occurred in it. You will have learned, my Lord, that the affair of Catarakoui, which at first appeared very grave, has been unattended by any consequence; it is even easy to see that that expedition has been planned only in order to offer the Court of London something to satisfy it; a fort taken always appears, in the distance, something of moment.

Nobody knows, as yet, what to think about our fort on the Ohio. We have routed a van-guard of 1,000 men, few of whom have theory, but has little or no practice. He it is who built Fort Carillon, which, though 'tis worth nothing, cost the King so much and is not yet perfect. He did not impoverish himself by it; he receives an income of 7 @ 8 thousand livres since three years; he had scarcely anything in 1755. He is a relative of the Marquis de Vaudreuil.

escaped. This check, possibly, will disgust the remainder of the army and save us.

I flatter myself, my Lord, that you will be pleased to have the Cross of St. Louis conferred on me. 'Tis a favor, I dare say, I have merited by the zeal I have evinced on all occasions.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

LOEBINIÈRE.

Quebec, 11th 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1758.

Condition of New France in the month of May, 1758, and Extract of what has occurred there of the most interest during that year.

Provisions which had been very scarce the whole of the summer of 1757, the major part of those ordered in France having been taken, the scarcity increased still more in the fall. Much was expected from the harvest that year, but when the grain was ready to be cut, 'twas found, though of the finest appearance, reduced almost to nothing by the quantity of rain it received. The resolution to distribute the troops in the country was adopted, and every farmer, so to speak, found himself obliged to feed one soldier, when he had not wherewithal to feed himself and his family. Notwithstanding that precaution, it could scarcely be expected to get through the winter, even with all the economy possible. Fortunately, our Frontiers were provided for that time. That of Carillon found itself the best provisioned of all, in consequence of the supplies taken from the English at Fort William Henry and deposited there, but not in sufficient quantity to maintain more than its garrison, with some small posts acting as scouts, not ordinarily adapted to stop those of the enemy. Meanwhile, in the month of March, one of our parties, numbering about two hundred, and some Canadians and Indians, under the orders of Sieur de La Durantaye, a Cadet in the Marine troops, defeated one of a hundred and eighty men, of whom only enough escaped to carry the news of that defeat to the enemy.

Although the English, in all their marches towards Carillon, did not shew themselves except in strength, we were sufficiently fortunate not to receive any real check; the whole was limited to the loss of from twelve to fifteen oxen or cows, three or four prisoners or scalps, and to destroying on us a kiln of charcoal, which was too far from the fort to be saved. They dare not approach either our field hospitals or any huts remaining standing in the last camp.

In the spring they multiplied their parties, doubtless in order to ascertain by the prisoners they might take, our precise situation, which they already knew was very melancholy. They succeeded, in the fore part of May, with seventeen carpenters, who were crossing the river to square some timber required for the fort; in the act of landing at the point near the little swamp, opposite the redoubt, these carpenters received a volley of musketry by which five were killed, and the remainder taken and carried to Fort Edward.

Hoping to receive supplies early from France, the siege of that fort had been planned in the winter on the supposition, always, that this frontier would be bare of troops in consequence of the expedition which 'twas thought the enemy would send, at the opening of the spring, against Louisbourg. A strong detachment was, also to be sent to the Five Nations; this was demanded by their chiefs, who assured that they would determine the Cantons to march against the English: the whole being combined so as to make a diversion in the direction of Corlar. Meanwhile, the month of May was advancing without any news having been as yet received from Europe. It was no longer possible for the farmer to feed the soldier, having no more wheat, pease or oats, and many had, throughout the entire winter, no other resource than the last mentioned grain. All Quebec had been reduced to two ounces of bread per head; it was four ounces since the summer; notwithstanding that reduction, the supply was not adequate for more than fifteen days.

The reserve, in this town, was hardly sufficient to convey two or three battalions as far as Chambly. Between the 8th and the 15th, the workmen belonging to the Engineer and Artillery departments, were dispatched to Carillon with some gunners, the whole amounting to about two hundred and thirty men; even the departure of these, however imperative, was on the eve of being stopped for want of provisions.

The government of Montreal was no better victualled. The dépôts at Chambly and St. John did not contain wherewith to supply the portion of the troops for Carillon, and there were no resources elsewhere. The North East (wind) had continued now several days, without anything making its appearance, whereby the Marquis de Vaudreuil was obliged to give orders to Sieurs de Loebinière and Fiedmont, who conducted the workmen and gunners to Carrillon, to discharge the former from Chambly, with the exception only of such as were indispensable and some twenty gunners, so that the whole amounted at most to thirty-five men; provisions had even to be brought from Carillon, to facilitate the passage of the troops to Chambly and St. John, and the regiment of La Reine was on the eve of arriving at the former fort. Orders were issued to retain this regiment at Chambly, as the scarcity was daily increasing, and the soldier could, at that fort, be reduced, without danger, to half a pound of bread, whilst, were he sent on to Carillon, he would have indispensably consumed a pound and a half.

Such was the condition of the Colony on the 23rd of May, when the Marquis de Vaudreuil had intelligence that eight French ships and one prize, freighted with seven thousand and some odd barrels of flour, had anchored before Quebec on the night of the 19th. The Northeaster continued with such violence for eight days that it was impossible to get anything out of these vessels the whole of that time. At length, the wind having moderated, some sloops were loaded with provisions for Chambly and Montreal to be thence distributed to the different points of operation.

Between the end of May and the 10th of June, the two battalions of Berry and that of Languedoc were sent from Quebec. The soldiers of the Marine, scattered throughout the three districts, were recalled from the rural settlements. The Chambly Portage was indifferently furnished, both because the centre portion of the farmers were still detained on their farms by their sowing, and in consequence of the bad roads occasioned by the incessant rains. Besides, the scarcity of horses at the Basin, where the mortality among the stock had been considerable during the winter, was the cause of the sections having been more backward than ordinary.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Fiedmond and Loebinière repaired, the last days of May, to Carillon, the latter sick and continuing to grow worse, in consequence of the great occupations and little assistance he had. Each attended to his respective department. The regiment of La Reine arrived there in the beginning of June; shortly afterwards the 2nd battalion of Berry; both were employed carrying earth from the covert-way and the glacis.

The counterscarps were begun at the fronts of attack; afterwards we set about completing the two halfmoons in masonry. The number of workmen was increased from one moment to the other, by the arrival of fresh battalions.

17th June. A knowledge of the movements which the English were making, to come and attack Carillon, was begun to be acquired from prisoners, one of whom was an Ensign of Regulars, taken at the mouth of the River of the Falls, within half a gun shot of the fort, forming part of a scout of twenty men, who were approaching to reconnoitre and take some prisoners, if there was a chance. We learned that 6,500 Regulars were already at Fort Edward; that they were shortly to come to the lake; that the Provincials were to follow, and that the Portage would be passed with great celerity; that they had for the expedition a number of barges and bateaux, some of which had already arrived at Fort Edward.

M. de Bourlamaque, Colonel of Infantry, who was at Carillon since some days, dispatched Sieur Wolf, a partisan officer, by the lake, with an escort of 50 men, to convey the Marquis de Vaudreuil's answers to the letters which General Abercromby had written to him respecting Mess<sup>rs</sup> Schuler and Martin, who having gone in the winter to New England to attend to their affairs, were to have returned to Carillon at the opening of the spring. Sieur Wolf was recommended to return immediately after delivering the letters of which he was the bearer, having an eye to the number of English he should see both on the lake and at Fort Edward.

23<sup>d</sup> M. de Bourlamaque not seeing M. Wolf make his appearance, entertained no longer any doubt of the movements on the part of the English which had been announced to him, and in order to obtain a more particular knowledge thereof, he detached Sieur de Langy-Fontenelle, an officer of the troops of the Marine, an excellent Ranger, at the head of 60 and some Indians, with orders to proceed to the head of the Lake, to examine carefully the number of troops and the movements that might be thereabouts.

25th Sieur de Langy arrived in the evening from his scout with one officer and sixteen soldiers of Major Rogers' troop, who were taken within two leagues of the head of the Lake in an island where they had landed on perceiving our Indians; he reported that the English were at the Lake in great numbers with bateaux, and that there were great movements in that quarter. The prisoners reported that the English were to set out for our carrying-place in fourteen days, to the number of twenty-five thousand men, of whom 6,500 and more were Regulars; that seven thousand of that army under the orders of Lord How, were to come by land, the remainder by water in 1,500 barges or bateaux, each carrying 25 to 30 men; that Colonel Johnson was expected with five hundred Indians of the Five Nations; that Sieur Wolf and his escort were detained at Fort Edward until the arrival of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Schuler and Martin. They likewise reported that they had recently learned the landing of the English on the 8th to the 10th of this month near Louisbourg, where they had lost as much as one regiment; that 5 and 6 regiments of Regulars were marching with some Provincial levies of Carolina, Virginia and Pennsylvania against the French forts on the Ohio. From them also we learned the capture of two of our largest ships in the Mediterranean.

Dispatched a courier to the Marquis de Vaudreuil to communicate this intelligence to him. On the first knowledge he had of it, he forthwith dispatched the troops as fast as the arrival of provisions at the dépôts permitted. All those of the Line were at Carillon in the end of June; 400 men had been selected from the entire, to whom were to be adjoined 400 of the troops of the Marine under the orders of Chev. de Levis and M. de Rigaud, for the purpose of marching with the Five Nations towards Corlar. Their destination was altered when it was ascertained that the enemy was directing his entire force against Carillon, and they were sent thither, and people contented themselves with sending M. de Longueuil, Governor of Three Rivers, with 200 Canadians or Indians, to the Five Nations, to make sure of their promise. All the Militia of the three governments were commanded to repair to Carillon, where the Marquis de Montcalm arrived on the 29th of June with Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Pontleroy and Desandrouins, Engineers, who might be necessary there in consequence of the weakness of Sieur de Loebinière's lungs which had, through the fatigue of his detail that he has borne alone, having no one with him capable of sharing it, increased to such a degree as to confine him from time to time to his bed; he continued, notwithstanding, after their arrival, to occupy himself equally with the care of the fortification of the place.

The Marquis de Montcalm had orders to take possession of the Falls and Carrying place with the force he had at his disposal, on the representation of several, he was undecided whether he ought not to fall back on St. Frederic in case the enemy appeared in as great number as announced. On this subject he consulted Sieur Loebinière, who was occupied for the last three campaigns in fortifying Carillon, who, he knew, possessed a perfect knowledge of both the one and the other posts; who made him appreciate the risks he would entail on the Colony by abandoning Carillon; the advantage of the latter place; the impossibility of the enemy getting beyond it as long as 'twas occupied; the facility which existed at all times to fall back, if forced; the water communication; the ease with which the ground could be disputed, inch by inch, by means of abatis wherewith he proposed to crown a height within one-fourth of a gun-shot from the fort, the approach to which thereby became impossible; following up this abatis by some detached works proper for facilitating the retreat in case we were obliged to abandon the height, and necessary to maintain ourselves, any time, masters of the campaign; finally, the facility of constructing an intrenchment in form on the right, flanked by the fire of the fort and the halfmoons, which was in like manner proposed by him, this intrenchment occupying reciprocally a position so as to fire obliquely in front of the fortification of the place. All this work, being capable of being constructed in eight or ten days with the number of men he had, whilst that necessary to cover the army and St. Frederic, if it were desirable to occupy the heights, required more than two months' labor, the ground being stony and the woods affording no resource, as they were at a great distance. Besides, the enemy, being masters of the open country, and having no one to dispute the ground with and to interrupt him in his works, might run a road near the hill to convey his barges from the River of the Falls to that of St. Frederic, the considerable number of which would interrupt all communication on Lake Champlain, whereby our force would be exposed to have its retreat cut off, and obliged, for want of reinforcements and provisions, to surrender prisoners of war. Carillon being occupied, nothing of that sort was to be feared. All these reasons determined the Marquis de Montcalm to maintain that place in preference, and to defend it to the last. The plan of the intrenchment on the right was determined, and the principal points of the abatis on the hill fixed. M. de Bourlamaque, who had been to reconnoitre the ground between the Falls and the hill, had proposed one somewhat farther into the wood, the left of which rested on the River of the Falls, and the right on a small marsh which discharges into the River St. Frederic; but, after having examined the whole, that of the hill was preferred to it, for the soldier in the woods, who cannot see what is passing behind him, is often tempted to believe that he is turned, which may make him miss. Besides, retreat then became more doubtful than on the hill, where he perceived at a glance, the fort by which he was protected and the whole of the intervening ground, as well as everything that might pass on that side; he was then to think only of not permitting his being broken through, as he has nothing to mind but his front. The Marquis de Montcalm decided also on going to occupy the posts of the Portage and Falls, being disposed not to engage in a general action there, but to have recourse to stratagem wherever it could be used to advantage.

M. Lemercier, Commandant of the artillery in this country, who arrived the following day, confirmed the Marquis de Montcalm in all these arrangements.

1st July. Sent forward seven battalions and some troops of the Marine and Canadians; the battalions of La Reine, Guyenne and Bearn, with the troops of the Marine and Canadians, to take the post at the Carrying place, under the orders of M. Bourlamaque; those of La Sarre, R. Rousillon, Languedoc and the 1st Berry to occupy the heights of the Falls; the 2nd Berry remained encamped behind Carillon, ready to throw itself into it in case of necessity.

2nd The Marquis de Montcalm went to the Falls, and employed the battalion encamped there in making palisades and fascines which were conveyed daily to Carillon.

4th Sieur de Langy was sent to the lake on a scout; when near the islands he perceived some thity odd barges full of men; he found means by a bold manœuvre, to extricate his bateaux, and in the evening came to the Portage without any loss. A detachment of 250 @ 300 volunteers was formed to go to the Bald Mountain, where, 'twas supposed, the enemy might land.

5th This detachment repaired thither and discovered, between five and six o'clock in the evening, more than 150 barges, which without doubt were the vanguard of the enemy's army. On M. de Montcalm being advised thereof, he gave orders to be on the alert and prepared to march. At the same hour, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Lanaudière, de St. Ours, de Gaspé, Denys, Desmeloise and de Morville, officers of the Marine, arrived at Carillon with a detachment of about 150 men of their corps and Canadians; they received orders to proceed forward next day on receiving provisions.

In the night of the 5th @ 6th, some shots were fired at the Portage, doubtless by the enemy's scouts on our advanced posts.

6th Between five and six o'clock in the morning the lake was observed covered with barges and bateaux; a picket was sent to the camp which M. de Contrecoeur occupied in 1756, called The Burnt camp, whither the enemy directed their descent, who appeared to approach timidly, but having noticed only a file of 50 men, came full sweep and landed there; the picket returned at the instant. M. de Bourlamaque, who received orders to fall back on the Falls, resisted the first two, in order to afford time to save the baggage, so as to give his retreat an appearance of less precipitancy, but it being reported to him, whilst with the third, that M. de Montcalm was himself about retiring to the fort, he had fire set to some tents which were remaining and to the rest of the baggage which could not be removed, and proceeded to the Falls about eleven o'clock in the morning. M. de Montcalm, who had transferred to the fort in the morning everything that might embarrass the battalions at the Falls, made arrangements for his army to fall back on it as soon as the enemy should make their appearance.

On arriving at Carillon, the enemy being landed, axes were distributed to the 2nd battalion of Berry, to construct the projected abati, the workmen of the artillery and engineers were adjoined to them, and on that day it was advanced more than one-third to the hill.

Meanwhile, the detachment of volunteers stationed at the Bald Mountain, seeing themselves in the enemy's rear, thought of retreating; approached the Carrying place, and in the act of crossing the stream, to join M. de Bourlamaque, supposed still to be at the same post, were charged by a number of the enemy and put to flight in an instant. Almost all who had crossed were either killed or taken. Five officers of the Line were among the latter. Captain de Trepezéc of the Bearn regiment, received a shot in the body, of which he died the next morning in the fort. Sieur de Langy received a very slight wound in the leg whilst recrossing the river, and came in during the night. More than one third of the detachment returned at the same time. The enemy in this affair lost Lord Howe, who commanded that van-guard.

M. de Montcalm commenced his retreat at 4 o'clock, keeping the troops of the Marine and Canadians in the rear and on the flanks of his army, which deployed at 6 o'clock within sight of the fort. In the night, I judged the enemy, by their fires, to be, as yet, no farther than the Carrying place.

7th The abati on the height was continued; on the summit a parapet was constructed of piece upon piece; the whole was finished about three o'clock in the afternoon. Axes were afterwards distributed among the Canadians to protect themselves by a similar abatis at the bottom, on the right of the hill and included between it and the river which leads to St. Frederic. The bottom, which was about five hundred toises wide, was confided to the troops of the Marine and Canadians. As they were only four hundred and some men, they could do but very little throughout the day; in the evening, judging by the fires, the enemy had passed the Falls, and had reached within 7 @ 800 toises of our intrenchments. During the night, some shots were fired at our advanced guards; care was taken to keep some detachments outside the intrenchment, and fires were lighted in advance. The eight pickets of the troops of the Line destined for Corlar, arrived between 8 @ 9 o'clock at night.

8th Chevalier de Levis landed at day-break and went to reconnoitre his post at the intrenchment. The troops of the Marine and Canadians continued their abatis; but as there were several alarms, they were, as yet, only within 100 toises, or thereabouts, of the height at 11 o'clock in the forenoon. About that hour, a number of Indians appeared on the right bank of the River of the Falls and opposite our intrenchments. After having uttered their cry, they fired a volley of musketry which scarcely reached two-thirds of the river; we had always some detachments abroad to discover the enemy's movements.

As we knew by our scouts that the enemy was seemingly advancing to attack, the firing of a cannon was agreed on as a signal, to take position. The 2nd battalion of Berry, under M. de Trecesson's orders, was to remain at the fort to defend it; his grenadier company, with the seven other battalions, amounting in all to two thousand eight or nine hundred men, guarded the intrenchment of the height, the extent of which was about 300 and some toises. On the left, 25 toises from the height, was the River of the Falls; between the one and the other was a very steep slope taken in flank by a branch of the intrenchment, and in front by a detachment of volunteers and the cannon of the fort, seven pieces of which bear on that point. In front of the height is a gorge with a double slope, very steep, of which the slope near the intrenchment was protected by a strong abati that crowned the whole; on the right, the bottom, of which I have spoken, was confided to the care of the troops of the Marine and Canadians, and may be 500 toises from the hill to the river. This troop had its left resting on the height and its right on a point of wood, near the opening where the abatis then terminated; between the height and that troop was a pretty steep slope, with a double face. Chevalier de Levis was on the right of the hill; M. de Bourlamaque, on the left; the Marquis de Montcalm in the centre, ready to proceed wherever his presence would be necessary; M. de Raymond, captain of the Marine detachment, was in the bottom at the head of his troop and of the Canadians on the right of the hill. Half an hour after noon, 50 or 60 bateaux were seen through the opening; these, 'twas known, were full of provisions, of which we were in urgent want, since at that moment we had only eight days' supply. About one o'clock our detachments, and grenadiers, who were in advance, perceived the enemy approaching in three columns; they all came in without any confusion. The signal was given, and the following instant the three columns were seen defiling; the 1st towards the left of the intrenchment, the 2nd against the centre; the 3rd, which appeared the strongest, marching towards the bottom, on the right of the hill. Some Indians and Rangers went in front as guides. Chevalier de Levis, who perceived them, ordered M. de Raymond's troop to make a sortie by the wood, in order to outflank that column. It succeeded so perfectly that its fire, with that of La Reine and Bearn, on the right of the hill, obliged that column to throw itself on the right, in order to avoid a double flank fire. Then all found themselves together on the hill which opened and received the most brisk fire imaginable. At the same instant twenty-eight or thirty barges were discovered deploying in the cove, above the mouth of the River of the Falls. Seven or eight cannon shot fired from the fort, which sunk two, made the rest to disappear, and they did not show themselves any more.

Meanwhile the enemy kept constantly, until half-past three o'clock, at the foot of the abatis, vainly trying to clear it, but seeing that was not possible, ascended the hill and reëntered the wood in order to rally. 'Twas then only a simple discharge of musketry from one side to the other until  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 4 o'clock, when they again showed themselves, but did not engage in such numbers as the first time; then the fire became hotter than ever, and so continued until half-past 5 o'clock, at which time the enemy commenced to retreat.

From the commencement of the attack, munitions of war continued to be carried from the fort to the intrenchment, by means of horses; but as there was not a sufficient number of them, a portion of the 2nd battalion of Berry, with the workmen were employed in this transportation which caused us the loss of 30 to 40 men. the enemy continually firing at them.

When the retreat of the enemy commenced, the fire slackened by degrees and entirely ceased at  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 7 o'clock in the evening. We learned by 38 @ 40 prisoners taken during the action in the sortie on the right, that the enemy had brought to the attack from 13 to 14,000 men of the élite of their troops; that the General's design was to return with the entire army of 20,400 men, next morning, should he not succeed that day. Preparations were made in consequence. On the following night four cannon were placed on the right, and six on the left of the hill.

9th At day-break a very thick smoke was discerned; 'twas correctly concluded that the enemy were burning the barges that had been transferred and were retiring. Nevertheless 'twas not ascertained until the evening, about six o'clock, on the return of Sieur Wolf and his escort, who announced to us that in the course of that very night, more than 50 barges full of the wounded had been sent to the head of the Lake, and that the entire embarkation was completed at daylight.

The loss of the enemy is estimated at over 4,000 men, killed or wounded, among whom are a great many officers, several of whom are of consequence. Ours, during the day of the 6th and of the 8th, amounts to 4 or 500 men, killed, wounded or missing; of this number, 43 are officers, 15 of whom are dead, five are prisoners and 23 are wounded. M. de Bourlamaque is among the last; in the shoulder.

A journey I have just made renders it impossible for me to accomplish all that is promised in the title of this narrative, and I have had considerable difficulty in completing the day of the 8th, as the ship sails in an instant.

Brigadier Prevost to Captain de Becourt.

Copy of the letter from M. Prevost, commandant at Fort Edward, written on the 13th November, 1758, to M. de Becourt, commanding at Fort Carillon.

Sir,

I have received from Lieutenant Wolf, on the 10th of this month, your letter of the same date, and on the following day Colonel Schuyler arrived with one Major, one Captain-Lieutenant, two Ensigns, one Surgeon, forty-five farmers, twenty-six women and twelve children, some of whom had been ransomed from captivity by the humanity and goodness of Colonel Schuyler; you will find the number thereof in the annexed list.

I permit M. Wolf to procure several goods for the account of Mess<sup>rs</sup>, the officers in your post. I am sorry that I have not been able to furnish them to him myself, as my provisions for the winter are not yet arrived. I would have been glad of that opportunity to evince to you my gratitude for the civilities you have shown Colonel Schuyler and some others of our officers.

I am, etc.

Memoir of M. Péan on the Condition of Canada.

M. Péan has been sent by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of Canada, to bring the detail of the advantage gained the 8th of July last by the King's troops, under the orders of the Marquis de Montcalm, over the English at Carillon.

2nd To give an account of the state of that Colony and to solicit the succors which are absolutely required for its defence and preservation.

<sup>1</sup> JAMES PREVOST was appointed Colonel-commandant of the 2nd battalion of the 60th regiment, 4th January, 1756; Major-General in America 3rd June, 1762; and Lieutenant-General, also in America, 25th May, 1772. He died in the latter part of 1775. Beatson prints the name "James Provost Mackay," Political Index, II, 127.—Ed.

At M. Péan's departure in the month of August last, the Colony remained in the most critical situation; the farmers, after having furnished the last bushel of their wheat for the subsistence of the troops which were marching against the enemy, were supporting themselves only by the aid of some vegetables and wild herbs; eighteen months ago the people, without excepting a single officer, had to be reduced to four ounces of bread a day; they have been reduced of late to two ounces only. During the winter it had become necessary to deprive the troops of bread, and to subsist them on beef, horseflesh and codfish.

The provisions brought by several ships during the year have been immediately forwarded to the armies, but Quebec has always remained in its melancholy situation.

Yet, people have to defend themselves at Carillon against thirty thousand men; against ten thousand at Fort Duquesne and against six thousand towards Chouaguen. The capture of Louisbourg, the settlements pretended to have been made by the English at Gaspé and on the Island of Anticosty, at the entrance of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, have rendered the situation of Canada much more afflicting, but the late misfortune experienced at Fort Frontenac by the Colony, is the most prejudicial of those it has been threatened with, and 'twill run the greatest risks if that fort be not retaken, as it served as an entrepôt for all the King's forts and Indian posts, and as the English will close all the passages. Then, the Indians, who constitute our principal force, finding themselves deprived of all they want, by failure of the succors the French would furnish them, will not fail to go over to the English, and will come and scalp at the very gates of the towns in which the people will be obliged to shut themselves up.

'Twill probably cost a great many men and much money to retake that fort, but it is of such great necessity for the preservation of Canada, that 'tis impossible to dispense with making every effort to retake it.

The harvest is reported very bad, and we must not be surprised at that, if we observe that all the farmers have been obliged to march to oppose the efforts of the enemy.

'Tis therefore to be presumed that this Colony is about to be exposed to much more serious suffering than it has experienced in preceding years, during which people have been under the necessity of consuming all the cattle.

Many persons have died of hunger, and the number would have been much greater had the King not subsisted a greater part of the people.

The land in Canada is in general, very good, and has often supplied in time of peace, provisions to other colonies, and almost always to Isle Royale; but not having had the good fortune to participate in the last peace, and being forced since fifteen years into continual war, which has employed almost all the farmers, the land could not be cultivated, and the failure of the crops which has ensued, has augmented so considerably the price of provisions and rendered them so excessively dear, that the officer can no longer subsist there without running considerably in debt; this is not the case with the soldier to whom too considerable an allowance, and one too expensive to the King has been made.

'Tis certain that Canada will, next year, have to fight more than sixty thousand men, as the English have just sent thither additional troops; no more than fifteen to eighteen thousand men can be employed in its defence, because many will be required for the conveyance of provisions and ammunition, in consequence of the difficulty of the roads and the distance of the different posts.

Supposing the English are not yet at Gaspé, we may rest assured that they will seize it in the spring, and then they will be able to impede the navigation so much, that 'tis to be feared they will capture the greater portion of the succors which will be on the way to Quebec.

'Tis greatly to be feared that they will seize Isle au Coudre, and as the channel at that place is very narrow and the only one, it would be no longer possible to get any relief up to Quebec, and very difficult to drive the English from it.

It is to be expected that the capture of Fort Frontenac will detach from the French interest several Indian Nations who will side with the English, and that fear is founded on the small quantity of merchandise we have to give them, whilst the English furnish them goods in profusion. That event would be much more prejudicial to the Colony than a more considerable reinforcement of English troops, since the Indians are so much afraid of each other that it is very difficult to get them to fight against one another.

Notwithstanding the sad condition of this Colony, we may flatter ourselves that it will sustain itself against the enemy, if succored in season. The bravery of the Canadians is as well known as their fidelity to the King; they are accustomed to fight one against four, but how will they manage without ammunition and bread?

The troops that the King has dispatched thither are equally well disposed and may be relied on.

Three things are necessary for the safety of Canada: these are provisions, ammunition and goods, and men, and 'tis necessary that this relief arrive in the month of April, which is the time the ice breaks up.

The largest portion of the provisions is to be furnished by a contractor in Canada, who has an agreement with the King; this contractor is obliged to make the advances; he has, consequently, established houses in the different ports of France, where he has correspondents; these correspondents have purchased five or six armed frigates which are to be commanded by Captain Canon, lieutenant of a frigate, to escort the transports as far as Quebec; 'tis to be hoped that he will conduct them there, if he can sail about the 15th of February.

There are difficulties which might retard this departure and perhaps cause the entire failure of his expedition.

1st Those interposed by the Intendant of Bourdeaux, to the loading of the flour. M. de Massiac who had approved the arrangement of M. Canon, had prevailed on the Comptroller-General<sup>1</sup> to issue orders to load the half of it, the correspondents find themselves embarrassed as to the rest; they request permission to load the entire; no time is to be lost for this expedition, and the smallest delay would render it impossible to deliver those provisions. Another difficulty is, that last year, these merchants expended all their funds for the demands of Canada, their returns could be made only in bills of exchange of the country on the Colonial treasurers; these bills had hitherto the best possible credit, and at a discount of one half per cent per month on them, all the money needed was easily obtained; but since the reduction of Isle Royale, this paper is totally discredited; these merchants have not been able to obtain money, no matter what arrangement they proposed; on their remonstrance M. de Massiac had promised them to endeavor to procure them facilities to negotiate their bills; this engagement not having been yet fulfilled, brings them to a stand-still, and renders it impossible for them to satisfy their obligations. They have proposed divers means. The first, has been to engage the Farmers-general to order their receivers at Bourdeaux and the other ports where supplies are furnished, to give a preference to these bills and at the usual discount. The second, to give them a credit on M. de Montmartel, to whom they would have remitted these same bills of exchange with the interest due.

If one or the other of these arrangements could be effected, this paper would recover its usual credit; the Farmers-general or M. de Montmartel would, perhaps, not be exposed to receiving much of it.

The correspondents of the contractor have proposed to convey some troops in their frigates and transports, on payment of their passages; this would be an arrangement so much the more advantageous, as the troops would diminish the number of sailors which are obliged to be furnished them. Captain Canon has offered to take fifteen hundred men or thereabouts.

As for the other merchandise needed by the Indians and troops, M. de Massiac has likewise ordered it to be furnished; the persons who have contracted to supply it, have been ordered to have it, as well as the munitions of war, conveyed to Brest and Rochefort in all January next; the whole will probably be put on board the King's ships.

But as these will be exposed to fighting, and as 'tis important, in order to facilitate manœuvres in the engagement, that they should not be too heavily loaded; 'tis thought that 'twould be advantageous to put the surplus of provisions, munitions and goods on board three or four 60 @ 70-gun ships of those that have been reformed for fighting; by putting no artillery on board, they would still be able to carry the merchandise and ammunition to Quebec with more security than merchantmen, because they would sail better, deceive by their size, be escorted by men-of-war, and accommodate a larger quantity than a more considerable number of small merchantmen. Besides, the King would have the benefit of the freight, and have to pay only the sailors.

M. de Montcalm to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 15th November, 1758.

My Lord,

The three vessels sailed on the twelfth which carry my despatches and a letter written you, on my part, by M. de Bougainville, supplementary to my last of the twenty-first of October. M. Doreil, Commissaire ordonnateur, embarked in the King's flyboat l'Outarde and M. de Bougainville in La Victoire. Letters from Quebec inform me that there is still a fourth little vessel to sail, and I hasten, my Lord, to write you to inform you of the return of our troops to their quarters. Whatever diligence I used, although I anticipated my orders for their departure, which was much sooner than in 1755 and 1756, a too early frost, unexampled within the last fifty years, has occasioned much suffering among the troops and to myself much apprehension and embarrassment.

Chevalier de Levis, who was a passenger with me, has personally incurred some danger. We experienced, on Lake Champlain, a real tempest which scattered our fleet of bateaux like those of Saint Cloud, and the ice made us shudder on entering the rivers. But, luckily, we are quit for some slight loss of bateaux and baggage, and of only four soldiers. I write you about it only for fear some private letters should create alarm respecting that event.

We have just received news from Fort Duquesne of the twenty-third of October. Captain Aubry, of the Louisiana troops, has gained a tolerably considerable advantage there on the 15th. Although the Indians have retired to hunt and the Louisiana detachments, which came from the post of the Illinois as well as those of Detroit, have returned home, I think that Fort Duquesne is safe for this autumn and winter, and that the enemy will also think of going into winter quarters, and content themselves with preserving their new establishment; but 'tis greatly to be feared that the difficulty of transporting provisions in the spring, the fear of having its communication with Canada cut off, will cause Fort Duquesne to be abandoned.

Montreal, 21st November, 1758.

Sir,

My last was dated the twentieth of October. I learn that we have still one small vessel remaining which will not sail until the arrival of the courier that is about to be sent to Quebec, and I profit by it to inform you of the arrival of all our troops in their quarters; it has not been without a great deal of suffering, although their departure from the Camp of Carillon has been a great deal earlier than in 1755 and 1756. We experienced in the fore part of November a cold unexampled at this season for fifty years. Luckily, it has cost us only four soldiers; I write you merely for fear some private letter might have created alarm in regard to an event which raised apprehensions of more serious consequence. Chevalier de Levis who was a passenger with me, personally ran some risk on Lake Champlain.

We have just received some news from Fort du Quesne of the twenty-third of October. Captain Aubry<sup>1</sup> of the Louisiana troops has gained a somewhat considerable advantage there on the fifteenth. The enemy lost on the occasion one hundred and fifty men, killed, wounded or missing; they were pursued up to a new fort, called Royal hannon, which they are building at the head of the River D'attiqué.<sup>2</sup> We had only two men killed and seven wounded.

<sup>1</sup> Captain AUBRY, Knight of St. Louis. He was taken prisoner by Sir William Johnson at Niagara in 1759, and next returned to Louisiana where he remained after the peace of 1763, in command of four companies at New Orleans. He succeeded to the government 4th February, 1765, and surrendered the Colony in March, 1766, to Governor Ulloa for Spain, but retained its government until the arrival of Spanish troops. On the expulsion of Ulloa, in 1768, M. Aubry continued to administer the government until relieved by General O'Reilly in July, 1769. He, soon after sailed from Louisiana for Bordeaux, and the vessel had already entered the River Garonne, when she was overtaken by a heavy storm and sunk near the Tower of Cordouan, 24th February, 1770. Governor Aubry, and all on board (except the captain, surgeon and a couple of sailors), perished on this disastrous occasion. Gayarré. — En.

Although the Indians have retired to hunt, and the Louisiana detachments which came from the Post of the Illinois, as well as those from Detroit, have returned home, I think that Fort Duquesne is safe for this autumn and winter.

I have annexed to the letter I had the honor to write you on the twentieth of October, copy of my representations to the Marquis de Vaudreuil and M. Bigot, the Intendant, as to the impossibility of our officers living on their appointments, in consequence of the dearness of all our provisions, both have agreed to grant a supplementary pay of thirty sous a day to each captain, and twenty sous to each lieutenant, to indemnify them for the high price of provisions, only, however, until the opening of the campaign. 'Tis a slight alleviation of a very great evil, and I think 'twill be impossible to dispense with giving the officers a greater increase of pay, and which subsists equally through the winter and the campaign season.

I always request of you to continue your kindness and to be persuaded of an unlimited attachment which equals the respect wherewith I am,

My Lord,

Your most humble, and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

An Account of Major Grant's Defeat near Fort Duquesne.

[Pennsylvania Gazette.]

Annapolis, October 5th, 1755.

We are informed by a letter from Frederick county, that on Monday, the 11th of September, Major Grant, of the Highland regiment, marched from our camp on the waters of the Kiskiminitas, with 37 officers and 505 privates, taken from the different regiments that compose the Western Army, on an expedition against Fort Duquesne.

The third day after their march, they arrived within eleven miles of Fort Duquesne, and halted till three o'clock in the afternoon; then marched within two miles of Fort Duquesne, and left their baggage there, guarded by a captain, two subalterns, and fifty men, and marched with the rest of the troops, and arrived at eleven o'clock at night upon a hill, a quarter of a mile from the Fort. Major Grant sent two officers and fifty men to the Fort to attack all the Indians, &c., they should find lying out of the Fort; they saw none, nor were they challenged by the centries. As they returned, they set fire to a large store house, which was put out as soon as they left it. At break of day, Major Lewis was sent with 400 men (royal Americans and Virginians), to lie in ambush a mile and a half from the main body, on the path on which they left their baggage, imagining the French would send to attack the baggage guard and seize it. Four hundred men were posted along the hill facing the Fort, to cover the retreat of Capt. M'Donald's company, who marched with drums beating toward the Fort, in order to draw a party out of the Fort, as Maj. Grant had some reason to believe there were not above 200 men in the Fort, including Indians; but as soon as they heard the drums they sallied out in great numbers, both French and Indians, and fell upon Captain M'Donald, and two columns that were posted lower on the hill to receive them. The Highlanders exposed themselves without any cover, and were shot down in great numbers, and soon forced to retreat. The Carolinians, Marylanders, and Lower Countrymen, concealing themselves behind trees and the brush, made a good defence; but were overpowered by numbers, and not being supported, were obliged to follow the rest. Major Grant exposed himself in the thickest of the fire, and endeavored to rally his men, but all to no purpose, as they were by this time flanked on all sides. Maj. Lewis and his party came up and engaged, but were soon obliged to give way, the enemy having the hill of him, and flanking him every way. A number were drove into the Ohio, most of whom were drowned. Major Grant retreated to the baggage, where Captain Bullet was posted with fifty men, and again endeavored to rally the flying soldiers by entreating them in the most pathetic manner to stand by him, but all in vain, as the enemy were close at their heels. As soon as the enemy came up to Capt. Bullet, he attacked them very furiously for some time, but not being supported, and most of his men killed, was obliged to give way. However, his attacking them stopped the pursuit, so as to give many an opportunity of escaping. The enemy followed Major Grant,<sup>1</sup> and at last separated them, and Captain Bullet was obliged to make off. He imagines the major must be taken, as he was surrounded on all sides, but the enemy would not kill him, and often called to him to surrender. The French gave quarters to all that would accept it."

Montreal, 20th November, 1758.

My Lord,

The preceding letters I had the honor to write to you, had relation to the different objects of this Colony, supposing the war to continue; but as the King might possibly, my Lord, make peace during the winter, in such case the principal occupation of this government will be:

- 1st To impress on the Colonists all its mildness.
- 2nd To restore abundance in it.
- 3rd To encourage population and agriculture.
- 4th To remedy the excessively high rate of labor.

<sup>1</sup> JAMES GRANT, of Ballendalloch, was appointed Major of the Mootgomerie Highlanders on the raising of that corps in 1757, and immediately afterwards accompanied the regiment to America. He was wounded and taken prisoner on the above occasion, when 231 of his men were killed and wounded. In 1760, he became Lieutenant-Colonel of the 40th foot; was breveted Colonel in the army in 1772, and on 11th December, 1775, was appointed Colonel of the 55th, which regiment formed part of the forces under General Howe in 1776; on the 1st of January of that year Colonel Grant was gazetted Major-General "in America," and commanded the fourth and sixth brigades of the British army at the battle of Long Island in August following. In the next year he was appointed Major-General in the army, and accompanied Howe to the Delaware in command of the second brigade, and was left at Elkhead to maintain the communication with the fleet; he afterwards commanded the first and second brigades at the Brandywine; and was engaged at Germantown on the 4th October following, when he forced the left of the American army to give way. In May, 1778, he was detached with a strong force to cut off the Marquis La Fayette, on the Schuylkill, but was unsuccessful in that design. He defeated General Lee, in New Jersey, in June, and on the 4th of November sailed from Staten Island in command of the army sent against the French possessions in the West Indies. In December following he reduced St. Lucia; was promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-General 20th November, 1782; became Colonel of the 11th foot in 1791 and Governor of Stirling Castle. In May, 1796, he was promoted to be General in the army and died "very old" at his seat at Ballendalloch, near Elgin, in Scotland, about the 13th May, 1806. Stewart's Sketches of the Highlands; Beatson's Naval and Military Memoirs, IV., V1; Gentleman's Magazine for 1806; Army Lists. — ED.

5th To protect commerce, diminish the price of goods to the Indian Nations, which is the only means to make them feel less regret for the English stores, and attach them to us more and more.

6th To secure the frontiers of the Colony.

7th To lessen his Majesty's expenses.

8th Finally, to replace this Colony on a footing capable of making the Colonists regret the desire many of them feel to return to France.

As most of these different objects, my Lord, [can] be discussed only as a consequence of the articles of a treaty of peace in which the respective limits will have been finally settled, I confine myself now to what relates to the recall of the land forces. Nothing would appear to me of more advantage to this Colony than to withdraw all the battalions from it as soon as peace is concluded; besides costing a great deal, they will always foster a spirit of division; their manner of waging war being accompanied with less hardship than that of the Colony, would insensibly be adopted; the introduction of baggage and provisions in the campaign proceeds from the officers of those troops; 'tis most pernicious to the fashion of bush fighting; is an obstacle to the change of camp from one moment to the other and thereby prevents frequent detachments.

Had I, my Lord, in the field as many independent troops of the Marine as land forces, New England would long feel the effects of it.

It would be essential, however, my Lord,

1st That in recalling the battalions, you would be pleased to procure the French soldiers facilities to remain in the Colony and to induce the King to issue an ordinance authorizing every soldier belonging to the troops of the Line to enter those of the Marine.

2nd That his Majesty should grant an absolute discharge and two years' pay to all of those soldiers who are married, or would marry and settle in the Colony.

3rd Should his Majesty at the peace reform his troops, let him have some sent to Canada as recruits to complete the companies and serve to form new ones.

4th Rather than be again under the necessity of sending back battalions to the Colony, 'twere better, I think, to make an augmentation of a certain number of companies of which that of soldiers would be more or less considerable in times of peace or war, proportionally to the quantity of troops his Majesty would wish to have in this country.

5th His Majesty might permit the officers belonging to the troops of the Line, who are married or will marry in Canada, to pass with the same rank, into the troops of the Marine, their seniority, however, only dating from the day they serve in this Colony.

6th I have the honor to represent to you that it would be unfortunate, should such favor extend to the Colonists, who have entered, successively, as lieutenants in the troops of the Line, in preference to the Colonial service; they would indeed have remained a long time Cadets before being able to be Ensign en second.

Articles five and six are so important, that if they did not remain, the officers of the Colony who have served with the greatest zeal, would see young men over them who often would have neither talents, nor experience; some of them even would never have dared to flatter themselves with becoming officers in the troops of the Marine.

'Twould be superfluous, my Lord, to offer you any reasons in support of the difference that exists in the defence to be expected from a troop which has the Colony for its resource, in which are its property, family and fortune, and that of a troop which feeling expatriated, has no other ambition than not to dishonor itself and to return to its family, caring very little about the injuries the enemy may inflict on the Colony, or even its total loss.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

Brigadier-General Forbes to Governor Denny.

[Pennsylvania Archives, VIII., 232.]

Fort Duquesne, or now Pittsburg, the 26 Nov<sup>r</sup>, 1758.

Sir :

I have the Pleasure and Honour of Acquainting you with the Signal Success of his Majesty's Troops over all his Enemys on the Ohio, by having obliged them to Burn and abandon their Fort Duquesne, which they effectuated upon the 24th Instant, And of which I took Possession with my little Army the next Day,—The Enemy having made their escape down the River, part in Boats and part by Land, to their Forts, and Settlements on the Mississippi being abandoned, or at least not seconded by their Friends, the Indians, whom we had previously engaged to act a neutral part, And who now seem all willing and ready to Embrace His Majesty's Most gracious Protection.

So give me leave to congratulate you upon this publick event of having totally expelled the French from this Fort and this prodigious tract of Country, and of having in a manner reconciled the various Tribes of Indians inhabiting it to His Majesty's Government.

I have not time to give you a detail of our proceedings and approaches towards the Enemy, or of the Hardships and Difficulties that we necessarily meet with ; all that will soon come out, but I assure you, after receiving the Ground & Fort, I have great reason to be most thankful for the part that the French have acted.

As the Conquest of this Country is of the greatest Consequence to the adjacent Provinces, by securing the Indians, our real Friends for their own Advantage, I have therefore sent for their Head People to come to me, when I think in few Words and few Days to make everything easy ; I shall then set out to kiss your Hands, if I have Strength left to carry me through the Journey.

I shall be obliged to leave about Two Hundred Men of your Provincial Troops to join a proportion of Virginia and Marylanders, in order to protect this Country during Winter, by which Time I hope the Provinces will be so sensible of the great Benefit of this new Acquisition, as to enable me to fix this noble, fine Country, to all Perpetuity, under the Dominion of Great Britain.

I beg the Barracks may be put in good repair, and proper Lodgings for the Officers, and that you will send me, with the greatest Dispatch, your Opinion how I am to dispose of the rest of your Provincial Troops for the ease and Convenience of the Province and Inhabitants,

You must also remember that Colonel Montgomery's Battalion of Thirteen Hundred Men, and Four Companies of Royal Americans, are, after so long and tedious a Campaign, to be taken care of in some Comfortable Winter Quarters.

I kiss all your Hands, and flatter myself that if I get to Philadelphia, under your Cares and good Companys, I shall yet run a good Chance of re-establishing a Health that I run the risque of ruining to give your Province all the Satisfaction in the Power of my weak Abilities.

I am Sir, with great Esteem and regard,

Your most Obedient and Hum<sup>e</sup> Servant,

JO. FORBES.

P. S. I must beg that you will recommend to your Assembly the building of a Block House and Saw Mill upon the Kisskaminities, near Loyal Hannon, as a thing of the utmost Consequence to their Province, if they have any intention of profiting by this Acquisition.

I send the New Levies to Carlisle, so beg you will lose no Time in sending up Mr. Young, the Commissary, to clear them.

Abstract of, and Ministerial Minute on, the Despatches from Canada.

The last letters written from Quebec by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, M. Bigot and the Marquis de Montcalm, are of the month of November. Although they agree in saying that this year's harvest has been good, they ask unanimously for reinforcements of troops, ships of war, provisions, ammunition and goods of all sorts.

One object of not less interest than that of reinforcements, is the manner the Chiefs of the Colony appear to be unanimous. In the commencement of this year, the Marquis de Vaudreuil and the Marquis de Montcalm lived on such indifferent terms, and so many remarks were made on the administration, that this estrangement had exercised an influence over all minds; the Marquis de Vaudreuil complained of it, and the Marquis de Montcalm also complained of the want of confidence on his part.

Things have been pushed so far, that both, equally aware of the evil their coolness might produce, became reconciled and made up friends again, but that was in appearance only.

Immediately after the affair at Carillon of the 8th of July, which has been reported to his Majesty, these two officers no longer agreed in opinion; the Marquis de Vaudreuil wished that detachments to the number of 12 or 15,000 men be sent in pursuit of the enemy; M. de Montcalm sent out only 15 and 30 men, and the campaign has finished without undertaking anything on that side.

In the month of November, when nothing more remained than to take up winter quarters, the Marquis de Vaudreuil has persuaded the Marquis de Montcalm to repair to Montreal to concert measures of attack or defence, to be employed against the English. Their conferences have run on three points: The defence by the lakes, that by land and that by the River St. Lawrence.

After having conversed about it, they have written their opinions, and differ so widely one from the other, that whatever be the zeal which animates them both, serious apprehensions cannot fail to be entertained from this diversity. Nothing better can be done than to place their respective Memoirs under his Majesty's eyes.

This state of things requiring his Majesty to decide, it appears necessary that he should be pleased to grant the Marquis de Montcalm his recall, which he has demanded in the letter also annexed hereunto, as his health and the debts he has contracted do not permit him to continue his service.

This recall appears so much the more indispensable as the Marquis de Montcalm, on becoming Lieutenant-General of his Majesty's armies, a grade, moreover, merited by his services, would feel some objection to serve in this new capacity under the orders of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who is only Governor Lieutenant-General; a title which does not possess, among military men, the same extent of power as that of Lieutenant-General of the armies.

Should his Majesty determine to recall him, it will be possible to replace him by giving Chevalier de Levy, who accompanied him to Canada, the command of the troops of the Colony, with the rank of Maréchal de Camp, which the Marquis de Montcalm held, and which the Marquis de Vaudreuil requests for him, although he does not know whether the Marquis de Montcalm is to remain in the Colony; Chevalier de Levis had been designed to succeed the Marquis de Montcalm in case of accident, he is generally beloved and esteemed by all the troops and Militia of the Colony, and the knowledge he has acquired since he is in service there, affords reason to think that a better selection could not be made.

In case his Majesty will approve of it, 'twill be proper to give him at the same time, the general command of the Colony, supposing the Marquis de Vaudreuil should happen to die, as his Majesty had granted it to the Marquis de Montcalm; and the provisions thereof will be sent to the Intendant in a sealed package, which will not be opened until the death of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, should it occur.

25th December, 1758. On mature reflection, this arrangement cannot take place, as M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm is necessary in the present conjuncture.

Colonel Montresor's Plan of the Campaign for the British forces in 1759.

Plan for the Operations of the Campaign for the year 1759, carried on from the Department of New-York, humbly submitted for Amendments.

That 9,500 men march as soon as the season will permit, to the Oneyda Station, or Stanwix fort, there to encamp until the provisions, stores and boats be arrived, in order to proceed on according to the following proposal:

That 6,500 from the above number do proceed to Oswego, with boats sufficient to carry 6,000 men, with 30 days' provision, who are to embark from thence. Four thousand for Cadaraqui, with two 12 pounders, four 6 pounders, one 8 inch howitzer, two royals, four cohorns, one Engineer, one 1st Lieutenant and one 2nd Lieutenant of artillery, two bombard<sup>rs</sup>, four gunners and 20 matrosses.

There to land in the part most convenient, and under cover from the place, according to the intelligence sent before to reconnoitre it; and if any works have been made to it since the last attack worth while to raise batteries against them, the same is to be done, but if otherwise, to assault it and secure what can be of service for carrying on this design, viz, provisions, stores, and particularly vessels of any kind. This done, and an arrangement made, then to embark again with the artillery, provisions, &c., and to proceed into the River St. Lawrence to La Gallette or Oswegatchie, distant about 45 miles, where, according to this project, they will meet with 3,000 men ordered to march from the abovementioned Camp, ten days after 6,500, who are to have with them one Engineer, one Lieut. of artillery, one bombardier, two gunners and eight matrosses with 6 or 8 cohorns, to have marched from the Carrying place through the woods to la Gallette distant between 80 or 90 miles, there being an Indian path often made use of by the enemy's parties to come to the Mohock river, and are seldom more than three days in performing it.

La Gallette is represented to be a small, weak fort, only as a security from the Indians, and cannot be of any strength. The settlements about it must be set fire to in the night of the arrival and destroyed, in order to occasion a terror, at the same time invest the fort, which, if not thought advisable, to attempt by a brusquée, or coup de main. Then to raise a battery as if for cannon was to be mounted, and from thence fire the cohorns in the night, whose reports may have the effect of a speedy surrender, and greatly facilitate the enterprise which may be effected before the Cadaraqui force comes up, as it must be immediately at their junction, being themselves attacked by land and water by a formidable and respectable body of troops.

These forces joined, they are to take post at La Gallette, which is so advantageously situated, both in regard to itself and to the command of the River St. Lawrence, for all vessels going from Montreal to the lakes, and which navigation from it to Cadaraqui, etc., is free and clear from rifts, whereas to Montreal is embarrassed with falls, rifts and islands (for which reason the French are blamed for making Cadaraqui their chief post), and is to us for the taking and securing it entirely, as it cuts off all communication from Montreal to the lakes, and assures us a part of the east side of the river, which is but thinly settled, until the neighborhood of La Prairie, opposite to Montreal, distant nearly 120 miles, and from whence ('tis said is a road), as the river to La Gallette has so bad a navigation. This Post being taken, a garrison left, to be supplied with provisions from Oswego, as it must be the depot for the time, the remainder of the army to continue their march always on the east side of the river, securing all vessels and provisions they can gather from the several settlements, and proceed until they find a proper place to cross and land on the Island of Montreal.

The remaining 2,500 to be disposed of as follows: Five hundred to keep the post and dépôt at Oswego, and the two thousand who are to embark at the same time as the 4,000 did, and to shape their course for Niagara with one Engineer, one Lieu<sup>t</sup> of artillery, 2 bombardiers, 4 gunners, 12 matrosses, with two 12-pounders, 2 six-pounders, one 8-inch howitzer, 2 royals, 4 cohorns. This body is to land on the nearest and safest landing place to the fort, with summons to surrender, letting them know that all their communications are entirely cut off from the River St Lawrence. That the English are in actual possession of La Gallette and marching their army towards Montreal, which, if not agreed to on the spot, then to be attacked vigorously, which must be on great disadvantages on the enemy's side, who will not dare to hold out, considering the situation they must be in after the loss of Fort Duquesne.

This place, when taken, must be secured, provided and strengthened, in order to keep a garrison there for preserving the thoroughfare and communications from the upper lakes to the lower, and to the vast country through which the Ohio and Mississippi run through. 'Tis been always a noted Indian mart and trading place.

That 3,000 men march to the fort at N° 4 and there to encamp until such time they are provided with proper tools, stores and provisions, and then to proceed for Otter creek, below the Falls, there to build bateaux and rafts sufficient when required to cross Lake Champlain, and, if possible, to take post on one of the points of land that forms the opening of the Otter creek, and there to remain until orders shall be given them to cross over.

When this last number are ready prepared to cross over Lake Champlain, the corps of troops, &c., at Lake George must embark and move down towards Tierandoraga, at the same time the Otter Creek forces must cross the lake and take post in the communication or road to Crown Point, lying below it. In order to stop all convoys of stores, provisions or reinforcements coming to the assistance of Crown P<sup>t</sup>, etc., whose garrison, seldom exceeding 300 men, will keep close within. The body of the enemy's troops at the lines and Tierandoraga, seeing the army in motion on Lake George, and another crossing over Lake Champlain, will be at a loss how to act. For if they should offer to unfurnish the lines and fort, the Lake George army pushes on their design, and with the conquest of that part the rest must fall, as their army and forts are invested at one time and between two fires. And if the enemy should not leave their intrenchment, but resolve to defend it, then the said 7,000 men must attack their intrenchment with a vigorous artillery with ricochet fire and shells, driving them from it, during which time the 3,000 men, supposed on the same side of the lake as the forts and lines, are to advance slowly on the rear of the enemy. In which situation no troops in the enemy's position can remain long, but naturally will attempt to force through the weakest part and abandon the intrenchment, which must be passed with speed to save the 3,000 men from being defeated.

N. B.

Orders must be given to the 3,000 men to destroy all the enemy's vessels and boats on the lake to prevent their retreat.

Reasons for the foregoing Scheme.

1st By attacking the enemy at La Galette it not only prevents assisting Cadaraqui, but also furnishes us with an advantageous post, which can be kept up with ease by securing this side of the river and the navigation of it, rendering Cadaraqui of no use. For the like reason, (it may be said), that Niagara is also in the same condition by the communication being stopped. But as it is a post which must always be kept up for the reasons given before, besides it receiving some supplies from other parts than from the River St. Lawrence, it is extremely necessary to secure it, as it will well answer the expense made on it.

2<sup>d</sup> By the attack of La Galette the army may find some assistance of provisions, etc., for advancing further in the country, where they can meet with no resistance, as no succors can be sent from Montreal or the posts in that neighborhood, by being kept in echée by the armies on Lake Champlain and Lake George, who are watching every minute the present opportunity to force and penetrate that way.

3<sup>d</sup> By making an effort on Lake Champlain with boats, etc., and taking Posts on one of the points where Otter Creek runs into the lake, it will stop the enemy's sending any reinforcements to Tierandoraga, not only for fear of being intercepted, but by another greater reason, which is, that as they must naturally imagine, the impression is the most easiest made where the resistance is the least, and as by the supposition our forces are already 50 miles in their country and in the road to their second Capital, which they must either leave open to the army on the river, or unfurnish their intrenchments before Tierandoraga, or let the Otter Creek army go quietly on with their design, which is to get between the forts and their communication, or suffer the 7,000 men at Lake George, who are to be ready at a minute's warning with all their necessaries proper for besieging or carrying war in an Enemy's country, for to go up the lake and land, taking possession of their forts as far as La Prairie, opposite to Montreal, which is the point of union of this project, and for the whole to join except those of Niagara.

N. B. That all the boats that are to take in troops or artillery should be numbered and registered for what service they are to be employed in, that the distribution of them may be detailed in such a manner that day or night it might be executed without confusion; as the effect of this part of the enterprise depends greatly on the celerity of its motion, which is to take place according to that of the enemy's. For which reason proper scouts are to be kept continually going between each of these separate bodies, as their action depends on the true and certain intelligence of their several manœuvres.

This plan or project of operations is founded only on one principle, which is to keep the enemy in suspense and state of uncertainty in being attacked at each extremity of its second Capital by two bodies, subdivided in two or more, mutually assisting each other, preventing them from resolving whether to send supplies or reinforcements to either of them, or watch the defence of Montreal, extremely weak of itself, and hardly deserves the name of a walled town.

Therefore let the enemy act against what part they think proper, the rest in all probability will succeed, and if any one of them has the advantage, the whole will soon reap the benefit, from the position of the several attacks and the situation of the country in which they are made in.

Lt. Col. Chief Engineer for the Department of N. Y.

New-York, December 29th, 1758.

French Campaigns in North America, 1754-1758.

[By Chevalier DE MONTREUIL.]

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

The English having, in 1754, built Fort Necessity, twenty-five leagues from Fort Duquesne, M. dejumonville was detached with 40 men to go and summon the garrison to retire. He was killed with seven Canadians, and the remainder of his detachment made prisoners of war. On this intelligence, Captain de Villiers, of the troops of the Marine, was ordered to conduct 700 men and avenge his brother's death; he reduced said fort on the 3rd July by capitulation, and made the garrison prisoners of war.

In the year 1755, the King of France, being informed that several regiments had been sent from Old to New England, dispatched to Cahada the second battalions of La Reine, Artois, Bourgogne, Languedoc, Guienne and Bearn, under the orders of Baron de Dieskaw, to whom Colonel Chev. de Rostain was appointed Second, and Chev. de Montreuil Major-General.

The regiments of Artois and Bourgogne landed at Louisbourg, and the four others at Quebec in the course of June.

The ships l'Alcide and le Lis, with four companies of the regiment of La Reine and four of the regiment of Languedoc on board, were taken on Green Bank. Chev. de Rostain was killed by a cannon shot in the former vessel.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General, who arrived from France at the same time as the battalions, had advice of the capture of the French fort, called Beausejour, in Acadia; no longer doubting the pretensions of the English on Canada, he determined to undertake the siege of Fort Chouaguen, situate on Lake Ontario. He dispatched, in the course of July, the battalions for Fort Frontenac, whither he sent artillery, munitions of war and provisions. Having learned, in the meantime, that the enemy was erecting a new post on the River of Orange, 7 leagues from Lake St. Sacrament, he countermanded the battalions of La Reine and Languedoc, which he sent to Fort St. Frederic, situate on Lake Champlain, where he concentrated, at the end of August, a corps of three thousand men, the command whereof he gave to Baron de Dieskaw, who, on his arrival, detached some small parties to observe the enemy's movements, who reported to him that they had a considerable camp near the house of a Frenchman named Lidius, situate on the River of Orange, where they were constructing a fort and several roads, to come to Lake St. Sacramento and the Bay of the Grand Marais to attack the frontier. On this report, he proceeded on the 2nd 7<sup>ber</sup> to encamp at Carillon, in order to stop the enemy at that point, where they were obliged to pass. On the same day, he learned from a prisoner that the enemy had retired to Orange, and left 500 men to finish the fort.

On this news, which turned out to be false, Baron de Dieskaw, not having sufficient provisions to take his army thither, marched on the 4th of 7<sup>ber</sup>, at the head of 1,500 men, to wit, 200 troops of the Line, 700 Canadians and 600 Indians. The remainder of the troops encamped at the Falls of Lake St. Sacramento and at the Two Rocks, situate at the entrance of the Grand Marais, to secure the Baron de Dieskaw's retreat, and prevent the enemy entering by Lake St. Sacramento.

Baron de Dieskaw, after four days' march, learned, within half a league from Fort Lidius, that there was a camp of 4,000 men near Lake St. Sacramento, distant six leagues from him, and having resolved, on the advice of the Indians, to go and attack it, he marched, at day-break, on the 5th, and encountered a force of one thousand men within half a league of their camp, whom he successfully fought; having arrived there at the same time as the detachment, he ordered an immediate attack, so as not to afford time to the enemy to recognize each other, but the greatest part of the Canadians and Indians, being fatigued after the first shock, rested themselves, and the few that remained courageously formed the attack on the left within 1 200 paces of that on the right, where the land troops distinguished themselves. Baron de Dieskaw and Chevalier de Montreuil went to post themselves in the centre of these two attacks, within a short musket shot of the enemy, who perceived them and fired several volleys of musketry at them, when Baron de Dieskaw was wounded by two shots, one of which was very dangerous. Chevalier de Montreuil pressed him to retire after receiving a slight wound in the leg, but he persisted in remaining in the same place, saying he could not do it, and an instant afterwards, received a ball in both hips; Chevalier de Montreuil then called to his aid two Canadians whom he perceived at a certain distance, and who came to him; one of them, on arriving, wished to carry the General on his back; Baron de Dieskaw refused; the other Canadian, kneeling at his feet, was killed outright, and fell on his legs. Chevalier de Montreuil seeing Baron de Dieskaw was unwilling to allow himself to be removed, asked what course he wished adopted? Who ordered him to proceed to the right where the troops of the line were fighting, and having answered that he should not abandon him, Baron de Dieskaw ordered him in the King's name to retire. Chev. de Montreuil thought it his duty to execute his orders, so as to send him some relief and remedy the disorder which prevailed among the detachment. Arriving at the right, he saw the troops of the Line, of whom there were remaining about one hundred soldiers, in the act of retiring; he ran and stopped them within 500 paces of the camp; made them take up an advantageous position, which so checked the enemy that they dare not embarrass the remainder of the troops who were retreating. Chev. de Montreuil, sure of being made prisoner of war, should he return to the place where he had left Baron de Dieskaw, remained half an hour in presence of the enemy, expecting that the detachment would return, but having learned on the contrary, that it was continuing its march, decided on retiring, and did not overtake until nightfall two hundred Canadians or Indians, led by Captain St. Luc de la Corne, of the troops of the Marine, with whom he arrived next evening at 8 o'clock, at the Bay of the Grand Marais, where the bateaux had been left and the rest of the detachment had arrived at 10 o'clock in the morning.

10th In the morning, Chev. de Montreuil had the wounded embarked to the number of one hundred, whom he sent to Montreal, and started in the afternoon at the head of his detachment to rejoin the camp at the Two Rocks. The loss of the enemy amounted to 500 men, killed or wounded, and that of the French, Canadians and Indians to 160. Baron de Dieskau was made prisoner of war; Chev. de Montreuil received a musket ball in the left arm and several in his coat.

11th He proceeded to report this affair to the Marquis de Vaudreuil who was at Montreal, whence he returned to the army encamped at Fort St. Frederic with M. de Lotbinière, Engineer of the Colony, with orders to build a fort at Carillon, where the army encamped on the 15th of October, and labored with all possible diligence, so that on the 15th of November, when it retired, the fort was safe from a coup de main, and capable of lodging a garrison of 200 men, which had been left there.

The battalions of Guienne and Bearn encamped during the campaign, before Frontenac, where they threw up some intrenchments. That of Guienne proceeded to Niagara at the close of the summer and returned to Montreal on the 5th of December.

On the 9th of July, one thousand Canadians or Indians, under the command of Captain de Beaujeu of the troops of the Marine, defeated within three leagues of Fort Duquesne, fifteen hundred English commanded by General Bradoc, one thousand of whom were killed or wounded, their artillery and munitions of war, which remained on the field of battle, were conveyed to Fort Duquesne. M. de Beaujeu fell in that action, in which thirty Canadians or Indians were killed or wounded.

Campaign of 1756.

The new preparations the English have made to invade Canada, notwithstanding the ill success of their expedition last year, have been as public in Europe as in America. They were expected, and independent of the arrangements for defence made in this Colony, the King has sent thither the battalions of La Sarre and Royal Rousillon, under the Marquis de Montcalm's orders, with reinforcements and a large quantity of ammunition and provisions.

Immediately on the termination of last year's campaign, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor and Lieutenant-General of New France, made arrangements to harass continually the English in their own Colonies. He kept in the field throughout the entire winter, detachments of Canadians, soldiers and Indians, which made incursions on all sides. The Indians have killed a great many people; a considerable number of cattle have been carried off; a great many houses and stores burned; the country has been abandoned in several parts of the frontiers of the English Colonies, and all these movements have been effectual not only in augmenting the discontent which the injustice of their Governors' plan had created among them, but also in giving rise to embarrassments and difficulties which have prevented the execution of those plans in the spring. The Marquis de Vaudreuil did not stop here; in adopting all the other precautions which appeared to him practicable to provide for the security of all the frontiers of Canada, he has formed the project of attacking the English themselves in the establishment at Chouaguen, on Lake Ontario.

They fortified themselves there shortly after, so that they had erected three forts, to wit, Fort Chouaguen, situate on the left bank of the river, Fort Ontario, on the right of the river, and Fort George, 300 toises beyond that of Chouaguen, on a hill overlooking it.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil was informed in the beginning of the winter that the enemy was collecting troops with considerable provisions, munitions of all sorts, in the forts at Chouaguen, in order to attack Forts Niagara and Frontenac in the spring. He first dispatched a detachment of troops, Canadians and Indians, under the command of Sieur de Lévis,<sup>1</sup> to attack a fort which was the principal entrepôt of those supplies. That fort was carried by assault in the month of March, and destroyed, with all the buildings dependent thereon, and all the ammunition found there was removed, burnt or thrown into the river.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil organized another detachment of 700 men, under the orders of Captain de Villiers, of the Colony, to intercept the transports which were to be formed on the Chouaguen river, and the detachment did, in fact, destroy there, in the forepart of July, a fleet of about two hundred craft, in which more than 500 men were killed or taken prisoners.

The success of these expeditions confirmed the Marquis de Vaudreuil in his project against Chouaguen, and, under pretence of succors necessary for the particular defence of Forts Niagara and Frontenac, he early concentrated troops there, and sent artillery, warlike stores and provisions thither; reinforced Sieur de Villiers' detachment on the River Chouaguen, and, after having been assured of the actual situation of the English post and of the junction of the troops destined for the expedition against Chouaguen and of everything necessary for its execution, he recalled the Marquis de Montcalm from the Lake Champlain frontier, where he had sent him as the theatre of the most interesting operations, and immediately dispatched him to Fort Frontenac, with the orders and instructions necessary for the Chouaguen expedition, of which he was to have charge. The Marquis de Montcalm, being desirous to conceal his march from the enemy, set out alone from Carillon and ordered Chev. de Montreuil, the Major-General, to remain with the division commanded by Chev. de Lévis, Brigadier of the King's armies, who contributed essentially to the success of the Chouaguen expedition, by the diversion he caused about Lake St. Sacrament.

29th July. On the Marquis de Montcalm's arrival at Frontenac, he found all assembled except Sieur de Villiers' detachment, which the Marquis de Vaudreuil had reinforced, and of which Sieur Rigaud de Vaudreuil had assumed the command. This detachment, having already gone even to the River Chouaguen, [repaired] to the Bay of Niaouré, where the Marquis de Vaudreuil had marked the general rendezvous. The troops destined for the expedition, were composed of about three thousand men, including the detachment commanded by Sieur Rigaud, which was to serve as the van-guard.

The Marquis de Montcalm lost not a moment in preparing to leave Fort Frontenac, after having made the necessary dispositions to secure the retreat, in case superior forces rendered that inevitable. He issued orders to two armed sloops on Lake Ontario, one of 12 and the other of 16 guns, to cruize on the route to Chouaguen, and established a chain of Canadian and Indian scouts on the road from that place to the town of Albany, to intercept expresses.<sup>1</sup> As early as the 4th of August, he embarked with the first division of his troops, composed of the battalion of La Sarre and that of Guienne, with 4 pieces of cannon, and on the 6th arrived at the Bay of Niaouré, where, on the 8th, arrived the second division, composed of the battalion of Béarn, the Militia and bateaux loaded with the artillery and provisions.

On the same day the Marquis de Montcalm dispatched the van-guard commanded by M. Rigaud to advance within three leagues of Chouaguen, to a cove called L'anse aux cabannes.

10th The first division being arrived at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, the van-guard repaired, four hours after, by land and across the woods, to another cove, situate within half a league of Chouaguen, to cover the landing of the artillery and troops. The first division reached that cove at midnight. The Marquis de Montcalm succeeded in getting a battery erected at once, on Lake Ontario, and the troops passed the night in bivouack at the head of the bateaux.

On the 11th, at day-break, the Canadians and Indians advanced to within a quarter of a league of, and invested Fort Ontario, situated, as we have stated, on the right bank of the River Chouaguen.<sup>2</sup> Sieur Decomble, who had been sent at 3 o'clock in the morning to make arrangements for this siege, and to determine the part against which immediate operations were to be directed, was killed, returning from his reconnoissance, by one of our Indians who escorted him, and mistook him in the dark for an Englishman. Sieur Desandrouins, the surviving Engineer, ran a road through the woods, partly through swamps explored the evening before, for the purpose of conducting the artillery across. This road, commenced at 11 o'clock in the morning, was finished at night, and thoroughly completed next morning. The camp was established at the same time, the right resting on Lake Ontario, covered by the battery erected on the preceding evening, and that protected our bateaux from attack; the left, on an impassable swamp.

The precaution taken by the French to march only at night and to enter rivers when halting by which they were concealed, had till then hid [their approach] from the enemy, to whom it was announced only that same day by the Indians who went even to the foot of the fort to fire. Three armed sloops which sailed at noon from the River Chouaguen came cruising in front of the camp, discharged some pieces of artillery, but the fire from the battery forced them to sheer off. Since then, they cruised only in the offing.

On the 12th at day-break, the battalion of Béarn arrived with the bateaux of artillery and provisions. These bateaux were forthwith unloaded in presence of the English barks which were cruising in front of the camp. The battery on the beach was increased—the park of artillery and the depot of provisions established, and Sieur Pouchot, captain of the Regiment of Béarn, who had successfully begun a fortification at Niagara, received orders to act as Engineer during the siege. Arrangements were made to open trenches that very night; Sieur de Bourlemaque superintended them. Six pickets of workmen, fifty men each, were under orders for that night; two companies of grenadiers and three pickets to support them.

Notwithstanding the greatest possible diligence, the work at this trench could not be begun until midnight. It was rather a parallel of about 100 toises, the front opened at 90 toises from the ditch of the fort through ground embarrassed by obstructions and stumps of trees. This parallel finished at five o'clock in the morning, was completed by the day laborers who cut the lines of communication and commenced erecting batteries. The enemy's fire, which had been very brisk since the break of day, ceased at about eleven o'clock at night, and it was perceived that the garrison evacuated Fort Ontario and passed over to that of Chouaguen at the opposite side of the river. They abandoned, in retiring, 8 pieces of cannon and four mortars. The fort having been immediately occupied by the grenadiers of the trench, the workmen were commanded to continue the communication of the parallel to the river side where at nightfall was commenced a large battery placed so as to batter Fort Chouaguen, the road from that fort to Fort George, and take the intrenched camp in the rear. Twenty pieces of cannon were conveyed, during the night, in men's arms, a labor which occupied the whole army with the exception of the picquets and the camp guard.

<sup>1</sup>On the 14th, at day-light, the Marquis de Montcalm ordered Sieur de Rigaud to ford the river to the other side with the Canadians and Indians, to occupy the woods and harass the communication with Fort George where the enemy appeared making considerable preparations. M. de Rigaud executed that order at once; although there was a great deal of water in that river, and the current was very rapid, he plunged in and crossed over with the Canadians and Indians, some swimming, others in the water up to the waist or neck, and reached his destination without the enemy's fire being able to stop a single Canadian or Indian.

At 9 o'clock the besiegers had 9 pieces of cannon ready for action, and although the fire of the besieged had been, up to that time, superior, they hoisted the White flag at ten o'clock. Sieur de Rigaud sent back to the Marquis de Montcalm two officers whom the Commandant of the fort delegated to him to demand a capitulation, which was immediately drawn up, and the conditions were, that the garrison should be prisoners of war, and that the French troops should enter into immediate possession of the forts. It has been already stated that they occupied that of Ontario on the preceding evening. Sieur de Bourlemaque, who was named Commandant of Forts Georges and Chouaguen, took possession of them, with two companies of grenadiers and the pickets of the trenches; he was instructed to demolish all the forts, and to remove the artillery and warlike stores and provisions which happened to be there.

The celerity of our operations, in a soil which they considered impracticable, the erection of our batteries completed with so much rapidity, the idea these works gave them of the number of the French troops, the movement of the corps detached from the other side of the river, the dread of the Indians, the death of Colonel Mercer, Commandant of Chouaguen, who was killed at eight o'clock in the morning, and, more than all yet, Sieur de Rigaud's bold manœuvre and the dread of the Canadians and Indians, who were already firing at the fort, doubtless determined the besieged not to make a longer defence. They have lost 152 men, including some soldiers killed by the Indians whilst endeavoring to escape through the woods. The number of the prisoners has exceeded 1,600, of whom 80 are officers. Seven vessels of war have also been taken, one of which carries 18 guns, one 14, one 10, one 8 and the other three are armed with swivels; these are exclusive of 200 transports, and the officers and crews of these vessels have been included in the capitulation of the garrison, which was composed of Shirley's and Pepperell's two regiments of Regulars, and Schuyler's regiment of Militia. The artillery taken consists of 55 guns, 14 mortars, 5 howitzers and 47 swivels, which have been removed with a large quantity of bullets, shells, balls and powder, and a considerable pile of provisions.

The Marquis de Montcalm has lost only three<sup>1</sup> men, viz: one Canadian, one soldier and one gunner, exclusive of Sieur Decombles, and there were in the different corps of troops under his orders about twenty wounded, all slightly. Sieur de Bourlamaque, Captains de Palmarol of the Grenadiers, and du Parquet of the regiment of La Sarre, are of this number.

On the 21st of the same month, all the forts having been demolished, the transportation of the prisoners, artillery and provisions having been completed, the Marquis de Montcalm reëmbarked with his troops, and repaired in three divisions to the Bay of Niaouré, whence the different corps will go to the destinations respectively indicated to them. The Marquis de Vaudreuil has caused the four colors of the Shirley's and Pepperell's regiments of Regulars, and that of Schuyler's Militia to be deposited with the usual ceremonies in the churches of Quebec and Three Rivers.

The Marquis de Montcalm, on his return to Montreal, set out to rejoin the army at Carillon and terminated the campaign there, where nothing of interest transpired.

Campaign of 1757.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil having formed a plan of offence toward Lake St. Sacrament, in order to secure Forts Carillon and St. Frederic, sent in the month of March a force of 1,500 men, Frenchmen, Canadians and Indians, under the orders of M. de Rigaud, Governor of Three Rivers, to burn the sloops, bateaux and sheds lying under the guns of Fort George, called by the English, William Henry, situate at the head of Lake St. Sacrament, six leagues from Fort Lidiu, called Fort Edward.

This expedition having had all the success possible, M. de Vaudreuil resolved on opening the Campaign with the siege of Fort George, and in consequence ordered betimes the necessary preparations.

The delay of the ships and the want of provisions rendered that operation very doubtful; the first ships which arrived at Quebec at the end of June and in the course of July, not having brought sufficient to justify the undertaking of the siege of Fort George, M. de Vaudreuil commissioned Sieur Marsel, inspector of the King's stores, to make a strict enquiry as to the amount of provisions the farmers may have in their possession. Every one of them, full of zeal for his country, cut himself down of his own accord to a very small modicum for his support until the harvest, and the surplus supplied what was wanting for the siege. M. de Vaudreuil, after having made sure of provisions, issued orders to assemble the troops in the course of July at the Little Carrying place of Lake St. Sacrament, which is half a league long, and where a corps of Canadians was stationed since the month of May, under the orders of Captain Gaspé of the Colony. The army being assembled there at the time appointed, was occupied, from the date of its arrival, in the transportation of the artillery, bateaux, ammunition and provisions.

27th July. The Marquis de Montcalm called the chiefs of the Indian Nations together, and presented them, in the King's name, a belt of 6,000 beads of Wampum, to bind all the Nations to each other and to him, in order that they might not separate from each other nor quit him until the close of the expedition.

30th Everything being ready, Chev. de Levis marched by land with 2,800 Frenchmen, Canadians or Indians to the Bay of Ganaouské, on the left side of Lake St. Sacrament, within four leagues of Fort George. He had orders to wait there for M. de Montcalm who was to embark on the 1st of August with 4,800 men, and be followed by the entire artillery.

2nd August. These two divisions having formed a junction at three o'clock in the morning, set out again in the course of the day. Chev. de Levis commenced his march at ten o'clock and went to within a league and a half of Fort George. M. de Montcalm set out at noon and on the

3rd Arrived at five o'clock in the morning, with his troops and artillery at the place of landing reconnoitred by M. de Levis. On arriving, he was informed by two prisoners that the enemy being made aware of our movement, was to march out of Fort George at the firing of a signal gun to meet us; he merely made the troops land and prepared to march against the enemy on hearing the first gun.

In fact, several were discharged at Fort George at 7 o'clock in the morning. M. de Montcalm commenced his march immediately at the head of his army and left 500 men under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel de Privat of the regiment of Languedoc, to guard the bateaux and artillery, Chev. de Levis forming the van-guard with a part of the Canadians, all the Indians and the same detachment he had had previously under his orders, approached unopposed within a gun shot of the place, and posted himself on the Fort Lidius road to stop all relief. M. de Montcalm proceeded to the van-guard at one o'clock in the afternoon and having perceived with Chev. de Levis that 'twas impossible, without compromising the King's troops, to assault an intrenchment which communicated with Fort George, came to the conclusion to have the Commandant summoned, who gave him for answer that the troops of the garrison were resolved to defend themselves to the death.

M. de Montcalm ordered the necessary preparations for the siege; the trench was opened during the night of the 4th and 5th of August, near the lake, 350 toises from the place. The Regulars and Marine troops were encamped at a short distance from the tail of the trench, and had their left resting on Lake St. Sacrament and their right on the forest. The Canadians and Indians commanded by M. Rigaud, M. de Vaudreuil's brother, under Chev. de Levis, formed a camp apart, some distance on the right of the Regulars and Marine troops, in order to be able to repair promptly to Fort Lydius, on the first notice that would be received of the enemy marching to the relief of Fort George. Every time Chev. de Levis would march forward, on occasion of some alarms, M. de Montcalm and the Major-General would follow close at the head of the Brigade of la Reine, composed of three battalions, one of which was formed of the soldiers of the Marine; the Brigades of La Sarre and Royal Roussillon, of two battalions each, remained in the camp under Colonel de Bourlamaque's orders, to defend the ditch in case of a sortie.

5th The Indians intercepted a letter from General Web, written at Fort Lidius, dated midnight the 4th. He informed the Commandant of that place that he would advance to fight the French army immediately after the arrival of the Provincial Militia, whom he had ordered to join him forthwith; that, nevertheless, should the Militia unfortunately arrive too late, the Commandant should look to obtaining the best conditions possible; he added, that the situation of Fort Lidius did not permit him to detach any of his troops. 'Twas known, nevertheless, that this General had command of a camp of four thousand men.

6th We had eight pieces of cannon and one mortar in battery, which fired with much success.

7th There was a second battery of 8 guns, one mortar and two howitzers which commenced firing at eight o'clock in the morning. After the first volley, M. de Montcalm ordered a red flag to be hoisted and sent General Web's letter to the Commandant of the place, who, after having thanked him for it in writing, was waiting for the first shot from our side before he would open his fire.

Our workmen were occupied during the night of the 7th @ 5th in constructing a road, with a quantity of fascines, across a swamp 30 toises wide, which was protected by a hill from the enemy's fire.

The next night's works were pushed to within about sixty toises of the fort.

9th At eight o'clock in the morning the Commandant of the place ordered a white flag to be hoisted and demanded a capitulation, to which M. de Montcalm consented on the following conditions:

I. That the troops of the garrison and intrenched camp shall march out with their baggage and the honors of war.

II. That they shall proceed, on the next morning, to Fort Lidius, and in order to be protected from the Indians, they shall be escorted by a detachment of our troops and the principal officers and Interpreters attached to the Indians.

III. That these troops shall not serve for 18 months against either his Majesty or his allies.

IV. That all the French, Canadian or Indian prisoners taken on land in North America since the commencement of the war, shall be brought in to the French posts within the space of three months.

The capitulation having been approved by the Indian chiefs, assembled for that purpose, was signed at eleven o'clock after which Chevalier de Montreuil, Major-General, proceeded at once to the fort and intrenchment, by order of the Marquis de Montcalm, to take a list of the troops, and secure the provisions and munitions of war. The garrison was immediately relieved by the grenadiers and the pickets of the trenches were marched to the intrenchment where a guard of our troops was stationed. Chevalier de Montreuil proceeded to execute the orders he had received from the Marquis de Montcalm, and when all was regulated, the Commandant asked to set out with his men at night-fall to avoid the Indians and demanded several officers of the Colony, conversant with their language, to accompany him to protect himself and his men from any insult on the part of the Indians.

The officers, having learned that the greater part of the Indians were lying in ambush on the Lidius road, where they should necessarily pass, advised the Commandant to postpone his departure until day-break.

Next morning the English were attacked on their retreat by the Indians who plundered the greater part of their baggage, took about 600 men whom they carried to the camp and killed about thirty.

The Marquis de Montcalm, Chevalier de Levis, M. de Bourlamaque, Chevalier de Montreuil and several officers, recovered about three hundred from the Indians and had them placed for safety in the fort. The Marquis de Vaudreuil has ransomed, at Montreal, the English who could not be got out of the hands of the Indians. The former have been sent from Fort George to Fort Lidius; the others from Quebec to Halifax, by sea.

The loss of the French, Canadians and Indians during the expedition amounted to 13 men killed and 40 wounded; that of the enemy to 41 killed and 71 wounded.

The French army, including Indians, was composed of 7,626 men, and the troops of the garrison and intrenchments of 2,372. Our artillery consisted of 31 guns, two mortars, three howitzers, 10 grenade mortars, 70 thousand weight of powder, shot and shell in proportion.

In the fort and intrenchment were found 3,000 barrels of flour or pork, 23 guns, 8 of which were brass, iron howitzers, mortars, 17 swivels, 35,835 pounds of powder, 2,522 shot, 545 shell, 1,400 balls, 1 grenade chest, 6 chests of artificial fireworks and grapeshot of different calibres.

The reduction of this fort has been preceded by the defeat of 300 English, taken or killed on Lake St. Sacrament, the 24th of July, by 400 Indians or Canadians, under the orders of Lieutenant Corbière of the Colony, without losing a man.

16th Fort George being entirely destroyed, our artillery, that of the enemy and all the munitions of war and provisions having been removed to the Little Carrying place of Lake St. Sacrament, the army reëmbarked and arrived there on the same day.

M. de Montcalm, not having sufficient bateaux to accommodate all his army, sent the battalions of Royal Rousillon and Béarn to one of the islands of Lake St. Sacrament to encamp until the return of the bateaux which he sent for them the day after his arrival.

17th The Canadians were sent home to save the harvest; the Regular and Marine troops remained in camp at the Little Carrying place to transport artillery, bateaux, munitions of war and provisions, after which they have been dispersed, to work at the fortifications of Forts Carillon and St. John.

Campaign of 1758.

The Marquis de Montcalm having arrived on the 30th of June at Carillon, where the eight battalions were encamped,

2nd July. Seven of them were sent to encamp at the Carrying place and Falls, and the Marquis joined them on the 3rd.

3rd M. de Bourlamaque, commanding the battalions of La Reine, Guienne and Béarn, encamped at the head of the Carrying place, learned from scouts that about sixty bateaux were on Lake St. Sacrament. He immediately detached three hundred and fifty men, under the orders of Captain Trepesec, of the Béarn regiment, to go by land to observe the route they should take.

6th In the morning the Marquis de Montcalm, who was encamped at the tail of the Carrying place with the Royal Rousillon battalions and the first Béarn, had advice that the lake was covered with bateaux within three leagues of the Carrying place. He immediately sent orders to M. de Bourlamaque to fall back, on whose arrival he joined to the five battalions those of La Sarre and Languedoc, which were encamped on the left bank of the lake falls.

About two o'clock in the morning a great fire of musketry was heard near the Portage, an eighth of a league beyond the Falls; it proceeded from M. de Trepesec's detachment, which had been surrounded on endeavoring to return to its camp; about one hundred of them escaped, 144 were taken and the balance remained on the field of battle. Colonel d'How, who commanded the English detachment, was killed in this encounter.

At night the Marquis de Montcalm retired under Fort Carillon, where he bivouacked through the night with his troops.

7th In the morning he hastily intrenched himself on the heights of Carillon, where he had abatis formed in advance; this labor was not interrupted during that entire day.

8th At day-break, the troops put themselves under arms behind their intrenchments, constructed of timber, piece above piece. The Marquis de Montcalm sent volunteers out to observe the enemy, and ordered each battalion to render the intrenchment it occupied as complete as possible, and to keep its arms at its side, so as not to be surprised.

The enemy did not delay their appearance; they deployed in four columns at one o'clock in the afternoon. Our main guards and grenadier companies, whilst firing, retired in regular order behind the intrenchments. Thereupon, all the troops took their posts, and the soldiers who happened to be in the fort at Carillon, ran to the intrenchments at the signal of the gun.

The second battalion of Berri had orders to remain in the fort to deliver and to convey all the ammunition necessary for defending the intrenchments. The enemy opened their attack by a most brisk fire of msketry and immediately advanced to fight with the cold steel, but our fire was so well sustained and directed, that it was impossible for them to approach nearer than 15 or 20 paces. In this way the fight continued until four o'clock, the enemy constantly bringing fresh troops against us, and from four o'clock until seven, they kept up a fire at a greater distance. They finally retreated after a considerable loss.

Waited until next morning to visit the field of battle; the Marquis de Montcalm did not give orders to do so, until he was assured that the enemy thought no longer of returning and were hastily embarking to go home. About 1,200 men were buried; the number of wounded carried off has been about 3,000. We have had 14 officers killed and 20 wounded in this action; 92 soldiers or Canadians killed and 248 wounded.

The enemy's army was composed of 15 @ 16 thousand men; of these seven thousand were Regulars. Our's was 3,000 Regulars and 500 Canadians. This brilliant day may be said to have saved the Colony.

The enemy, on arriving at Fort George, detached a body of troops on an expedition against Fort Frontenac, which they reduced on the 26th August, and after demolishing it, and burning the sloops, except two which they employed, returned to Choueguen. The garrison was sent prisoners of war to Montreal, and exchanged for the same number of men that we had in the Colony.

25th August. The English reduced Louisbourg and made the garrison prisoners of war.

14 September. A force of 800 English was defeated by a detachment of Canadians and Indians, within sight of Fort Duquesne which they were coming to reconnoitre, thereby checking the march of an army of 6,000 men, who were on their way under General Forbs to besiege it.

Captain de Ligneris, of the Marine troops, who commanded at that fort, having had orders to burn and to remove the artillery, warlike stores and provisions on the approach of the enemy, executed those instructions in the month of October, on learning that they were within at most, two days march of him, and retired to Fort Marchault. The enemy contented themselves with building a small fort enclosed with palisades on the River Malengueulée, a short distance from Fort Duquesne.

Nothing of interest transpired the following winter.

*M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Massiac.*Montreal, 25th 9<sup>bre</sup>, 1759.<sup>1</sup>

My Lord,

I learn this moment the arrival at Quebec of the schooner La Nanette and receive the letter you did me the honor to write me on the 24th June last. I hasten to answer it so as not to delay that schooner, which M. Bigot is getting ready to sail as soon as the courier returns.

I am, my Lord, extremely sensible of your goodness in inhancing to the King the advantages gained by the different detachments which I have kept in the field during the winter; the assurance you give me of the satisfaction entertained by his Majesty of my services, can only increase the desire I feel to render him more important ones, and furnish him new proofs of my zeal and industry in seizing every occasion to humble his enemies.

M. de Bellestre's success last fall in burning the Palatine village and carrying the forts which protected it, would indeed have been, my Lord, a great help to the Colony, had it been possible to remove the considerable portion of provisions of all sorts found in that village. I had particularly provided for that in the orders I gave that officer; but circumstances were not favorable enough to admit of their execution.

1. M. de Bellestre being much exposed to be pursued and perhaps cut off by a force infinitely superior to his own, was under the absolute necessity of using the greatest activity in his operations, success depending essentially on that. He was consequently unable to moderate the attack of his detachment. This was made by one party with all possible vigor, whilst others were busy firing the houses, barns &c.

2. The 500 horses lost by the enemy in this affair were not exactly captured. The greater portion of them was killed or wounded, and M. de Bellestre brought with him but a very small number, which was of very great service to subsist his detachment on its return.

3. Had he had all those horses and all the provisions at his disposal, he could not absolutely have profited by them, either because it was prudent for him to hasten his retreat, or because the transportation of the provisions had been utterly impossible, both on account of the difficulty of the roads and by reason of the rivers to be passed, and the impossibility of feeding the horses.

I have nothing to add, my Lord, to the reports I had the honor to make to M. de Moras of my arrangement on the opening of the campaign, and of the great resources I found in the good will and zeal of the Canadians in supplying the provisions of which we were but too much in want. I can not sufficiently express to you, my Lord, the pain I feel at not being in a situation to give full scope to my plans, the object of which was to anticipate our enemies by quickness, render their operations very undecided, to be able to observe them and to profit by lucky opportunities to gain new advantages over them. I regarded them as certain in the Corlac district, whither I had destined Chev. de Levis, in consequence of the good dispositions I had placed the 5 Iroquois Nations in, who were desirous of joining him. The friends I have among these Nations did not prove false to the attachment they have vowed to the French; they have constantly contrived obstacles to the views of our enemies, as soon as they have had an inkling of them; but the expedients which succeeded so well with them during winter, became insensibly fruitless, in consequence of it being really impossible for me to dispel their apprehensions, and place them in a position not to observe any longer any terms with the English.

Nothing less, my Lord, than the success of the detachment I had confided to Sieur de La Durantay, was necessary to make our enemies renounce their projects and preparations for scaling Carillon in winter. Mess<sup>rs</sup> La Durantay and de Richerville having been included in the promotion of 1757, as ensigns en second, I employ them in the propositions I have the honor to submit to you this year, as ensigns on full pay. I have also placed Sieur de la Chevrotière as ensign en second; I have anticipated his Majesty's favorable disposition towards them, by making them participate in the 6,000<sup>li</sup> he has granted on his list of 1757 to those who have distinguished themselves the most. I gave each at first 200<sup>li</sup>. You will perceive, my Lord, by one of my letters, that I have not as yet received that sum. Our officers are generally penetrated by the attention with which his Majesty has honored their services and the rewards he has been disposed to grant them. I lost no time in informing them thereof.

Mr. Robert Rogers, who was at the head of the detachment defeated by our cadets, had the knack to escape when he saw his ruin imminent; he left on the field of battle, his coat, and even the order he received from his General, which gave me every reason to believe that he had been killed, the rather as an Indian assured me he had himself killed him.

I cannot, my Lord, but defer to the exactness with which M. Bigot has rendered you an account of the provisions which have reached us in different ships; from that you will be able to judge of our situation. I must, however, have the honor to observe to you that the scarcity is increasing from day to day in the Colony; the consumption of provisions has been only too great, notwithstanding our economy. The transportation in bateaux of the provisions sent to victual all our posts as far as Fort Duquesne, could not be effected without very considerable loss occasioned by the rains and severity of the season.

I have nothing to add, my Lord, to what I have had the honor to observe to you on the necessity of having the provisions reach us here early; on that depends mainly the safety of the Colony. It is due to my obligation and zeal to have the honor to repeat that to you, in addition to all the other demands I have already had the honor of making in my letter, in cipher, of the 7th of last month.

I have had the honor, my Lord, to render you an account, in one of my private despatches, of M. de Boishebert's campaign at Louisbourg, and in the Bay of St. George; that officer returned to Quebec only on the 18th instant. I can render you only very good testimony of his zeal in the execution of the orders I had given him; he has always, in accordance with my intention, some detachments watching the enemy on the River St. John and seizing opportunities to harass them. These detachments have been too feeble to undertake great enterprises; I have never been convenient enough nor sufficiently able, to send him any other forces.

Sieur de Boishebert was not at the head of the 50 Acadians who after having been in the neighborhood of Port Royal, were pursued by a detachment of 200 English. These Acadians had themselves elected their chief and equipped themselves at their own expense, as I have had the honor to report to M. de Moras.

M. de Ligneris has written to me from Fort Duquesne on the 30th of last month; he continues to have parties out, who brought him two prisoners on the 30th, from whom he learned that General Forbus was immediately expected at Royal Amnon;<sup>1</sup> where there were more than 2,000 men, under the command of Colonel Bouquet, with 8 pieces of cannon on field carriages and several mortars; that a fort had been built there of piece upon piece, and one saw-mill; as for the rest, they are ignorant whether Fort Duquesne is to be attacked this fall; that the Provincials had orders to go into winter quarters; that they had been since countermanded, but that people still spoke of dismissing them; that there are no more horned cattle at Royal Amnon,<sup>1</sup> but plenty of provisions of flour and salt meats; that the English suppose us to be very numerous at Fort Duquesne. I am not sure, my Lord, whether the enemy will organize any expedition this fall, or wait until spring; the advanced season and the two advantages we have gained in succession over them, would lead me to hope that they will adopt the latter course. 'Tis much to be desired, for 'twould not be possible for M. de Ligneris to resist the superiority of the enemy's forces. Meanwhile, he will use all means in his power to annoy them; embarrass their communications and intercept their convoys. It is a great pity that he has been absolutely obliged, by the scarcity of provisions, to reduce his garrison to 200 men; fortunately, the messages he has delivered in my name, to the Delawares and Chawenons of the Beautiful river, have confirmed these nations in their attachment to the French. The Delawares of the mountains have also favorably received the messages sent to them, and are beginning to remove their villages to our territory. I have renewed my orders to all the posts to procure for M. de Ligneris, early in spring, all the assistance in their vicinity. I beg you, my Lord, to be pleased fully to assure his Majesty that I will neglect nothing to preserve for him the possession of the Beautiful river and of this Colony in general; that it will not be my fault, should our enemies make, eventually, any progress; but in fact and strict truth, the salvation of this Colony will depend on the prompt arrival of the succors of every description which I have had the honor to demand of you.

As my last despatches are the most interesting, I profit by this opportunity to transmit to you the quadruplicates thereof, the vessel by which I calculated to send them being armed as a privateer, and having no fixed destination.

I flatter myself, my Lord, that you will have the goodness to pay the most serious attention to everything I have had the honor to observe to you respecting the situation of this Colony, and to the propositions I have submitted to you in favor of our officers; I cannot sufficiently impress upon you the importance of your obtaining his Majesty's approval thereof, and of your having the goodness to transmit to me by several of the first ships a list en commandement of the promotion.

I am with the most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and most ob't serv't,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

Memoir on the Position of the French and English in America.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Memoir respecting, first, the position of the English and French in North America; secondly, what is absolutely necessary to send there, so as to be able at least to attempt some defence. [January, 1759.]

The English have had in North America, during the last campaign, sixty-three thousand men, 23,000 of whom were troops from Old England. They have sent some more there since, and their latest papers announce the departure of ten thousand Scotch for the New World.

They have in their Colonies the greatest abundance of provisions, horses, oxen, munitions of war, Indian goods, and more than 350 leagues of coast open to succors from Europe.

Their troops are at present distributed in winter quarters, as follows: At Louisbourg and Halifax, on the banks of the Hudson river, on the Mohawk river, at the head of Oneida lake, on the banks of the Ohio and its tributaries, thereby announcing the plan of attacking us simultaneously by the River St. Lawrence, Lake Champlain and Lake Ontario.

Eight French battalions which will hardly number, at the opening of the campaign, 3,400 men, twelve hundred troops of the Marine, at most, five or six thousand Militia. Such are our forces. The Indians cannot be included in the account. English presents, our poverty, our prodigious inferiority—what motives to abate their ardor! Besides, being independent, never making two expeditions consecutively, even should the first have resulted only in raising one scalp; ill qualified for defence; afraid of death; what benefit can be expected to be derived from them?

No stronghold in the country; Niagara, the most tenable of the whole, cannot, if properly attacked, hold out more than three weeks. Shell alone will force Carillon to surrender; a small, narrow right angle, inasmuch as its longest side is 54 toises and the small one 39, without casemates; besides, all the other bicoques,<sup>1</sup> which are called forts, are scarcely proof against a sudden assault. I do not except even Mont-Real and Quebec, if the foot of their walls be once reached.

We are in want of provisions, that is to say, by carefully economising the little we have, it will be hardly possible to enter on the campaign and subsist through its first month.

We are in want of powder, to such a degree, that if the English come to Quebec, there is not six days' supply for the cannon. Almost all the guns are iron, and bad. Mortars are wanting, and still more so, shells, of the calibre of those we have.

For the service of all the forts and of several bodies of troops, scattered over more than five hundred leagues of country, there are in the whole Colony only two Engineers, without any draughtsman, eight artillery officers, five of whom are from France, eighty-six gunners, including 4 sergeants and 19 Cadets; these last are useless in a service of urgency, not a single man having the remotest idea of mines; not a mechanic of any sort whatever.

Goods, to trade with the Indians, are almost entirely wanting.

Under these circumstances, 'tis evident that France, should she send ten thousand men, with munitions of war and provisions proportionate to such a force and to the actual necessities of the Colony, would not place herself again there on anything near a level with the enemy.

But this expedition would require at least one hundred sail, and such a fleet would run the risk, either from the danger of unfortunate encounters, or forcible delay from ice, of not arriving at all, or of arriving too late, and find the campaign already opened and the Colony perhaps invaded.

It appears, then, that this armament cannot be thought of, and we must confine ourselves to treating Canada as a desperate disease is treated, in which the sick man is supported by cordials until he either sink or a crisis save him; that is to say, to send thither only what is absolutely necessary so as to be able to try and make a defence.

Now, What is absolutely necessary?

<sup>1</sup> A term used in France to signify a place ill-fortified and incapable of much defence. It is derived from a place on the road between Lodi and Milan, which was originally a gentleman's country house, surrounded by ditches. In the year 1522, a body of Imperial troops were stationed in it, and stood the attack of the whole French army. This engagement was called the Battle of the Bicoque. James' Military Dictionary. — Ep.

1st Provisions; to freight ships with them on account of the King; to encourage the contractor, who fits out, in this way, very considerable armaments in order that his ships may have crews; to send poudre alimentaire tested at the Invalides.

2nd Munitions of war; a train of artillery; Artillerists and Engineers. In the first place, the largest quantity of powder possible; nine and twelve-inch mortars, and the greatest quantity possible of shells of the same calibre; all the ships ought to be ballasted with them. In the second place, a train of field artillery, and to work them a detachment with the troops of the Line, composed of four Engineers * (A) and two draftsmen, fifty gunners, fifty bombardiers, 4 sergeants included, * (B) thirty workmen, wheelwrights, joiners, carpenters, and smiths, including 5 sergeants or corporals, with an overseer of workmen, twenty miners, including two sergeants and two corporals, with one overseer of miners; observing, that the two aforesaid overseers be junior officers to those detached from the Royal corps in 1757 for Canada. In the third place, a great number of guns, flints and powder-horns, which save half the consumption.

3rd Indian goods. Some must be sent and in considerable quantity. These articles are extremely necessary, if it be desirable to preserve any Indians.

4th Recruits, viz: First, at least one thousand with their arms and 18 months' provisions; secondly, some miquelets, troops of no use in Europe in the present war, and who will render the greatest service in Canada. Thirdly, 150 Scotch, Irish and Germans to encourage and attract deserters of these Nations, who, in that case, will join us in great numbers.

Observation.

Relative to the preceding articles, it may be, 1. Ordered, that every privateer or vessel belonging either to the contractor or merchant demanding permission to proceed to Canada, take ball and shell as ballast; moreover, on the King's account, a cargo of munitions of war, provisions, guns, Indian goods and some recruits; 2. Negotiated, that the Spaniards, Portuguese, Dutch, Irish and English even, carry thither warlike stores and provisions, and that arrangements be made particularly for this object, with Sweden and Russia, who are situated so much the more advantageously in this regard, as the Baltic and Norwegian ports are nearly in the latitude of the Straits of Belleisle, and therefore their ships would be almost certain not to meet any English vessels.

What arrangements can the Court make? What orders send to Canada for the next campaign?

1. Threatened with being attacked by a superior army simultaneously at three points, 'tis evident that if the ten thousand men who compose our force, be divided into three corps, 'twould be the means of being annihilated, without even making the slightest effort.

The Court must therefore order that they be all kept concentrated in a sort of centre, with bateaux, warlike stores and provisions all ready on the three routes, in order to repair rapidly and in force to the first point attacked; or, if many be attacked at the same time, to that one the defence of which will offer us the most advantages, and there combine stratagem with the most determined boldness.

* (A.) N. B. Imagine 500 leagues of country where it will be necessary incessantly to construct and to form intrenchments, and then judge if one Chief Engineer and 5 Engineers under his orders, be too many.

* (B.) The officers of the Royal corps, detached to Canada in 1757, all went there to command this troop which should be detached with its train of artillery along with the troops of the Line, and which would not be lost, even should it be necessary to surrender the Colony by the Project to be hereafter explained.

2. Orders must be issued that of all the Militia divided into three classes, good, middling, bad; the first make the entire campaign, incorporated for that time into our battalions and those of the Marine; the remainder constituting the special Militia corps. This arrangement is absolutely the only one whereby any profit can be derived from these Militiamen. In regard to the two other classes; to order that they have in their houses, accoutrements, a gun, one pound of powder, two pounds of ball, ten days' supply of biscuit and pork, a certain number bateaux, kettles and prêlats<sup>1</sup> per parish, in order that in case of urgency, all the men march when commanded. The monks, priests, civil officers and women will perform the field labor,

In regard to the defence of Quebec, the Court ought

1st To send four flyboats or merchantmen, to be stranded in the places to be pointed out by Sieur Pelegrin, Captain of the port of Quebec, to serve as batteries and forts there. It will be productive of this other great advantage for the general defence of the country, that the crews of these ships, which people will endeavor to have commanded by officers of merchant vessels, who have made the voyage, will receive orders to man the navy that is to defend Lakes Champlain and Ontario.

2nd To order the construction of batteries, 1st at the Eboulement, at Point aux Bouleaux, and nearly opposite that, at La Prairie on Isle aux coudres; 2<sup>o</sup> at Cape Torment, which will batter the ships that must, in order to pass the Traverse, proceed one by one, and remain exposed to its fire, within short musket range, over a quarter of an hour; 3<sup>o</sup> on the Island of Orleans, one at St. Francis, and the other at St. Laurent. An intelligent officer would be required on board the fleet, with orders, in case the ice or contrary winds should detain it near the above mentioned place, to have constructed during that detention, the proposed works, in whole or in part, by the recruits, gunners, and even the crews.

3rd To order the construction of the redoubts and lines proposed in 1757, in a Memoir sent to the Court.

4th To order the preparation, without delay, of brulots, crafts, bateaux mounted with cannon, and redoubts similar to those already constructed by Sieur Jacau, Colonial Captain of Artillery.

5th To order that Mess<sup>rs</sup> Pellegrin and Le Vasseur be consulted, and their advice followed in all this maritime defence.

6th That the women, children, magistrates and all those persons that embarrass the defence, be immediately sent to Three Rivers, and that the greatest supply possible of provisions and munitions of war be collected there, storing them in private houses and even in the churches if necessary.

Now comes the question, Quebec taken, is Canada reduced?

Yes, without a doubt, since: 1. There is not in a second line any place of strength, any spot having in dépôt any warlike stores and provisions; 2. Canada cannot sustain herself by herself and without succors from France.

This second question will be asked: If Canada be lost, can France keep Louisiana?

No, in the actual condition of Louisiana. 1. Because there is not in that country either a General of any experience in war, or disciplined troops, or Engineers, or Artillery officers and soldiers in sufficient number. 2. Because, Canada once lost, Louisiana would be invested by English forces, without being able to receive any succor from France, except at one confined port, which could be easily blockaded by superior naval power.

From the solution of these two questions, I conclude

1st That the Court, foreseeing the case of Quebec being taken, and even the inevitable loss of the Colony, if the army be beaten, and the other frontiers forced, should send to its Governor-General full power to capitulate for the entire of Canada, and its instructions on the kind and nature of such capitulation. Otherwise, that country, entirely exposed, will be wholly sacked, the inhabitants dispersed or destroyed, the Colony irrecoverably lost to the King. Humanity and the interest of France dictate a seasonable capitulation.

2nd Let the Court send orders to the French staff, to the remnant of the eight battalions with the colors, to the Engineers and Artillery corps attached to them, to the best soldiers of the Marine to be incorporated into the battalions, to Indian Interpreters and selected Canadian Voyageurs, to start for Louisiana twenty-four hours before a parley be called.

The advantage of this plan, which is proposed only because it is feasible, is, 1st That it will preserve to the King a good body of troops. 2nd Save Louisiana, because then 'twill be possible to make a stand there some time, even without succors from France. Provisions can be drawn from Illinois, and by means thereof our Upper country posts and Indians preserved; provisions will be obtained also from the Spaniards. 3<sup>d</sup> And confer honor on the French nation. The retreat of the Ten thousand immortalized the Greeks.

But in order that this plan be put into execution, it is necessary: 1. That the Court send express orders to the Marquis de Montcalm, leaving him always at liberty to derogate therefrom, should unforeseen circumstances render its execution impossible, with an open letter to the troops, whereby his Majesty makes known that he expects this courageous manœuvre from them, and forbids the infirm or aged officers and soldiers undertaking that march, which would be beyond their strength.

2. Let the Court order the Governor-General to keep in store at Mont-Real two hundred and fifty bark canoes, and at the head of the Rapids seventy days' provision of biscuit and lard for two thousand five hundred men; powder and ball, wampum belts, a certain quantity of vermilion and some Indian goods.

3. Let the Court authorize the Marquis de Montcalm, or whomsoever will represent him, a Brigadier or an inferior officer to command at Louisiana.

4. The most profound secrecy respecting this project to be observed in France and Canada. Finally, when should the ships be dispatched?

In the first days of March—the 10th, at the earliest—the 15th, at the latest.

The ships to be ordered to cruise on the banks, if the gulf be still closed; if open, to enter immediately south of Anti-Costi; if the ice still block up the upper part of the river, to wait until the ice come down, anchor the large ships at Bic; the smaller at the Brandy pots. In these two anchorage grounds they have nothing to fear. From the Brandy pots, to send the Generals by land, the despatches from the Court. If the gulf be closed, to order a vessel, steered by the pilots of those roads, whom I have brought with me to France, to take the gûl of Canso; land there, in some cove known to them, some Canadians, good walkers, to whom I have had despatches given, who will travel by land, and carry to the Generals the orders from the Court, which it is essential they should know betimes.

I conclude this Memoir with the following observation:

If France desire to fit out a stronger expedition to relieve Canada, such an effect would be produced more certainly by a diversion than directly.

The fleet sent to Quebec would run the risk of being intercepted or arrive too late, and these two misfortunes would be equally bad.

The landing for a diversion could be made nowhere better than at Carolina.

1st The English do not fear any such thing on those coasts, and it would be easy to give out some other object for the expedition.

2nd Carolina is at a distance from all the forces the English have on that Continent and from every point where they wish to attack us. Danger seems greater at a distance.

3<sup>d</sup> Carolina and the neighboring provinces are full of negroes. What advantage could not be derived from that circumstance?

4th The landing force, in case it would not be able to maintain its ground, could retreat by the River of the Cheraquis to Louisiana.

Memoir on Canada,

Wherein is examined, 1st Whether it be important to preserve it; 2nd

Whether it be possible to defend it, in case the war continue in 1759;

3<sup>d</sup> Whether it be easy to relieve it in its present situation.

FIRST QUESTION.

Is it of importance to preserve Canada?

There have been, from all time, people who have thought, and perhaps there are some still who are of opinion, that the preservation of Canada is of little importance to France. Some allege that it costs the King a great deal, and that it will eventually cost more; that it yields nothing, or next to nothing; that, in 1755, 1756, 1757 and 1758, probably more than fifteen millions have been expended yearly, which might have been better employed in the centre of the Kingdom. Others say that the Kingdom, which is itself stripped of people, is being depopulated to settle a country which is extremely rough, full of lakes and forests, frequently subject to the greatest scarcities; that there are within the Kingdom good lands which remain uncultivated; that the Indian trade is little worth; that, so far from increasing, it will always diminish, as the trade in peltries cannot last a century; they add, that the Canadian voyages are long, fatiguing and dangerous.

Finally, the third pretend that, in all the wars we shall have with the English, Canada will be taken, at least in part; that 'twill always be the cause of preventing France, at the peace, preserving European conquests. Besides, that when Canada will be well settled, it will be exposed to many revolutions; is it not natural that Kingdoms and Republics will be formed there, which will separate from France?

We read in the Histoire de la Nouvelle France, by Father Charlevoix, Vol. I., Book 4, Page 173, that these same difficulties nearly were submitted to the King's Council in 1631, and that they were answered in a manner to determine his Majesty to preserve those vast countries, for these principal reasons:

1st It is certain that if France abandon Canada, heresy will establish itself there; Nations known and unknown, will remain in Paganism or adopt the religion of England. How many souls eternally lost! This reflection may strike a Christian Prince.

2nd France possesses, in North America, more territory than is contained in the European continent. Its riches are not yet known; the best spots are not yet settled; the King's glory seems to require that so extensive a country be preserved notwithstanding the immense expenditure incurred there; is it always painful to behold the enemy aggrandizing themselves at our expense; besides, these expenses might considerably diminish; and, after all, this object is not so remarkable in times of peace; it would even be easy for those who are acquainted with finance to demonstrate that the trade and consumption of goods which is going on in Canada, produces for the King in time of peace, much more than is expended. This is the place where general reasons might be adduced to prove that it is of importance to a state to possess Colonies. 'Tis wrong to object, that it is depopulating the kingdom. One year of European war causes the loss of more men than would be required to people New France. It might be complained that no care has ever been taken to increase its population; that might be easily done now in a perceptible manner, because the Colony begins to grow in numbers. How many thousands of useless men within the heart of the Kingdom and in other states! Every year the English are transporting into foreign parts a great number of families whom they encourage to settle in New England. Were New France peopled, there is no country so easy of preservation; naval forces, essentially necessary to Old France, would guard Acadia, Louisbourg; and it may be asserted that if Canada be lost to France the latter will require a larger naval force than ever, because the English will become absolute masters of the sea.

'Tis true, that in process of time those vast countries will possibly divide themselves into Kingdoms and Republics; the same will be the case with New England; but how many centuries before that will happen! 'Tis looking too far ahead to extend one's view into a futurity so distant and so uncertain.

3rd Supposing, in fact, that Canada will never be of much use to France; that it will cost even a trifle, must it be reckoned as nothing, the preventing a rival nation aggrandizing itself, establishing, on the seas, a despotic empire and monopolizing all the trade?

The English, once masters of Canada, will necessarily take Louisiana and the Islands, because, being no longer disturbed by the Canadians, they will direct all their weight against the Islands, which are an object of importance for France. For the same reason it may be relied on, that the English will soon wrest New Mexico from Spain, and Portugal may truly be affected by it.

Our immense forests, our vast prairies, once in the hands of the English, will carry abundance everywhere, and facilitate forever the construction of all the ships they will desire

Were it only the codfishery, this would be an object of infinite importance and which we should lose. Of all commerce, this is the richest, the easiest, the least expensive and the most extensive. As early as 1696, the trade of the Island of Newfoundland alone amounted yearly to 15 millions. Canada once taken, all the fishing ground must be renounced.

Without knowing all the branches of trade which is and can be carried on through out New France, it may be said that if the King lose that country, the commerce of England will soon be augmented more than 150 millions.

A thousand other reflections present themselves to the mind, but it is unnecessary to abuse the patience of those who will read this Memoir.

SECOND QUESTION.

Should the war continue in 1759, will Canada be able to defend herself?

The number of men in that Colony bearing arms has perhaps been exaggerated. I dare assert that there are not fifteen thousand of them, but at least eleven thousand must be deducted from that number for the reasons following :

1. We must strike off 4,000, to wit: the old men, those necessary in the country, the sick, the husbands of sick women, the servants of the parish priests, the sextons, those who hide themselves to avoid being called out, those who find means to be exempted, the pilots for navigating the river ; sailors for a great many sloops and bateaux, those at outposts, who watch the signal fires day and night.

It is, in general, doing much to levy more than two-thirds of the men.

2. Of the eleven thousand men to be levied, nearly 1,000 must necessarily be deducted for the Upper and Lower posts, and usually these are the best; it would be easy to enumerate them.

3. 1,500 mechanics of different sorts, carpenters for batteaux, artillery work, blacksmiths, gate-keepers, cartmen in the towns, must also be deducted ; again add to these, 1,500 domestics for the officers, the town's people, necessary couriers, clerks, writers.

4. Again, 3,000 men must be employed for the transportation of provisions, utensils and all the necessaries for the camps.

We have 4,000 leagues of country to preserve ; we have scarcely 78 settled ; the current must be surmounted, the wind is oftenest contrary ; sloops are frequently a month going up to Montreal, as long in going to St. John ; a portage must be made, that is to say, bateaux and their cargoes have to be transported in carts, and then there are 40 leagues before reaching Carillon, which is the first camp ; from Montreal to Soulange is twelve leagues, three or four of which are rapids, requiring carts ; between Soulange and La Présentation there are more than ten rapids, the bateaux have to be partially unloaded and the freight carried on the back in these bad roads.

To Niagara is reckoned 120 leagues ; a lake has to be crossed which the slightest wind agitates ; after that comes a considerable portage of three leagues ; pirogues are used to go to Presqu'isle, the River au bœuf and Fort Duquesne ; but there is especially a portage of at least 4 or 5 leagues.

To give an idea of the difficulty of transportation, I suppose that we had to send from the lower part of Brittany into Westphalia everything required by an army of 4,000 men, who would find nothing on the route—nothing in Westphalia. Tradesmen would find this very difficult of execution, yet it would be much easier than to transport from Quebec what is required for the Beautiful river alone.

Add to this, that we have in Canada scarcely 5 months of the year suitable for transportation.

It follows that, supposing eleven thousand men could be raised in Canada, 4,000 only of them will be fit to fight, the others being occupied elsewhere, and, in fact, they are perhaps never met in the camps.

The 8 battalions of French Regulars, the forty companies of the Marine, hardly form a corps of 6,000 men ; 'tis a great deal, still, to add two thousand fighting Indians.

I ask now, if it be possible for twelve thousand men to resist the enemy's army, which certainly amounts to sixty thousand men, to be divided probably into three—one at Lake St. Sacrament, another at Lake Ontario and towards the Beautiful river ; the last at Quebec.

Bradok's defeat, the capture of Chouaguen, that of Fort George, the victory of the 8th of July last, would create flattering hopes were not something miraculous recognized therein, which cannot be calculated on. It is further to be remarked, that it is almost impossible to get our forces to Carillon before the beginning of June, and the enemy can reach there by the end of April. Judge, then, if it be possible for the prudence of the Generals, the bravery of the troops, the willingness of the farmers, to resist the efforts of the enemy, if the latter have on foot, in 1759, as large a force as in 1758. I refer to the last question what regards our scarcity of provisions and liquors and presents for the Indians. I will not say that there is every prospect that no ploughing will be done this year, that the enemy will prevent this and the putting in seed the early part of the spring.

THIRD QUESTION.

Is it easy for France to relieve Canada in 1759 ?

Troops and provisions are required ; all must arrive in May ; the examination of this article will point out the difficulty.

It is not too much to demand an augmentation of eight thousand troops. On arriving at Quebec, they will probably be reduced, by death and disease, to 6,000 ; consequently, we shall have only 18,000 to oppose against 60 thousand. Is this too much ? Is it sufficient ? The situation of the country must be relied on, and calculations made on the mistakes of the enemy.

Men-of-war or merchantmen are necessary for conveying 8,000 men ; if the former be employed, 300 on board each, exclusive of the crew, is a liberal allowance ; 27 ships will be required ; if merchantmen, they will carry only 200, and 40 of them will be necessary ; but will it be possible to dispense with having them convoyed by ships of the Line, Isle Royale and Gaspé being actually in the hands of the English ?

The Contractor-General of Canada demands 40 ships for his share alone, but how many of these will be intercepted ? 20 at least will be required by the merchants ; here are at once 100 ships of 300 tons required, exclusive of those which are to carry the munitions of war ; still more are necessary for the conveyance of provisions, for though the harvest be good, it is not sufficient for the Colony and for extra mouths. This has been proved in 1756.

The difficulty of transportation in Canada occasions a great consumption of provisions by pure loss, and it is impossible to remedy it ; the necessity of employing Indians is another occasion of wasteful consumption. A party of Indians [is sent] to make prisoners, with 15 days' provisions ; it returns at the end of 8 days victorious, or without striking a blow ; it has consumed everything and demands provisions. How are they to be refused ? Another inevitable abuse : Our domiciliated Indians are unwilling to go to fight unless we feed their women and children, so that if you have 2,000 Indians, it will require provisions at least for 6,000. It is not flour alone that is wanting ; the Colony is very bare of oxen and sheep, and at the close of 1759, hardly any will be found for refreshments for the troops or the ships, and 'tis certain, if the war continue, the Colony will be obliged to live on salt meat, which will have to be imported from France, and in that case what a number of ships will be required. Finally, supposing France could furnish all those vessels, will they arrive in sufficient season ? The enemy will attack probably in May. Will those succors arrive in small fleets as in 1758 ? It is to be feared that they will meet the enemy on quitting France ; some they will find about the roadsteads of Halifax ; others will be about Louisbourg and Gaspé. Should those succors be sent altogether, a strong convoy will be required, and it will happen that many vessels will be separated by fogs and storms ; it will happen that those ships will not be ready soon enough to sail together, and though they should be, their voyage will be a great deal longer. All these succors are necessary ; can France furnish them ? If an attempt be made to recover Louisbourg or Gaspé, or if any considerable diversion be made on the coasts of New England by a considerable fleet, then the whole of the succors I have enumerated may not be wanting ; but has France ships and seamen ? Enough for the seas of America and Europe.

DETACHED THOUGHTS.

Perhaps it will be easy to convince the Crowns, especially the Maritime powers, of the interest they have in preventing the aggrandizement of England ; the reasons suggest themselves.

It is almost impossible to retake Louisbourg ; we possess no port in those seas ; the enemy has, or will have, 8,000 men there, and doubtless after our example, will keep some ships of the line in that port.

Acadia is entirely ruined, stripped of all domestic animals ; most of the inhabitants dead ; 'twill cost immense sums to reëstablish the few of them that remain. The English, once masters of Canada, will prefer it to the island of Minorca, and being on the eve of invading it, will find it difficult to listen to propositions for peace. Indeed, New England must be very weary of the wars our Indians are waging against it. It sees in its midst nearly 4,000 of its frontier families bewailing their kindred who have been massacred and whose properties have been laid waste. It knows that in taking Canada it will be rid of the cruelty of the Indians and enjoy forever the sweets of peace.

Quebec is not a strong place ; all our hope depends on preventing the landing and having outside a flying camp of 4,000 men, to annoy the enemy in their march and during the siege ; it is very improbable that the enemy is ignorant of the strength of the fleets which will be sent ; 'tis natural that they will oppose stronger ones, especially as they can station them in the most advantageous ports.

To send succors in divisions is to run the risk of losing all in detail ; to send them together, is to expose ourselves to a general action and to lose all at once ; it is to expose oneself to a very long voyage.

Ten ships of war well armed, once arrived at Quebec would defend it infallibly ; at least the enemy could not approach it with any vessels, no even with boats. They must land below Quebec, on the North or South shore, and 2,000 men on each side would be a great check, and prevent them occupying those places that command the town and harbor ; each ship could furnish 200 men, without prejudice to the operations it would have to carry on, and should it take out 200 troops, we might be certain of arresting the English fleet, because the Colony would supply more.

The difficulty consists in getting those ships there. Were the locality known, the feasibility perhaps might be admitted of stationing 2 or 3 ships at the Traverse, as many between Point Levi and the Island of Orleans, one or two near Beauport to drive off the enemy's bateaux should they dare to present themselves. 'Tis for Seamen to decide.

The preceding reflection must not prevent the sending of every other sort of succor in men, provisions and munitions of war, demanded in the Memoir.

Assuredly the English will make an attack by the Lakes St. Sacrament and Ontario ; we should need 16 or 18,000 fighting men, the enemy's preparations are made, and absolutely speaking they might make themselves masters of Canada by these two points.

Canada has but one very narrow outlet, that is the gulf. If the English preserve Louisbourg and Acadia, 'twould be difficult to receive any relief by that way.

It were desirable that Holland should possess Acadia. That Republic would be a great assistance to Canada, would as far as she might be able to, prevent the English seizing it for fear of being herself driven from Acadia, which she would have a great interest in preserving; as a choice of evils, it would be one hundred times better that Holland possess it; with her we would arrange the limits; we would have enough in Louisbourg, the Island of St. John, Gaspé, the Petit Nord; in this way would be terminated the thorny question of limits.

On the supposition that Holland would have the Peninsula, the Isthmus would remain with the French; also, the River St. John and Lake Saint Sacrament; Leydius might be regarded as the English boundary; our limits would be Fort Bull, and then the chain of the Apalaches mountains which divide in fact in two the territory between the lakes and the sea coast; or if that point could not be gained, the River Oyo would answer our purpose.

'Tis to be feared that the English will leave in New England 15 or 18 thousand Regulars, which they will, on declaring war, push suddenly into Canada; what means of resistance are there, if we do not keep up 8 or 10 thousand troops; but unfortunately the Colony will be unable to feed them except in the most abundant years, and supplies of provisions, all the implements and munitions of war necessary for 10,000 men, will be required from time to time from France. It will be necessary to think seriously of establishing granaries or magazines of reserve, on account of the scarcities which frequently overtake us.

The people of Canada must naturally be quite tired of the war, many have perished in it; they are burthened with the most harassing works, have not time to increase their property nor even to repair their houses; a portion of their subsistence has been wrested from them, many have been without bread for 3 months, the troops that incommode them are quartered on them, they have not throughout the year as much food as they think they need; they are told that the English will allow them freedom of religion, furnish them goods at a cheaper rate and pay liberally for the smallest service. These ideas are spreading. Some persons above the populace do not blush to speak in the same style; it is natural for the people to murmur and allow themselves to be seduced; the inhabitants of the cities will be the most easily debauched.

Memoir on the next Campaign in Canada.

Artillery of Canada. Regulation to be made for the next Campaign.

The corps of artillery in Canada is composed of 3 officers, 10 cadets and 86 gunners, including 19 gunners and one sergeant detached from the Royal corps in 1767.<sup>1</sup>

In appointing Sieur Mercier, one of these 3 officers, Commandant of this artillery, the intention was to make two companies of it, instead of one which existed previously, but as the material failed, especially for officers, application was made to France for some. Six were detached, and through some misunderstanding, no doubt, passed into the Colony to be degraded on arriving there. M<sup>r</sup> Berryer<sup>1</sup> has corrected that error, by declaring them detached to serve with the troops of the Line.

But will the plan of forming two companies of artillery with 3 officers, 10 cadets and 86 gunners, still subsist?

It appears to me that the following arrangement would be better adapted to the public service at least for this campaign. Peace is necessary for the alterations:

1<sup>o</sup> To form only one single Colonial company of artillery, composed of 100 gunners, bombardiers and 10 cadets, of which Sieur Mercier to be Commandant, if it be desired that he should preserve that title; Sieur Jacqueau, Captain; Sieur de Lusignan, Lieutenant; Sieur Danseville, first Ensign. If it be proposed to make officers of any of the Cadets who have served during the last campaign, let them be made 1st and 2nd Ensigns.

2<sup>o</sup> To withdraw from this company the sergeant and 19 gunners detached from the Royal corps in 1757.

3<sup>o</sup> To complete it with the gunners and bombardiers which the Minister of Marine will send in the month of March.

4<sup>o</sup> To order that a troop to be organized, under the name of Detached company from the Royal corps serving with the troops of the Line, of the 20 gunners of the Royal corps and such as will remain from those sent this spring, after the Colonial company shall be completed. Sieur de Montbelliard will be its Commandant; Sieur de Louvicon, Captain; Sieurs D'Epinassi, Bonafour and Du Verni, Lieutenants.

5<sup>o</sup> To order that for service Sieur Mercier and de Montbelliard rank equally according to the seniority of their commissions as Captains. Sieurs Jacqueau and Louvicon and the other officers will follow the same arrangement, that is to say, equal rank, seniority of commission.

Should an officer be sent to Canada to oversee the workmen and another the miners, with the workmen and the miners required, they will likewise be detached to serve with the troops of the Line under Sieur de Montbelliard's orders.

The advantage of this arrangement is:

1<sup>o</sup> To excite emulation between these two corps. The service will gain thereby.

2<sup>o</sup> To lessen the expense, as for instance, by economy; if the Minister will order that the works of the artillery and the transportation relative thereto be no longer done by contract, but in the same manner the Marquis de Montcalm has had the external work of Carillon executed in 1758.

<sup>1</sup> NICOLAS RENÉ BERRYER was the son of an Attorney-General of the Grand Council. He was Intendant of Poitou in 1743, and in 1747 was appointed Lieutenant of Police, in which position he effected the disgrace of Count d'Argenson, by the spy system then in vogue. Having thus gained the good will of Madame de Pompadour, the King's favorite, he proved his gratitude to his protectress by filling the Bastille with her enemies. In 1755, he attempted to carry out a general press among the vagrants and idle children that invested Paris, in order to have them transported to Louisiana, but such was the indignation it excited, that Mr. Berryer was obliged to fly for his life, and the Court was obliged to sacrifice him to appease public anger. M<sup>de</sup>. de Pompadour, notwithstanding, had him appointed Counsellor of State, and on the 1st November, 1758, had him advanced to the office of Colonial Minister, for which he was less fitted than for the Police department. On the 18th of October, 1761, he was appointed Keeper of the Seals, and died 15th August, 1762, after having, in his different employments, attended more to the affairs of M<sup>de</sup>. de Pompadour than to those of the State. Biographie Universelle. — Ed.

3° To have a corps of artillery, which, not being Colonial, will be able, in case we be obliged to capitulate for the Colony and its troops, to retire to Louisiana with the troops of the Line.

M. Berryer to M. Bigot.

Versailles, 19th January, 1759.

Sir,

I answer your letters of the 12th August, 3rd September and 6th November of last year, touching the expenses of Canada.

I shall not enter with you into the detail of the different chapters of expenditure contained in the forms (projets d'états) you have sent me conjointly with M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil. I consider it useless, at present, to make any change, in advance, in forms I have found introduced of similar returns, which do not include one quarter of the expenses incurred each year, although that custom be very ridiculous in itself and in no wise contributes either to order or accountability. I have ordered these blanks to be dispatched, and send them to you with another joint despatch. But I forewarn you that it is my intention to establish a new order as soon as circumstances will permit it.

As for the rest, it is not in these forms that the abuses consist which certainly prevail in the expenditure in Canada. I am also persuaded, as you observe, that there is no room for retrenchment in the objects of fixed expenditure, and that the variable expenses depend on the concurrence of circumstances which arise during the year; they cannot be all foreseen in the blanks.

The abuses exist in the employment made of the funds in the Colony; they are to be sought for in the hands of those intrusted with their details, and an end can be put to them only by investigation. I cannot conceal from you that I have perceived in the account called for by me of what has been done for some years back, that people are in the habit of consuming without economy, without order and without any precaution for the King's interests.

How, for example, is it possible that the small-pox among the Indian Nations of the Upper country, should have occasioned extraordinary expenses to the amount of a million? By whom has this expense been made? Is it by commanding officers at the posts? Is it by the storekeepers? You do not enter into any detail on this point. Every one, then, is at liberty to distribute the King's property, and the matter is got rid of by passing it to the account of waste (consommation). I confess to you that this manner of administration is very extraordinary.

How do you wish me to reconcile, on the other hand, the enormous demands for all sorts of goods which you have made this year, under pretext of a general scarcity of everything, with your information contained in other letters wherein you advise me of the capture of Fort Frontenac; that the King has lost, in that fort, a prodigious quantity of provisions and goods. I am not ignorant that the fort was the depôt for the posts on Lake Ontario and Erié and the Beautiful river; that, therefore, it must be always supplied, but if the posts in the Upper countries could have caused an expenditure of a million in provisions and merchandize, Fort Frontenac had no need of all that you say it contained.

Again, I perceive that in addition to the immense supplies which arrived last year in Canada, and which ought to have sufficed to furnish all those posts, purchases are made at those very posts, from private persons, of considerable parcels of goods, and I cannot infer from this manœuvre anything else but that the King's property is considered consumed on its arrival, and that it is afterwards resold to his Majesty at excessive rates.

By this operation the King buys in France and repurchases the same effects in the Colony. I am no longer astonished that immense fortunes are seen in Canada; the liberty of disposing at will of everything is the true cause thereof, especially when the certificates of presents pretended to have been made to the Indians, are accepted without any examination; or when, as in the case of Sieur D'autrive, the Treasurers' clerk at Montreal, the difficulty is got over by retiring from the service. The investigations which have been made, judicially, into the deficit of his cash account prevent me making an example of him; but I do not conceal from you that his precipitate departure from the Colony, perhaps, also, the pretext he made for so doing, would be sufficient for not exempting him from suspicion.

As for the rest, in the multiplicity of movements now in Canada, I can only excite your zeal and instruct you to direct a more scrupulous attention to the choice of persons entrusted with any department of administration; you cannot do everything yourself, you cannot be everywhere, but you can assure yourself of those in whom you place any degree of confidence, and that is the principal source, more or less, of the abuses that occur.

Having spoken to you of the consumptions, it remains for me to communicate to you what regards the finance of the Colony. All that occurs in the fabrication of the treasury notes, receipts and their conversion into bills of exchange on France, is not free from the apprehension of fraud that they are exposed to; Canada having only one million of paper-money, which is not sufficient for the payment of the expenses, 'tis certain that it becomes indispensable to supply the deficiency by some other means; the simplest, no doubt is, for the Intendant to sign the printed notes which are in use for many years past, to transfer those notes to the Treasurer, who submits them to the Registrar, and issues them successively in proportion to the expenses.

You will see by the printed notes I transmit to you this year, that whatever idea I might conceive of this new and dangerous form, I place you in a condition to continue your operations by enabling you to circulate the notes which procure you the means to do so. The state of the Colony, the want of time and the confidence I must place in you, are the reasons which determine me thereto.

I shall avow to you, nevertheless, that this practice is contrary to all the laws of the Kingdom, for by such operation the Intendant alone becomes, without being expressly authorized thereto, the fabricator of a money which has circulation in the Colony, without the King's permission, and you must be aware of all the consequences thereof.

I have not considered it my duty to propose to his Majesty to suppress that practice, the place of which it would be necessary to supply by some other, but he has ordered me to tell you that it is his intention

1st That M. de Vaudreuil sign with you all the Treasury notes that you will have to issue to the Treasurers' clerks.

2nd That no notes be issued without the cause of the expense being recorded.

3rd That you cause to be remitted a monthly list of the notes that Treasurer will issue to the public, either for the purpose of returning the paper money brought to the Treasury to obtain bills of exchange on France in their stead, or for expenses which may exceed the amount of such paper.

4th That you verify conjointly the value retired in acquittances in the hands of the Treasurers' clerks, immediately after drawing the bills of exchange.

5th That a list be also furnished you of the printed bills and notes remaining in circulation after the drawing of the bills of exchange.

6th That you cause to be transmitted to me copy of all those lists and the result of your operations.

You will easily perceive the arrangements which may result from the facility with which a prodigious quantity of such bills has, up to the present time, been entrusted to the Treasurers' clerks, who then become absolute masters of them without any other precaution than exacting from him receipts for the quantity, without enquiring into their employment; without verification of their conversion into bills of exchange, he can make any use he thinks proper of them. This is so true that in the month of November, when you rendered an account of the year's expenses, you state nearly how much they ought to amount to; they are counted, and a year afterwards and the following years very considerable excesses are discovered.

This confusion which has prevailed for a long time in the finances of the Colony, would excite violent suspicions; I am fully convinced that neither one nor the other of you have any thing to reproach yourselves with, but as heads of the administration of the finances, you are not exempt from stories circulated here, and of which I was not ignorant previous to the King confiding to me the Department of the Marine. I did not attach any credit to them; I have merely collected all the information I have been able to obtain on whatever regards Canada. I have concluded that it was indispensable that I should communicate to you all that I have had reason to perceive, and in the firm resolution which I have come to, of placing all parties right, of uprooting abuses and putting an end to everything that might contribute thereto. I reckon on your paying every attention to this object that it merits; on both of you closely watching it, and concurring in furnishing me the information I need in order to put into execution the views I propose to myself.

'Tis certain that if, hereafter, the expenses increase every year as they have done since 1755, Canada would become excessively burthensome to the Kingdom; it is already much so; you are not ignorant of the efforts that it has been necessary to make to meet the payments; I hope I shall have, from this very year, a satisfactory account to render to the King of the attention you will apply to it. I cannot too strongly recommend you to furnish me the means to do it.

I am, Sir, entirely yours.

Minute providing for the office of Governor-General in case of M. de Vaudreuil's death.

The events in the life, having created in 1756 the apprehension of the death, of M. de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of Canada, and the crisis to which that Colony would be subject, in case the general command of it was not assured at once, his Majesty decided that the Marquis de Montcalm should assume it in default of M. de Vaudreuil, the Deputy Governors, though men of merit in their station, not being fit for the place of Commander-in-Chief, especially in a time of war and in regard to the troops of the line under his orders. A commission was consequently issued for the M<sup>rs</sup> de Montcalm and it was addressed to M. Bigot, the Intendant, recommending him under the strongest injunction of secrecy, not to unseal the packet nor to make any use of it except in the case of M. de Vaudreuil happening to die.

As there is no knowing how far the events of the war might produce a change in the office of Commander-in-Chief of Canada, 'tis deemed proper to propose to his Majesty, in confirming the orders already issued, to bestow it on M. de Montcalm in default of M. de Vaudreuil; to dispose of it, also, in favor of Chevalier de Levis, Brigadier-General, in case of M. de Montcalm's death. This precaution appears necessary in the present circumstances, and there is reason to presume that the office of Commander-in-Chief being assured to three persons, in default the one of the other, the discussions which the Deputy Governors might create to procure it for themselves, will be avoided, and this packet will be addressed as before to M. Bigot, not to be opened except in case of accident.

25th January, 1759.

His Majesty having been informed of all that occurred last year in Canada, has been graciously pleased to reward the services of the Marquis de Montcalm and Chevalier de Levis, by making the former Lieutenant-General of his armies, and the second, Major-General (Maréchal de Camp). The Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor, Lieutenant-General of the Colony, is equally entitled to favor by his zeal and services. His office of Governor-General requires, at the same time that 'tis fitting, that he should receive marks of his Majesty's bounty at a time when the King bestows signal proofs thereof to the officers serving under his orders.

What appears at the moment the most suitable and what will greatly flatter the Marquis de Vaudreuil, is the Honorary Grand Cross of the Order of St. Louis. His Majesty granted him two years ago the Grand Ribbon. The troops of the Colony, the farmers, the Indians themselves who are attached to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, will see him with pleasure thus particularly distinguished by his Majesty, and it will not fail to influence advantageously the operations of this year.

M. de Silhouette to M. Berryer?

Paris, 8th February, 1759.

Sir,

I have received the letter you have done me the honor to write me on the 27th of last month. I have omitted nothing to enable me to respond to the marks of esteem and confidence you honor me with.

I have read with attention the two Memoirs on which you direct me to give you my opinion. The first treats of the nature of Louisiana and of Canada. The second supposes the abandonment of this latter Colony, proposes the emigration of the Canadians to Louisiana and discusses the objections thereto.

To throw light on so important a matter and to satisfy your orders, I have made a preliminary Memoir on the previous question—Is it proper or not to abandon Canada? I have examined in this Memoir the influence the American system may have on that of Europe, the nature of the possessions of the French and English in that new world; finally, what are the views of the English and the advantages they propose to themselves in the conquest of Canada.

I annex to this Memoir copy of that which has been made in 1751 by the Marquis de la Galissonnière on the French Colonies in North America. He treats in it the same questions, and his testimony in such a matter ought to possess great weight.

I have thought that I ought not confine myself to the general question of abandoning or maintaining Canada. I have prepared a second Memoir, submitting the summary detail of the plan for the emigration of the Canadians to Louisiana, and discussing its motives. That detail and those motives are scattered through the answers of the author of the project to the objections he raises himself. It is there I have found them.

The struggle between France and England, to-day, is for the preponderance in America. The English pursue their object with an attention, an activity, efforts and an expense which prove at least that the influence of the American system over that of Europe is not a problematical opinion with that nation.

The conquest of Canada is considered by the English only as a stepping-stone to the conquest of the other French Colonies, and that is the motive which must render its preservation extremely precious to France.

What I have the honor of submitting to you here agrees with what M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière was writing from Canada as far back as 1747, when he was Governor-General of that country.

I had, at that time, no relation with him; I had not the advantage of his acquaintance. What his sojourn in America unfolded to him of the views of England, my sojourn in England also afforded me an opportunity of observing; and at so great a distance, without having ever communicated with each other, we concurred in opinion as we have since done in esteem and friendship. I had occasion, several times, to converse with Marshal de Noailles<sup>1</sup> and Count de Maurepas on the projects of England, and on their persuasion, I drew up, in the month of October of the same year, 1747, a Memoir on the finance, marine and commerce of that nation, in which I discussed the necessity of placing Canada, as soon as circumstances would permit, in a position not to fear anything eventually from their enterprises; with that view I proposed to have conveyed thither the soldiers that would be reduced at the peace; to continue their pay to them some time; to give those of them who would apply for their discharge, lands, facilities to cultivate them, and in that way appropriate to that Colony a supply of soldiers and husbandmen; measures which, carried out with a wise economy, would have been of trifling expense, would have saved the state many millions in the course of the present war; made Canada the bulwark of all the other Colonies, and might have resulted in a superiority of land forces over the English in America as in Europe, which belongs to the constitution of France to possess over them, and would have been capable of disconcerting their projects. Marshal de Noailles and M. de Maurepas desired that I should submit that Memoir to all the King's Ministers. I did so. Circumstances, doubtless, have not permitted the application to that object of the funds which would have been necessary for its execution.

<sup>1</sup> ADRIEN MAURICE DE NOAILLES was born in Paris in 1678. He made his first campaign in Catalonia, and obtained a company in 1693. Assisted at the siege of Roses, at the battle of Ter, and at the capture of Palamos and Gironne. In 1695, he commanded a brigade of Cavalry. In 1701, he accompanied the Duke of Anjou to Madrid; was created Brigadier in 1702, Major-General in 1704, and served in Germany under the Duke of Burgundy. He commanded the French army in Spain in 1706 until the peace of Utrecht, and on the death of Louis XIV., he was appointed, 15th September, 1715, President of the Council of Finance, and filled that office until January, 1718, when he retired to the country. He was sent to the army in Germany in 1734, under Marshal Berwick and captured Worms. He was next created Marshal and sent to command the army in Italy in 1735, where he remained until September, 1736. He was again called into active service in 1741, and in 1743 was appointed to the command of the army in Germany, where he lost the day at Dettingen, and served under Marshal Saxe at Fontenoy. In 1746, he was Ambassador to Spain; retired from public life in 1755, and terminated a long and honorable career 24th June, 1766, at the age of 88 years. Biographie Universelle.—Ed.

As the naval forces of the English are greatly superior to those of France, it was an additional reason for making Canada stronger in men; but, by being inferior, as we are in America, both on land and sea, a continuation of reverses must be expected; it is still less from the naval forces of the English than from the land forces belonging and proper to their Colonies, that those of France have to fear the most damaging blows. I cannot help suspecting that the difficulty of sustaining Canada is the real source of all the motives by which its abandonment is sought to be cloaked. If such be the case, in a short time will be seen reviving the gothic system that France can dispense with Colonies, and has need only of husbandmen and soldiers. Russia is in no want of soldiers; she does not lack husbandmen inasmuch as she exports grain; Russia, nevertheless, receives subsidies from foreign powers; so true is it, that something more is necessary for the dignity, the grandeur and power of a State, especially of a State which is bounded in great part by the sea, and has for its capital enemy a nation whose might consists principally in its naval force.

To enter into a more minute detail would be anticipating the perusal of the Memoirs which I have the honor to send you, but I cannot terminate this letter without presenting two Observations to you, one of which is instant; the other may influence the projects and plans of operations to be followed in the course of the present war.

The first is, that no means ought to be neglected to enable Canada to defend herself against the ulterior progress of the English, or at least to contest the ground with them, inch by inch. Although that Colony be in the most extreme danger, yet, almost all its inhabitants are soldiers, or as good. A people, so brave, when not in want either of provisions or ammunition, can find resources where none are imagined.

No one feels, more than I do, how important it would be to adopt all such measures as circumstances may permit, to provide for the defence of that Colony, but I do not feel myself sufficiently instructed to discuss that point. I could do it as it ought to be done, only with aid and counsel, and I could not take any unless authorized. Besides, it would not be possible to form any plan of arrangements except on the communication of information necessary to understand the actual state of the Colony.

The second Observation is, that if Canada be unfortunately lost, means must be devised to obtain its restitution at the peace, as well as that of the other French Colonies, which it will be easy for England to seize, as soon as the fear or resistance of Canada will have ceased to offer any obstacle thereto. The English will place so great a price, and with justice, on their conquests in America, that it will not be possible to prevail on them to give them up, except by making them apprehend the consequences of an invasion of England herself.

When I had the honor to see you, Sir, for the first time, you encouraged me to prepare a Memoir on that subject; I have partially treated the matter in a Memoir I had drawn up in the month of November, 1755. I annex hereunto an extract from it, to which I have added some ulterior and more detailed reflections on the project of a landing.

I submit this letter and all those Memoirs to your wisdom and decision. I am entitled to claim your indulgence. It is founded on my obedience to your orders, and on the sentiments of zeal and respect, with which I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your most humble and most obedient servant,
(Signed), DESILHOUETTE.<sup>1</sup>

Marshal de Belle Isle to M. de Montcalm.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Versailles, 19th February, 1759.

Sir,

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Bougainville and Doreil have handed me the letters you have entrusted to them for me. The former, who is about to depart on his return to Canada, will convey my answers to you. You will have been surprised at not receiving anything from me by the frigate which has been dispatched to you in the month of 7<sup>ber</sup> last. I was advised of it so late that my packet did not arrive at Brest until after she had set sail. You will find it among those confided to M. de Bougainville.

I shall not repeat what I have already told you of the satisfaction the King entertains of your services. Your promotion to the rank of Lieutenant-General, of which I send you the commission, and the Red ribbon that has been accorded to you, will make you more sensible of them than all the assurances I could give you. His Majesty has also had regard to the expenses the command confided to you requires you to incur, and it has never been his intention that a place in which you defend so courageously his interest should be a burthen to you.

You will learn that in attending to your interests I have not neglected those of the staff and regimental officers employed under your orders, both in procuring for them an increase of pay and obtaining rewards commensurate with their services. I enclose, herewith, commissions of Major-General (Maréchal de Camp), for Chevalier de Levis; of Brigadiers for Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Boulamaques and de Senezergues, with the letters of service I have transmitted to them in consequence, and which you will have the goodness to send them. You will find another of Colonel for M. de Bougainville, on whom the King has conferred that rank, in order that he may perform the duties thereof with the troops under your command. The other packets he carries, contain the copies of the particular favors which you will find almost conformable to your propositions. I refer, for the rest, to the letters of detail I write you and with which I hope you will be satisfied.

As regards your duty during this campaign, I am very sorry to have to inform you that you must not expect to receive any Military reinforcements. Besides augmenting the scarcity of provisions which you have only too much experienced up to the present time, it would be much to be feared that they would be intercepted by the English, on the passage; and as the King could never send you assistance proportionate to the forces the English are able to oppose against you, the efforts which would be made here, would have no other effect than to excite the Ministry of London to much greater efforts to preserve the superiority it has acquired in that part of the continent. Although in this conjuncture it is to be expected that the English Generals will desire to profit by their advantage in order to inflict on the Colony severer blows, the recollection of what you have achieved last year makes his Majesty hope that you will still find means to disconcert their projects. M. Berryer will cause to be conveyed to you as much provisions and ammunition as possible; the rest depends on your wisdom and courage, and on the bravery of the troops. His Majesty is convinced that the confidence he reposes in you and in them cannot be better placed. He relies equally on the good understanding he wishes to prevail between the troops of the Marine and those of the Colony, and that the manner you will live with M. de Vaudreuil, will furnish them the example. This is a point whereon M. Berryer must insist, and which I believe it is unnecessary to recommend to you.

<sup>1</sup> ETIENNE DE SILHOUETTE was born at Limoges on the 5th July, 1709. After acquiring his education, he traveled in Europe, and went to England to study the financial system of that country, and became Chancellor to the Duke of Orleans. After the peace of 1748, he was one of the three Commissioners appointed to arrange with England the limits of Acadia; he was next Royal Commissioner at the India Board, and was named Comptroller-General in March, 1759, but held that place only eight months, and retired to the country, where he died, 20th January, 1767. Biographie Universelle.—Ed.

I have the honor to be, most perfectly, Sir, &c.

P. S. As it is to be expected that the entire efforts of the English will be directed against Canada, and that they will attack you at different points at once, it will be necessary that you confine your plan of defence to those which are most essential and most connected, in order that being concentrated on a smaller extent of country, you may be always enabled mutually to help one another, to communicate with and to support each other. However trifling the space you can preserve, it is of the utmost importance to possess always a foothold in Canada, for should we once wholly lose that country, it would be quite impossible to enter it again. To fulfill this object, the King reckons, Sir, on your zeal, your courage and pertinacity. His Majesty expects you will exercise all the industry you are capable of, and that you will communicate the like sentiments to the principal officers and altogether to the troops under your orders. M. Berryer writes to the same effect to M. de Vaudreuil, and directs him to conduct himself with the greatest harmony towards you; you must both feel all its necessity and all its importance. I have become responsible for you to the King. I am well assured that you will not dishonor me, and that for the good of the State, the glory of the Nation and your own preservation, you will have recourse to the greatest extremities rather than ever submit to conditions so disgraceful as those accepted at Louisbourg, the memory of which you will efface. Such are, Sir, substantially, the King's intentions. He has entire confidence in you and all the qualities he recognizes in you. I have fully confirmed his Majesty therein by the testimonies I have rendered. I wish you perfect health, I feel no uneasiness for the rest. Rely also on all the sentiments I entertain for you, Sir, and that I most sincerely desire to find myself in a position to afford you marks thereof.

Ministerial Minute respecting Supplies procured in Spain for Canada.

The threats of the English to besiege Isle Royale and to attack Canada in 1758, determined M. de Moras, as early as December, 1757, to employ foreigners to transport succors to those two Colonies.

With that view he informed the Marquis d'Aubeterre, the King's ambassador at Madrid, that he would find Sieur Darragay, a merchant of that city, disposed to furnish and to transport provisions.

That affair has been negotiated secretly between M. Daubeterre and that merchant. It was not until M. de Moras quitted the Ministry of the Marine, that he delivered up the documents, of which we are going to give an account.

The first consists of the proposal of Sieur Darragay to furnish

1st 1,600 tons of flour, first and second qualities, in equal proportion,

200 tons of brandy,

200 tons of salt,

2,000 tons.

2nd To have armed on his account and at his expense, the necessary ships to convey the 2,000 tons, half to Isle Royale, half to Quebec.

The purchase money of these cargoes was estimated in the proposal at 480,000<sup>li</sup>, or thereabouts, for which has been drawn on the spot bills of exchange at different dates, as well as for the freight. Meanwhile it has been stipulated that Sieur Darragay should present the invoices of all the purchases, which would be paid him according to the prices mentioned therein, and 2 per cent commission.

It has been agreed that the freight should be paid him on the bills of lading, certified by two sworn stevedores, and that allowance would be reciprocally made for any greater or less quantity that may be found on the settlement of the 2,000 tons.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

Montreal, 28th March, 1759.

My Lord,

Last year's campaign terminated on Lake St. Sacrament without any event of interest.

I can only, my Lord, renew what I had the honor to write you last fall relative to the movements I should have wished had been made to satisfy the desires and ardor of the troops of the Marine, Canadians and Indians, and to afford them an opportunity of signalizing their zeal anew. I had the honor to develop to you the advantages which would have resulted therefrom; they were so certain that I always regret their having been neglected.

I have caused the work at the fortifications of Carillon to be continued; had the defects of our intrenchments corrected; finally, I have foreseen and had everything done that could tend to the better defence of that frontier.

I caused a number of Indians of different nations to winter at Carillon, although their movements have not been very considerable, these Indians deriving almost nothing from their hunting except the comforts they have procured for the garrison of that fort, which has not failed to be of assistance to them.

On the 20th November, Sieur Outelas, a Cadet in the troops of the Marine, placed himself at the head of 60 Indians, to strike a blow between Fort Edward and Sarastoga, but on the day of their departure, 3 soldiers of the regiment of Berry deserted, who were pursued in vain. M. Outelas, for whom fears were justly felt, as these deserters could inform the English of his march, returned, nevertheless, with two prisoners.

Another party of our Canadians and Indians went to reconnoitre old Fort Ann; did not fall in with any one. It afterwards went to the environs of Fort Edward; whatever desire it had to do well, it was obliged to be satisfied with one scalp and one prisoner; this party might have done better, but, finding itself within an acre of the fort, confined itself strictly to taking a prisoner, agreeably to my intentions.

A small party of our Indians returned at the same time with a Mohegan, whom it also took in the neighborhood of Fort Edward.

No hostile party made its appearance up to the tenth of this month, whilst two parties of our Indians were out, and the others were hunting. 70 English or Indians belonging to the enemy surprised our workmen, who, unfortunately, were not armed; they took 6 soldiers, one Canadian; killed 3 soldiers, one Abenakis; wounded two Abenakis, one Canadian and one soldier, who was scalped, and received two blows of a tomahawk in the skull, and had his thigh broken. The detachment sent by M. de Hebecourt from the fort, did not arrive until after the enemy had struck their blow, wherefore we took but one prisoner; we wounded several English and Mohawks, whom the enemy carried off, but, seeing themselves pursued, were obliged to turn their backs on their wounded, and to abandon the litters on which these were carried. That party had been detached from a body of 300 English who had remained at Rattlesnake [hill] and the Falls. Their principal object was to enable the Engineer to reconnoitre our intrenchments and even Fort Carillon, to try and burn the lower town and storehouses, for which purpose they had brought combustibles and fuzes.

I have not failed to tell M. de Hebecourt how much he was to blame in that affair.

1st Because had our workmen been armed, that hostile party would not have attacked them.

2nd Because our workmen would have been themselves enabled to give these English a smart chase.

M. d'Hebecourt has written to me that that Engineer and four men had passed and repassed outside the intrenchment, from one angle to the other, on the hill only, and that they had stopped at various places to examine the fort which appeared to the best advantage, on account of the snow.

It is astonishing that this engineer should, with only four men, have been able to make a reconnoissance of the intrenchments and fort; his curiosity would certainly have cost him very dear had M. d'Hebecourt been as vigilant as he was negligent at that moment.

According to the report of all those prisoners,

The island where Robert Rogers' company is quartered, is in progress of being palisaded; that partizan had only 220 men with him; he was waiting for two of his companies who were at Orange.

The English have this year a post of 160 men at Fort Miller, or the Portage between Fort Edward and Saratoga, where there is a saw-mill. This post is protected by upright stockades.

A battalion relieved at Fort Edward was designed to go and work at Louisbourg.

The troops who have besieged Louisbourg are partly in New England and partly at Louisbourg, where the English have made great exertions to repair the barracks and the fortifications.

Three men-of-war were wintering in the harbor of Louisbourg. (N<sup>o</sup>. According to intelligence from the River St. John, there are 4.)

The French garrison and the citizens who were unwilling to stay there have been transported to Old England.

In the months of November and December, two large French ships were conveyed to New-York; They are supposed to be men-of-war.

They have been told that the King of Prussia had lost 40,000 men.

They agree also that the Dutch had declared against the English, but that the Spaniards had not yet done so, though their ships are taken when freighted with munitions of war or provisions.

The English wish to come and attack us at Carillon early in the spring. There are a great many bateaux or barges at Orange.

Supplies of hay have been brought from Orange to Fort Edward, for the horses which are to come to that fort in great numbers early in April.

No troops have gone from New to Old England; on the contrary, 6,000 men are expected to form new crops and not to serve as recruits, whom the English procure in their Colonies.

The garrison of Fort Edward, which consisted of 600 men, has had an augmentation of 200.

The smiths of that fort are occupied in repairing the artillery.

General Abercrombie has recrossed the sea.

General Hamest<sup>1</sup> was at New-York.

No talk of peace; on the contrary, the English will absolutely have Canada, and are to attack it at various points.

They have concealed, last fall, a great many articles in the ditch of the intrenchment of old Fort George, which they have covered with the intrenchment itself.

The governors of the New England provinces have concluded their session, at which it was decided to call out the men fit for service from 15 to 60 years; the province of Boston alone furnishes 15,000 men.

As nothing is more dangerous than the desertion of the soldiers, I have adopted the arrangement which has appeared the best to prevent it; I saw the necessity of employing Indians. Two soldiers of Berry having fallen into this category, our Indians went in pursuit, overtook them, cut the head off one and obliged his comrade to carry it himself to the fort; the latter was immediately tried, and suffered the punishment due to his crime. This example was absolutely necessary; I hope it will have made an impression on the soldiers who might have a similar fancy.

I expect, my Lord, to have some English prisoners immediately; either from Fort Edward or from the vicinity of Orange, whether I have dispatched some small parties of our Canadian troops and Indians. The intelligence these prisoners will furnish me, cannot fail of being interesting, because being captured at the opening of the fine season, it is very probable that the plans, preparations and movements of the English will have at least transpired, if they have not become public.

I am always in the expectation that our Lake St. Sacrament frontier will be vigorously attacked very early in the spring by a very considerable force. I feel how important it is for us to anticipate our enemies, but I cannot prematurely dispatch the troops I have destined for that quarter, as they would have very soon consumed the provisions I am at present busy collecting to victual them. The English, knowing our situation, would naturally follow up their activity by slowness in order to give us time to consume our provisions; the success of of their expedition would effectually depend on that, since hunger would place our troops under the necessity of retreating.

In these circumstances my policy is, to study the enemy's movements, to seize the moment of their march to dispatch the troops, Militia and Indians, that I am preparing to oppose them. I arrange all these things with that view, in order not to be surprised.

Nevertheless, if the succors you, my Lord, are dispatching for this Colony, begin to reach us, I shall hasten the departure of those forces, and will even increase them.

As for the rest, I have taken the precaution to place limits to the progress of our enemies, supposing they make any. I have had two Xebecs built, which will carry artillery, will be well armed and capable of disputing the enemy's passage on Lake Champlain.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

Montreal, 30th March, 1759.

My Lord,

M. de Ligneris has not ceased having French and Indian scouts to watch the English. M. de la Valtrie informs him that the English were building a small fort on the river Mananguailée, a little above Fort Duquesne.

He learned at the same time by some Delaware Indians, who are beginning to become familiar with the English, and go frequently to see them, that 2 @ 300 men were to remain at that fort during the winter.

That General Forbes had returned with his army to Loyal Hannon, where he had stationed a strong garrison to support that of Mananguailée.

That the remainder of his army was to be sent to winter quarters in different provinces.

That it was asserted that this General was to return this year to Europe.

It would not be difficult, my Lord, to drive the English from their fort on the Mananguailée or to take them, were there plenty of men and provisions, but M. de Ligneris is in want of both to such a degree that he will have considerable difficulty to pass the winter.

The Iroquois, Chaouanons and Loups of Kanaouagon, far from responding favorably to M. de Ligneris' invitation to go and attack the English, continue to solicit him to vacate Fort Machault and to retire to Presqu'isle, continually representing to him that he has too few men to resist the English who were assuredly to come and attack him this winter.

He obtained, however, from those Indians, [a promise] that they would go to the English only with a view to learn their plans against the French, to inform him thereof; they likewise promised him to summon them to withdraw very speedily to the other side of the mountains.

But there is reason to presume that the Indians would wish there were neither French nor English at the Beautiful river, and that they are heartily tired of the war.

What confirms me in this idea is, the Council the English held on the 26th of November at Cachekachekei.<sup>1</sup>

The English have had recourse to the most affecting and most pressing language; they requested the Indians to forget the past; to renew the alliance of their ancestors with them; to let them settle their differences with the French, and to recall their young men who are with the latter.

To enforce this proposition they told those Indians, that they had closed the Canada river, consequently the French could not give them any assistance; that the King of France had already twice sued for peace, which had been always refused by the English; they requested the Indians to communicate their words to the Nations who are in alliance with them.

The Delawares have answered the English anew, that being allies of many different Nations, a reply could not be given immediately to their speech; and that they should not become impatient if the answer was a long time coming, as their relations were at a distance.

Moreover, if the English were desirous that their speech should be listened to, they must retire to the other side of the mountains and leave the Indians their lands free; otherwise no alliance would be entered into with them.

At another council held with the same Indians at the Forks by the English, the latter consented to retire home, not to make any settlement on the Beautiful river, and that they would all depart within eight days.

M. de Ligneris placed no confidence in the promises which the English made the Indians.

In fact, their language changes very fast. The Canaouagon Indians told M. de Ligneris, on their return from the English, that the latter were to come with a considerable force and attack him in the month of February.

What gave rise to the suspicion that such was their design, was, the arrival of 120 men at their fort on the River Mananguilée, where they were in immediate expectation of 300 more.

Were M. de Ligneris in a situation to make a movement to drive away the English, the Nations on the Beautiful river would not oppose it directly; if they saw that we were in a condition to dispense with their services, I doubt not many would join him, notwithstanding their conferences with the English.

The latter have been again summoned by those Indians to retire to their own country, but entirely forgetting their first language, the English have assured that they should not leave the Beautiful river; that it belonged to them from its source to its mouth.

That positive answer from the English has rendered M. de Ligneris only more vigilant in observing their movements, more especially as some Indians have reported to him that the English are building a great many bateaux at the fort up the Mananguilée and on the River Attiqué.<sup>2</sup>

These preparations having given offence to our Indians, they demanded an explanation thereof from the English, but the latter curtly answered, that they were preparing to go to Fort Marchault, that they would have 6,000 men at the end of March, to drive off the French.

M. de Ligneris has left nothing unsaid to persuade the Nations on the Beautiful river, that it was for their own interest to place limits to the ambition of the English; he has prevailed on the Loups to assemble again at Cachekachekei;<sup>1</sup> the latter have assured him they were taking that course only to have a better opportunity of striking the English, if he organized any expedition, and of more easily joining the French on the Beautiful river, supposing it were in spring, in sufficient numbers to drive the English thence.

I have written M. de Ligneris that the change of the English from extreme suavity to the greatest threats, must have naturally made the deepest impressions on the Indians of the Beautiful river, who must conclude therefrom that the principal object of the English is to deceive them, and that if they were not under the protection of the French, they would be very soon reduced to slavery, and probably to something worse; that therefore it is for their own interest to sovereignly despise all proposals of neutrality; to be inseparable from the French, and to be more ardent than ever to fight the English.

I recommend him also to impress strongly on those Indians the critical position they would be placed in, abandoned to themselves, had they no help to expect, except from the English, who would not treat them any better than they had treated the Abenakis.

As I am aware of the designs of the English against Niagara, I write M. de Ligneris that, supposing that place to be really besieged, M. Pouchot will retain under his orders 300 Canadians whom I had designed for the Beautiful river, and that, according as he will find it necessary, he will call to his assistance all the forces from Detroit and the other posts, whom I have ordered to rendezvous at Presqu'isle.

Under these circumstances, I recommended to him, in relation to the straits he should find himself reduced to, and in regard to his situation, to manœuvre so as to have the enemy continually before him. I observe to him that, if the Indians of the Beautiful river remain faithful to the French, and act in consequence, he will not fail to afford work to our enemies.

That, in other respects, he will fall back on the River au Bœuf and successively on Presqu'isle, paying attention to what position he will find himself in, to play with and to set snares for the enemy, according as they advance, to be, above all things, vigilant wherever he be, so that none of his bateaux fall into the hands of the English.

I likewise notify him that M. Pouchot will, with pleasure, embrace the opportunity of corresponding with him, and that, according as circumstances will be favorable, that is to say, if Niagara be not menaced, that he would reunite under his orders not only the forces and succors which will rendezvous at Presqu'isle, the 300 Canadians that I have destined for him, but in addition, all the forces and other assistance M. Pouchot will have it in his power to forward to him.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

Montreal, 30th March, 1759.

My Lord,

Although M. de Kerlerec,<sup>1</sup> Governor of Louisiana, informs you exactly of the situation of that Colony, nevertheless, I have the honor to render you an account of what he has stated to me in answer to what I had written him.

I had signified to him to employ every means to have the English vigorously harassed on his side by the Nations of the country of the Alibamons; the favorable dispositions in which I left them, persuade me that they would be entirely disposed thereto. M. de Kerlerec writes me that he would have perfectly succeeded in getting them to carry out my intentions, but he had not had anything to give those nations for more than two years and a half; that he is still in the same state of indigence, with the exception of some trifling assistance he has been able to derive from even our enemies, by means of some conferences.

He informed me at the same time that the English have not left any thing untried to establish posts among the Abekas,<sup>1</sup> Alibamons, on the river of the Okonis<sup>2</sup> and at Okeitcha, a territory of the Kaouitas,<sup>3</sup> but that these last have always remained firm and strongly opposed it; 'tis easy to presume that the intention of the English was, without doubt, to seize successively the Fort of the Alibamons,<sup>4</sup> &c.

That all these proceedings have occasioned a great many Councils with the Indians, a great many messages to the Nations and considerable expense on our part, to procure the rejection of the English messages and the ratification of ours.

But he observes to me, and 'tis but too true, all that can last only a season; indeed, 'tis to be feared that those Indians (whose fidelity, notwithstanding, we cannot but applaud), will tire of seeing the continuance of our poverty and consequently of their necessities.

M. de Kerlerec informs me also that he has heard of the arrival among the Alibamons of four Chaouanons, whom I had engaged our Northern Indians to send as delegates to the Alibamons, to call on them to accept the hatchet against the English, and to warn them that if they did not, they would convert all those Nations into their enemies. That the Alibamons were embarrassed how to answer, knowing that it was impossible for us to supply their wants; that they confined themselves merely to giving their solemn promise that they would never suffer the English to do the smallest thing against us, but the moment it would be in our power to supply them with the resources which they derive from the English, they were now aware what they should have to do, and that they would be heard from.

You see, my Lord, that my foresight has proved utterly fruitless, for the sole reason that M. de Kerlerec is not able to second my views in treating those Nations as they deserve; a treatment they cannot dispense with, and that, being obliged to have recourse to the English for those supplies, it is of a natural consequence that we shall never be able to make those Indians move according to our desires, if we be not in a situation to relieve at least their most urgent wants.

M. de Kerlerec also writes me that the Chaktas persevere in the good dispositions they entertained when I handed them over to him, but that being in nearly the same necessity as the other Nations under his government, they begin to be forced by their wants to go and trade with the English, not finding among the French what they indispensably require.

He adds, that the Eastern portion, particularly the village of the Couchas,<sup>1</sup> of the Yellow canes (Cannes jaunes) and the Senachas use pretty bad language, but that the majority, who have every reason to remember the past, behave well.

From all this, my Lord, M. de Kerlerrec observes, that if the Colony confided to him, continue in the same dearth of everything, he can only fear a very grievous revolution among the Indian Nations. I doubt not but he had had the honor to submit to you his representations in this regard.

You will find it perhaps strange, my Lord, that, being myself in an incomparably greater want of everything than that under which M. de Kerlerrec labors, I have had the honor to entertain you with his necessities. I do so through zeal and the desire I should have felt to employ every means to have an attack made on the enemy.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

Summary of the Plan of General Operations for the Campaign of 1759.

[ By M. DE VAUDREUIL. ]

OHIO.

M. de Ligneris has had orders to remain at Fort Machault, on the Oyo; 1st To support the Nations; 2nd To annoy the English; 3rd To force them to a diversion; 4th To cover Lake Erié and force the enemy to march only with an army, which would entail considerable preparations, whence arise serious difficulties for victualing of all sorts in a country where the ground is capable of being defended inch by inch.

The scarcity of provisions prevailing in the Colony has determined me to send orders to the Illinois and Detroit to forward the Presqu'île all the men these two posts can furnish.

I had, early last autumn, designated the same place as the general rendezvous of the Canadians and farmers from the Illinois, Detroit, of all the French and different Southern Nations, in order to have them when required.

NIAGARA.

As those forces will proceed to the relief of Niagara, should the enemy wish to besiege it.

I have, in like manner, sent orders to Toronto, to collect the Mississagués and other Nations, to forward them to Niagara.

I have advised the commandant of this last fort of my apprehensions that the English would attack him before the arrival of the relief I design for him; I have authorized him to call in the camp of observation from Presqu'île according as it will be assembled.

M. Pouchot agrees to leave La Présentation with the two corvettes as soon as they will be ready to sail; he will be accompanied by the two pickets of Regulars, and will take along ammunition and provisions; will pass near Chouaguen to reconnoitre whether the enemy are there, and will proceed to Niagara, where he is going to perfect the works and to assume the command. Sieur de Montigny will repair thither with a detachment of 300 Canadians of the government of Quebec, passing along the north with 30 bateaux, each of which will carry 3,000 pounds weight in flour, exclusive of their provisions.

FRONTENAC.

M. de Corbière will have a detachment in the environs of Frontenac, composed of 30 soldiers of the Marine, 30 Canadians and some Indians to be continually out scouting, as well for the security of La Présentation against surprise, as to prevent our corvettes or convoys, which will convey freight to them, falling into any of the enemy's ambuscades.

LA PRÉSENTATION.

The different advices I have received of the designs the English had formed, to come on the ice and attack La Présentation and burn our corvettes which are building at Point au baril, have determined me to send thither a detachment of nearly 200 men, including Colonials workmen and Indians, so as to be the better able to oppose their project and to accelerate the construction of our corvettes.

In order to profit by the first navigation, I have caused bateaux to winter above the batture of the Cedars, and have sent thither on the ice, whatever artillery, rigging, ammunition, provisions and goods circumstances permitted us to forward.

In consequence of fresh intelligence I have received that the English were moving on the Mohawk river, I have detached M. Pouchaut, an experienced, intelligent and best disposed officer, with Sieur Despinassy, an officer of artillery, to proceed to La Présentation on the ice and take the command there until his departure for Niagara. He ought to leave the Cedars on the 25th of this month, with about 200 men, most of them from the government of Quebec.

The pickets of Regulars are moving towards the Cedars, as well as the remainder of the 300 Canadians belonging to the Quebec government, 84 Canadians from the government of Montreal, who go to range the country, 163 to serve as van and rear guards, 31 seamen or gunners to complete the crews of the corvettes; they are to wait there until the ice will permit of their going to La Présentation.

If all these succors will succeed in reaching there, M. Pouchot will have, subject to his orders, Indians included, 16 @ 1700 fighting men who, protected by the corvettes and protecting them in return, can keep a numerous enemy for a long time employed, and even beat them.

Had it not been for the scarcity of provisions, I would have sent a greater number; but of all enemies, the most redoubtable is the famine to which we are exposed, and had I, to gratify the public and appease the terror which was disseminated among the people, determined on sending, during the winter, 14 @ 15 men, I should this day be reduced, through want of provisions, to abandon the lakes, which would be a great calamity for this Colony.

After the departure of all these detachments, M. Benoist will have remaining only 331 soldiers, 81 Militia, 32 workmen, 60 other persons, including officers, employes and servants, with 2 @ 300 Indians, who are in these parts. From the reports which Mess<sup>rs</sup> Pouchot and Benoist will render me of the positions, plan and Memoir I have required of them—from the informations I shall obtain of the movements of the English, I shall be able to employ part of the flour coming in daily from the tythes, from the toll for grinding, and from the savings of each farmer, in sending thither an augmentation of the forces, which will arrive even before M. Pouchot's departure.

CARILLON.

I have intended that the battalions of La Reine and Berry which are in the Quebec government, the Colonial troops and 1,000 @ 1,200 Canadians, at least of this district, should proceed to Carillon as soon as the ice will permit them.

As soon as I shall learn that the English are moving towards Lake St. Sacrament, or understand that provisions are in the river, I shall immediately dispatch the battalions which are in the governments of Montreal and Three Rivers and the Colonial troops, leaving only the invalids at Quebec and Montreal.

By taking precaution to have bateaux at St. John and La Chine, I shall be at liberty to send 3 @ 4,000 farmers of this district and that of Three Rivers, who remain, either to Carillon, the head of the rapids and even to Quebec, the moment it will be necessary. In this way I shall be able to furnish aid when necessary, and to keep up a fire everywhere.

If I learn, meanwhile, before the arrival of the troops and Militia from the government of Quebec, that the enemy is on Lake<sup>1</sup> St. Lawrence, I shall immediately dispatch all I can from this government, in order to anticipate the enemy.

QUEBEC.

I do not presume that the enemy will undertake coming to Quebec, but even should I be convinced of the fact, I would not alter my arrangement, especially as were I to abandon Carillon, the enemy would seize it and St. Frederic; once on the lake, I should be obliged to leave a considerable force at St. John to prevent an entrance there; whereas, preserving them until the moment the fleet will be in the river, I shall have time to send down to Quebec the greater part of our troops, whilst Carillon, Saint Frederic and the Xebecs will suffice in succession to stop the enemy, and afford us time to fight one or two battles; a single one gained, saves the Colony; the fleet departs, and we return to oppose the enemy's progress.

In regard to works outside of Quebec, the want of provisions does not allow me to think of them; they would require 4,000 men, to whom, having no flour to give them, I should be obliged to furnish 2 pounds of meat; this would cause a consumption of 10 @ 1,200 horned cattle for one month alone, a resource which I reserve to live on, in case we have the misfortune of having all our convoys cut off. I confine myself, then, to allowing all the victualing to be continued, to the closing of the city gates, to working at the enceinte, to the establishing of batteries, finally, to all that can be done without any extraordinary consumption of provisions, and to procuring for the farmer, as much as will be in my power, the means of accomplishing his sowing; without this, succors from France, however liberal they may be, could not provide for the subsistence of about 90,000 souls who are in this Colony.

With the same economical view, I propose, in like manner, to employ the Acadians in the transportation on Lake Champlain.

I expect the Indians from the Upper countries in the spring.

I have adopted the best measures to be informed of the moment the English will enter the river. I order the farmers of Rimousky, St. Barnabé and Bic, on the first certain intelligence they will receive thereof, without waiting for further orders, to convey their wives, children and cattle to Green Island. Some officers will leave Quebec with orders to have the provisions and forrage between that place and Point Lévis consumed, observing to advance only according as the fleet progresses, always leaving a body of Canadians, Acadians and Indians, 8 or 10 leagues in their rear, to prevent any detachment presuming to land, and to afford time to vacate the settlement without confusion.

On arriving at point Lévis, should no provisions arrive from France, those cattle will be killed, or salted to serve as subsistence for the army, taking the precaution to draw up returns and give certificates to the owners, to pay them in part for said cattle, and to replace the balance.

All the women and children will cross the river and retire to the neighborhood of Three Rivers, where care will be taken for their subsistence.

The settlers at Isle aux Coudres, Les Eboulements and Malbaye will be careful to withdraw their women, children and cattle to St. Joachim, and convey thither the greatest quantity of provisions possible. The men will remain at Isle aux Coudres in order to destroy the forrage there; they will, as soon as the enemy will be in sight, and have reached the anchorage of La prairie, manœuvre the rafts of the island, and profit by the advantage created thereby, to cross to the North, where all, when reunited, will be able to harass the enemy should they be disposed to land, having always the Capes to fall back on, without fear of pursuit.

The English once anchored at Isle aux Coudres, the rafts are to be made use of, which will have been prepared along the Capes, as in the last war; orders were given to that effect last year; boats are to be employed carrying large cannon, or fire-ships which will be prepared at Quebec; if a squadron will have arrived, all those manœuvres are to be directed by naval officers.

The English, then, being at Isle aux Coudres, the settlers on the Island of Orleans, will occupy themselves in transporting to the North of the Island their women, children and cattle, in order to remove them to the North shore. A corps of the militia of the island will be formed to protect it from being ravaged by any detachments in the boats which might attempt to come and seize it, and they will always be able to retreat by the North of the island in case they are forced.

On the first news I shall receive of the enemy being in the river, I shall provide for the security of the frontiers of this government. I shall go down, in person, to Quebec, with all the farmers of the governments of Montreal and Three Rivers, and of that of Quebec, from St. Anne to that city; I shall next make them work at the intrenchments of Beauport until the troops and Militia I shall have ordered from Carillon, have joined me. Then, according as I shall have so many in troops, Militia, Indians and seamen, I shall make my arrangements either to oppose the enemy's landing between St. Anne and the Island of Orleans, or to wait for them at the passage of the River Montmorenci up to Quebec, and from Quebec to the River Carrouge.

The Marquis de Montcalm and Chevalier de Levis will then be at Quebec; I shall always feel great pleasure in communicating to them all the movements I shall have ordered, and even in making use of such reflections as place and circumstances will suggest to them.

Whatever efforts the English will make, I always flatter myself that his Majesty will cause powerful succors to reach us, and that the valor of the troops, the personal interests of the Colonists, and their attachment to the King, the number of Indians we shall have; that all these forces united together and animated by the same desire, will render the conquests of this Colony a work of very great difficulty, not to say of impossibility.

RIVER ST. JOHN.

Despite of the insufficiency of provisions I find myself laboring under, I do not the less attend to the Acadians and Indians on the River St. John, at Miramichy, and in the environs of those two posts. I have given orders to M. de Boishebert to arrange everything for their removal into the heart of this Colony; if, however, our enemy's movements on the River St. Lawrence require me to vacate that district, then, all those Acadians and Indians united, will serve only to swell, considerably, our force at Quebec.

As for the rest, according as the projects and movements of our enemies will develop themselves, and circumstances will require some change in my arrangements, or I form new ones, I shall feel a pleasure in communicating them to the Marquis de Montcalm.

Montreal, 9th April, 1759.

Sir,

May I flatter myself that you will be pleased to permit me to have the honor of communicating to you the events which have transpired in the Colony since the end of autumn?

We obtained some new advantages on the Beautiful river, at the close of the month of October. The English repaired, in force, on the 23rd of November, to within three leagues of Fort Duquesne, which was abandoned after having marched out of, and burnt, it; the artillery has been sent to the Illinois, by descending the Beautiful river which empties into that of the Ouia,<sup>2</sup> the latter flowing into the Mississippi, which is ascended thirty leagues to reach the Fort of the Illinois; and the garrison retreated to Fort Machault, where it still remained on the 8th of March, according to intelligence received on the day before yesterday: it has orders to continue there. Should the English march thither, as is probable, it will fall back on Niagara, always vacating and burning the posts, not one of which is tenable. M. Pouchot, who is going to command at the latter fort, and has already arrived at La Présentation, will have, for the defence of that frontier, as considerable a body of troops as the scantiness of our means and of our resources will permit. Scarcity of provisions and the bad position of Fort Duquêne have compelled its abandonment. The consequences may become unfortunate, if the Indians pronounce in favor of the English. Although they hesitate, they appear still attached to us; 'tis to be hoped that they will remain at least neutral. M. de Ligneris, who commands at Fort Machault, writes that the English are constructing forts at Attiqué and Royal Hannon; that the Indians are become very familiar with them; he flatters himself, however, that he will induce them to strike, if he receive reinforcements capable of controlling them; the greatest part of them are on the way.

Various obstacles have prevented the reestablishment of Fort Frontenac. During the winter two sloops have been built three leagues above La Présentation—a work which might have been, and would have been essential to have, done in the month of September—in order to endeavor to retain possession of Lake Ontario, the loss of which is to be apprehended through the destruction of Frontenac and the reconstruction of Chouaguen, at which the English are, perhaps, already busy. They have a considerable force in that quarter, and threaten to come and burn our sloops and La Présentation. M. de Pouchot, who has set out on the ice to secure that post against a coup de main, writes that the sloops will be launched without delay, and that he is going to begin an intrenchment. Last week one hundred bateaux went to him with reinforcements, rigging and everything he may stand in need of; as soon as the sloops will be equipped and armed, he will embark with the troops destined for Niagara. He has two parties out in search of news of the enemy, whose designs are unknown to us.

Our enemies have not made their appearance at Carillon in the beginning of the winter, but came there last month to the number of 350, surprized 15 workmen who were in the woods, killed four and captured seven of them, after which they took a plan of the intrenchments and of the fort. Some Indians and volunteers went in pursuit, killed some of their men and took one prisoner, who says that troops are arriving daily at Fort Lydius, where immense preparations are making to come early and besiege Carillon; we on our part are expecting them there, and that they will attack us by the Beautiful river, Lake Onthorio and Quebec; we have but few troops to oppose them; such is our position. 'Tis to be hoped that the news from France will render it better, that we shall be as fortunate as in the last campaign, and that no mistake will be made similar to that of having allowed Fort Frontenac to be taken, which, with a little foresight, might easily have been preserved.

Distress has been nigh as severe this winter as the last. Although the arrival last summer of provisions has been immense, the administration and management have been so bad, that the supply is not abundant. Not knowing the fate of my letter, your employment of which does not give me any uneasiness, I cannot prudently inform you of what remains to be said. How many things to be related on this head, which I hope to have the honor of explaining to you vivâ voce.

The winter has been one of the coldest; the river broke up some days ago and begins to be navigable; the ice has backed up to such an extraordinary degree and with such violence, as to throw down a house.

Our destination for the campaign about to open is not yet decided. Our generals, who unfortunately, do not always determine it, and are not consulted on the measures to be adopted, cannot yet learn where they will require us; I believe they would wish to be able to multiply us and send us everywhere. There will be work to do for everybody, apparently in more than one quarter. Nothing is wanting to the glory of the Marquis de Montcalm and the reputation of the troops, but the achieving of good business this year. Notwithstanding the critical state of the Colony, prudence and science on the part of the General, and good will on the part of the troops, are alone required; there is reason to expect that they will be forthcoming.

You will find my letter long, Sir; counting on the continuance of the indulgence with which you have frequently honored me, I have entered into all the details I thought you would be glad to be informed of. I greatly desire that they may have the good fortune of pleasing you, and that they will contribute to make me deserving of your protection, which constitutes all my ambition. I hope to have the honor of soliciting it personally this year. Though pretty well recovered from my wound, I require to go and take the baths, not being in a condition to do much on horseback or afoot. I propose demanding permission to leave at the end of the campaign, which I should regret not making, and hope that you will be pleased to grant me your approbation.

I have the honor to be, with respect, Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

M. de Montcalm to M. de Creuille.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 12th April, 1759.

Sir,

I profit by the departure of a vessel which had been dispatched last December and prevented by the ice from proceeding any farther than the Isle aux Coudres.

Our last news announced that the English would force us to abandon Fort Duquesne. Captain de Ligneris, of the Colonists, who was in command there, after having ordered the place to be blown up, retired on the 23rd November, to a pretended fort called Fort Machault.

The English are negotiating with the Delawares and Chasanonons, whom they are endeavoring to attract to themselves; whatever people may say about it, 'tis to be feared they will succeed. The Five Nations, on which I, contrary to M. de Vaudreuil's opinion, never placed reliance, appear inclined to the English.

Men have been employed this winter in building two sloops at La Présentation, on Lake Ontario, to repair, as much as possible, the very serious error of the last campaign, the allowing Frontenac to be taken, and the navy we had on Lake Ontario to be burned. 'Twill be very good of the English if they allow us to launch those two vessels, without an effort on their part to burn them.

We have not had anything of interest this winter; some parties on both sides, in the neighborhood of Carillon, to obtain news respectively. Captain d'Hebecourt, of the regiment of La Reine, who has been entrusted with the command of them, has behaved with a great deal of intelligence and application. The accounts we receive of the enemy from all parts, incline us to presume that the new General (Amherst) wishes to take the field early, with a large force. The provincial assemblies met in December to demand of the particular governors their contingents of men and provisions.<sup>2</sup> They were held, the year before, in February. The deliberations were in favor of granting them. Our forces and means are different, but I dare be answerable to you for the good resolution of our troops, for the zeal of Chevalier de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque, and of our principal officers, to second me effectually. M. de Bourlamaque will be able to make the campaign. He is tolerably recovered from his very serious wound.

I cannot tell you precisely how we are off for provisions and warlike stores. Ordinarily, I learn the facts only from the public, which informs me that we are badly off for the one and the other, unless we receive powerful succors from Europe.

<sup>1</sup> This name is thus spelled throughout these Documents, except at p. 751, where it is "Macartie," which, most probably, is the correct name. — Ed.

This paragraph was in cipher.

The war has changed character in Canada. The vast forces of the English, our example determines them on continuous operations in a country where the Canadians thought they were making war, and were making, so to speak, hunting excursions. Our principles of war, considering our inferiority, ought to be, to contract our defensive, in order to preserve at least, the body of the Colony, and retard its loss; to combine with the system of European tactics the use to be made of the Indians. This is what I am always saying, but the prejudices or councils of quacks are followed. No matter, I serve the King and the State. I shall always express my opinion. I shall execute to the best of my ability; last year I did, indeed, dare to accept battle with an order in my pocket to avoid a general engagement. To retreat would be the ruin of the Colony; to lose the battle, would be to lose both it and myself likewise, who would have been met by the order issued to me. This last did not stop me. I can well sacrifice myself for the [public] good. M. de Vaudreuil, to whom I submitted, on the 20th of March, a Memoir on the campaign, has at length just communicated his plan to me. We do not agree on all points. I shall not the less exert myself, as I have always done, to be successful. I wish, with all my heart, that I may be deceived; that he may be able to sustain himself everywhere, that the English may not come to Quebec, or that the navigation of the River St. Lawrence, often difficult, may afford him time to take those precautions which have been neglected, and might, in my opinion, have been taken beforehand.

M. Bernies, Commissary at War, who has succeeded M. Doreil, and who appears to me qualified to acquit himself well of the duties of his station, will render you an account of the actual strength and condition of our battalions and of the soldiers, which I shall determine, on reflection, ought to be sent to the Invalides; but 'twill not be by this vessel, not being able to make the review of our battalions until they will enter on the campaign. He will address you, likewise, some representations on the important subject of the high price of provisions, the impossibility of supporting themselves, under which our officers labor, unless you have had the goodness to procure for them an augmentation of pay; and whatever augmentation you grant them, you will never be able to make them live in this country unless sufficient nourishment be allowed them, or at least they be paid in bills of exchange of the first class. I beg you to pay great attention to this Commissary's Memoir, which has passed under my eyes, in order to solicit the Minister of the Marine on the subject. If M. Doreil be in Paris, he will be able to enlighten you, should that Memoir contain anything doubtful or obscure, always observing that every article has doubled since his departure, and is now tripled.

Perhaps the Marine, on considering the expenses superficially, will think the troops of the Line cost an immense sum in Canada. I proceed to explain that to you. If excessive expenses are incurred, they are placed under the name of Dépenses pour les troupes de terre, although they regard us not, because in Canada the Intendant's ordinance is the only authority for everything, without being a pièce probante. It only remains for me, Sir, to request the continuation of your former kindnesses; you have flattered me with them at all times; the post you occupy enables you to make me sensible of their effects, and I believe I deserve them by my zeal for the service, my attachment to your person, and the respect with which I have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. I annex to this despatch, Sir, an exact return of the English troops which are to be employed on this Continent. I beg of you to have the kindness to lay it before Marshal de Belle Isle; it is exact, as well as the interesting postscript I add in cipher, in support of that article.

According to news we have received, the English are building a fort at Chouaguen, and wish to construct one at the Bay of the Cayugas; this proves that the English want to be masters of Lake Ontario, and the fruit of the capture of Chouaguen will be lost by that of Frontenac, which the English effected last year. Should the English ever take Canada, the only means the King will have to secure to the Canadians the preservation of their rights and prevent them being transplanted, as has been the case with the Acadians, is to declare that Hanover and the Hanoverians, and the country of the King of England's allies, will be treated in every respect as the English treat Canada and the Canadians.

M. de Montcalm to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 12 April, 1759.

This despatch was in cipher. Canada will be taken this campaign, and assuredly during the next, if there be not some unforeseen good luck, a powerful diversion by sea against the English Colonies, or some gross blunders on the part of the enemy.

The English have 60,000 men, we at most from 10 to 11,000. Our government is good for nothing; money and provisions will fail. Through want of provisions, the English will begin first; the farms scarcely tilled, cattle lack; the Canadians are dispirited; no confidence in M. de Vaudreuil or in M. Bigot. M. de Vaudreuil is incapable of preparing a plan of operations. He has no activity; he lends his confidence to empirics rather than to the General sent by the King. M. Bigot appears occupied only in making a large fortune for himself, his adherents and sycophants. Cupidity has seized officers, store-keepers; the commissaries also who are about the River St. John, or the Ohio, or with the Indians in the Upper country, are amassing astonishing fortunes. It is nothing but forged certificates legally admitted. If the Indians had a fourth of what is supposed to be expended for them, the King would have all those in America; the English none.

This interest has an influence on the war. M. de Vaudreuil, with whom men are equal, led by a knavish secretary and interested associates, would confide a vast operation to his brother, or any other Colonial officer, the same as to Chevalier de Levis. The choice concerns those who divide the cake; therefore has there never been any desire to send M. de Bourlamaque, or M. de Senezergues, commandant of the battalion of La Sarre, to Fort Duquesne. I did propose it; the King had gained by it; but what superintendents in a country, whose humblest cadet, a sergeant, a gunner, return with twenty, thirty thousand livres in certificates, for goods issued for the Indians on account of his Majesty.

This expenditure, which has been paid at Quebec by the Treasurer of the Colony, amounts to twenty-four millions. The year before, the expenses amounted only to twelve or thirteen millions. This year they will run up to thirty-six. Everybody appears to be in a hurry to make his fortune before the Colony is lost, which event many, perhaps, desire, as an impenetrable veil over their conduct. The craving after wealth has an influence on the war, and M. de Vaudreuil does not doubt it. Instead of reducing the expenses of Canada, people wish to retain all; how abandon positions which serve as a pretext to make private fortunes? Transportation is distributed to favorites. The agreement with the contractor is unknown to me as it is to the public. 'Tis reported that those who have invaded commerce participate in it. Has the King need of purchasing goods for the Indians? Instead of buying them directly, a favorite is notified, who purchases at any price whatever; then M. Bigot has them removed to the King's stores, allowing a profit of one hundred and even one hundred and fifty per cent, to those who it is desired to favor. Is artillery to be transported, gun-carriages, carts implements to be made? M. Mercier, commandant of the artillery, is the contractor under other people's names. Every thing is done badly and at a high price. This officer, who came out twenty years ago a simple soldier, will be soon worth about six or seven hundred thousand livres, perhaps a million, if these things continue. I have often respectfully spoken to M. de Vaudreuil and M. Bigot of these expenses; each throws the blame on his colleague. The people alarmed at these expenses, fear a depreciation in the paper money of the country; the evil effect is, the Canadians who do not participate in those illicit profits, hate the Government. They repose confidence in the General of the French; accordingly, what consternation on a ridiculous rumor which circulated this winter that he had been poisoned.

We have been driven out of Fort Duquesne at the end of November. One might hope that such an operation would have been deferred by the English until April, but the enemy knew, by their Indians and our deserters, the too public order of M. de Vaudreuil, to evacuate. I have never had communication either of the instructions or news relating to the operations of the war, with which neither I nor Chevalier de Levis have been entrusted. If I have often proffered my advice, even in writing, it has been upon what I learned, the same as the public. Despite of all that will be written, the Indians of the Upper country are beginning to shake and to negotiate with the English. The Five Nations are ill disposed. M. de Vaudreuil alone has wished to persuade the court, that they had pronounced, and that such was his work. In managing in the best manner, neutrality might be expected; I have always written that this would be a great deal.

The loss of Fort Frontenac is a deadly blow, in consequence of the capture of our navy on Lake Ontario. Three months have been spent in deliberating, where new sloops should be constructed. We shall have two within twenty days, if the English do not come and burn them; our Iroquois Indians fear it. M. de Vaudreuil was told and reproached, in full council, that they had notified him three weeks before, respecting Fort Frontenac. They said to him: You are asleep; where is our War Chief? I was then at Quebec. At last Captain Pouchot, of the Bearn battalion, is going to command at Niagara; he ought to have been sent off last fall; he was capable and agreeable to the Indians. Such was promised me, but how resolve to dismiss a Canadian officer, however incapable and disagreeable to the Indians he might be?

All the preparations at Orange and Lydius announce that the English will come early to Carillon with a large force.

The enemy can come to Quebec, if we have not a fleet; and Quebec, once taken, the Colony is lost. Yet is there no precaution; I have written, I have spoken, as also have M. de Pont le Roy, the Engineer, an excellent man, and Sieur Pelegrin, captain of the Port of Quebec, a good seaman, for his part; I have offered to introduce some order, an arrangement to prevent a false manœuvre; on the first alarm to repel it; we shall have time.

I know nothing of M. de Vaudreuil's projects, still less how many Canadians he will be able to bring into the field, or how we are off for provisions and ammunition. The public tell me, we are badly off both for the one and the other, and the same public always believe the department of provisions ill governed. I ought to consider myself fortunate, under the circumstances, not to be consulted; but devoted to his Majesty's service, I have given my advice in writing for the best, and we shall act with courage and zeal, Chevalier de Levis, M. de Bourlamaque and I, to retard the imminent loss of Canada. It is foreign to my character to blame M. de Vaudreuil and M. Bigot, depositaries of his Majesty's authority in Canada. I am even attached to M. Bigot, who is an amiable man and a near relative of M. de Pussieux and of Marshal d'Estrées,<sup>1</sup> who honor me with their friendship. But I must write the truth to my Minister, to the Statesman.

I have written it to M. de Moras; I do not write anything to the present Minister of the Marine. 'Tis for my Minister to make use of what I write to him for the good of the state, without compromising me. If the war continue, Canada will belong to the English, perhaps this very campaign, or the next. If there be peace, the Colony is lost, if the entire government be not changed. The maxims of the book entitled L'ami de l'homme,<sup>2</sup> must be followed: to disgrace those who will return from Colonies with wealth, and to reward those who will return from them with the staff and scrip with which they had gone forth.

The general census of Canada has been at last completed. Though it has not been communicated to me, I think I'm correct, that there are not more than 82,000 souls in the Colony; of these, twelve thousand, at most, are men capable of bearing arms; deducting from this number those employed in works, transports, bateaux, in the Upper countries, no more than seven thousand Canadians will ever be collected together, and then it must not be either seed time or harvest, otherwise, by calling all out, the ground would remain uncultivated; famine would follow. Our eight battalions will make three thousand two hundred men; the Colonials, at most, fifteen hundred men in the field. What is that against at least fifty thousand men which the English have!

M. de Montcalm to M. le Normand.

Montreal, 12th April, 1759.

Sir,

Since our last despatches, dated in November, the enemy have obliged M. de Ligneris, Captain of the Colonial troops, commanding at Fort Duquesne, to abandon it, after having <sup>1</sup> LOUIS CESAR LETELLIER, Marshal d'Estrées, was born July 2d, 1695; he obtained in 1718, a regiment of Cavalry and served on the Spanish frontier; and afterwards in Bohemia and on the Rhine. In 1744, he was with the army in Flanders, and distinguished himself, the following year, at Fontenoy, and in 1746 at Rocoux, and in 1747 at Lafeldt. He rose to the rank of Marshal in 1756, and in 1757 was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the army destined to operate in Germany. He died, without issue, in 1771. Biographie Universelle. — Ed.

blown it up. He has retired to a pretended fort, called Fort Machault. You will, perhaps, be surprised at this expression. Permit me to tell you, Sir, that if the expenses incurred for the forts in Canada be examined in the bureaux of the Marine, one ought to be persuaded that there exist forts capable of stopping the enemy for some time, considering the amount they cost to build. But this is only the result of the immense robberies committed by all those employed at them, and of the high price of labor, the consequence of misgovernment; 'twill be always so as long as you employ Engineers of the country. The priests of St. Sulpice will preach in vain against robbing the King; the thing will never be corrected so long as the chiefs will seem to authorize it. You have, at present, a virtuous man, capable and disinterested, the Engineer in Chief in Canada; therefore is he opposed and detested by those whose profits he endeavors to pare down. If you compare the work accomplished at Carillon last year since the 8th of July, when it was confided to the King's Engineers, with that done by M. de Lobinière, a country Engineer, and the expense, you would be surprised at the difference; but how do you expect that M. de Pontleroy, or any other in his place, can, with honesty, remain in this country? He must rob, or be ruined, for his pay and allowances amount only to one hundred Louis d'or. You will object to me, that these are the emoluments allowed to his office since the time of M. de Lery, senior, a great ignoramus in his profession (it needs only to look at his works), who robbed the King like the rest. But in those times, the bounds were not overleaped as now a-days when every man fancies himself very modest, if he have not made 100 thousand francs in one campaign or a special commission. The same is the case throughout.

Sieur Meresco,<sup>1</sup> Commandant of the artillery, the creature, confidential agent of the two men in office, the man whom M. Hocquart has seen arrive as a recruit, is now, continually a party, under borrowed names, in all transactions which concern the forges, the transportation of artillery and implements; he must be worth a hundred thousand écus at present, and will have much more. Has the King need of goods? Instead of purchasing them directly, they are bought by favorites who buy up what remains in the shops, and those goods are taken immediately from them @ 150 per cent profit. The Upper country posts, all details relating to the Indians, are now regarded by the officers, storekeepers, commissaries, as opportunities to gain immense sums, in one season, by means of all sorts of fraudulent or inflated certificates, which the King is equally made to pay. Obtaining provisions by contract has, I am sure, been represented at the bureau of the Marine, as a profitable affair for the King. 'Twere time Sieur de la Porte were at the head of the bureau. Sieur Cadet is only the prête-nom of an over-protected company; what leads me to presume, with the entire of Canada, that this agreement must be one about which there would be too much to say is, that it is unknown, and that it has never been communicated to me or to any person else. I have, nevertheless, several times had occasion to give invitations, in this regard, in discussing points which had reference to the subsistence of the troops. All these irregular expenses are the cause of 24 millions having been drawn, last year, in bills of exchange, and this year bills will be drawn for 36. My business is not to manage the finances; but I fear not to assert that a more exact and strict administration would have diminished all the expenses one-third, allowing still considerable facility and generosity on the part of the King, as well as fortunes which, by being transferred to France at the peace, will impoverish this Colony. You already have several of them which have not waited for the moment of peace; our officers, who do not participate in these illicit profits, cannot live on their pay.

I shall have the honor of observing to you,

1<sup>o</sup> That provisions, absolutely necessary to life, cost eight times more than when the troops arrived in 1755, and that the farther we go, as long as the war will continue, the more will they increase, even though certain articles were in abundance; for the cause of this incredible dearness is less the scarcity, although that may contribute thereto, than what I am about to develop to you. The high prices proceed, 1st from the circumstance that, on the arrival of ships, some twenty individuals, who possess favor and credit, purchase everything, and thereby render commerce quasi exclusive.

2nd From rapid vast fortunes accustoming those who possess them to luxury and to not hesitating to pay too much for provisions, and to a contempt for money in consequence of the facility of regaining it.

3rd The farmer is frightened at beholding thirty millions of money in circulation in Intendant's orders and paper notes. People fear, I think, without foundation, that the government will commit a sort of bankruptcy or authorize a depreciation. This opinion induces them to sell and speculate at an extravagant scale and price, and this will be much worse if bills of exchange be issued this fall at five terms, as is reported. The King will be the greatest loser, because in this country, where he is purchaser and employer, his expenses will likewise increase. You will hardly believe one certain fact that, thirty-six livres in notes representing money in Canada, are paid for 24 francs in hard cash, and some farmers are beginning to offer double, because few people are willing to disburse their cash through fear of the paper. Any one able to draw bills of exchange on France for 25,000 écus, payable the 1st April, 1760, will find in the square of Quebec one hundred thousand francs in orders of the Intendant, and should the Intendant this fall issue bills of exchange only in five terms, 100,000<sup>fr</sup> will be procured for 66 @ 67 thousand livres.

4th I have alleged that there was 30 millions of money in circulation in paper, cards or silver, and there will be 12 millions more at the close of 1759. I suppose that there are at most 100 thousand souls in Canada; in the Kingdom of France, I do not suppose more than 1,400 millions of money in circulation, and more than 18 millions of souls; therefore, the proportion of money to the number of heads is six times greater in Canada than in France; hence, provisions and labor there must be six times dearer.

I doubt not, but on a superficial examination of the accounts of the expenditure in the Colony, you will think the chapter of those which concern the Regular troops considerable, by what has come to my ears and of which I have, however, only semi-proofs; that, as the Intendant's ordinance is the only authority (pièce probante) for the chamber of accounts in Canada, items are often transferred from one chapter to another, and certain expenses are increased to conceal others, and I have heard that such in general is the way people act in respect to the chapter of the expenses entitled Troupes de terre. This is so much the more easy, as we have not an accountant in our corps who checks them. I am aware that some of our officers would rob as well as others; but the Intendant is obliged to admit that we consume less, that we rob less; more order and fewer pluralities in office, and I will say further to you, Sir, that there would have been fewer of them, had people been willing to adopt the forms with which I am acquainted, because they are in practice in our administration in Europe. But what are these trifling abuses in comparison to those which accompany the expenses for fortifications, Indians, provisions and transportation.

I believe I have demonstrated to you the impossibility of our officers living on their pay; therefore, what they will owe in the Colony will be immense. They are all straight with the treasurer. I do not say as much for myself, who owe him 10,000 écus; but individuals loan them with great facility, through a desire to realize and a contempt of the (Intendant's) ordinances; I foresaw it so clearly, that I had it declared on my arrival and published by the Intendant, whom I required to do it, that the corps were not responsible for any debt, and that I would not enforce the payment of any, after the prohibition to lend, which I had again renewed last year. You will ask me, what means are there to support the officers in Canada? After mature reflection, you have only three to prevent application being made to you every year for an augmentation which will be necessary and ruinous to the King:

1st To order that each officer be furnished in winter, the same as when he is in the field, with one ration in its primitive state (en nature) for him as well as for his servant; thereby you assure his subsistence in bread and meat, and the object is but a trifle for the King, because, having a bargain made with his contractor, 'tis as if he fed, during winter, an augmentation of 4 @ 500 men.

2nd To confirm the supplement of pay which necessity and my representations have forced the Intendant to grant us; this is so much the more necessary and just, as you have seen, Sir, that the pay of his Majesty's troops has been augmented last year in Europe; now, we ought to participate in the same advantage.

3rd To order the officer's pay to be paid us in bills of exchange of the first term; 'tis only the difference in the payment of six hundred and seventeen thousand livres, the amount of the officers' salaries, in one payment instead of three. Provisions would rise in vain; he who will have bills at the first term will feel this increase of prices less, in consequence of the value given to the sort of paper he will employ in the purchase. These means appear to me to be better for the King than large augmentations of pay which it would be necessary to renew annually, and the officer would be hardly better off in consequence. Besides, my proposition to pay us in bills of the first class, is so much the more just as we ought to be paid in cash at the general Treasurer's of the Colonies, according to my view. Sieur Bernier, Commissary at war, transmits you a Return of the actual prices of provisions, of the prices in 1758, 1755 and 1751, accompanied by brief Observations. It seemed well to me.

It is very foreign to my character and birth, to write anything that may reflect on the depositories of the King's authority in this Colony. I am even attached to M. Bigot, who is a hard worker, a man of talent, and closely related to M. de Puisieulx and Marshal d'Estrées, who long honored me with their friendship. I am also sure that if I had not a desire to be a model of a man and perhaps have, by my exact conduct, the air of a censor, I would not owe 10 thousand écus, the rather as, if I wished, I could just as well as another formulate the expenses I would have ordered, and the small amount of those I alone have been charged with, has always had the appearance of a critic in this Colony. This has not been my intention, but to do my duty. I have entered into some details in this letter only through the high esteem I entertain, with all France, for you, Sir, and because it will be handed you by Count de Baschy, who will request that it be exclusively yours. You will, perhaps, be surprised that I mention to you the pay of the officer only, and not that of the soldier. The latter, who has his subsistence assured, who is clothed, who earns money by working, who is furnished with two pairs of shoes and two shirts a year, is well, and feels not, like his officer, any increase in the rate of provisions and merchandise.

No event of interest has occurred during the winter; some small parties in the direction of Carillon, where M. D'hebecourt, a captain in the regiment of La Reine, commands, for the purpose of taking prisoners who may be able to furnish news of the enemy. From all we can learn, the new General (Amherst) proposes to take the field early. The provincial assemblies of the various English Colonies met in the month of December; they have granted all the contingents demanded of them to carry the war on vigorously this campaign. The enemy will have in this quarter 22 battalions of troops from Old England, light infantry and 25 @ 30 thousand militia. I dare be responsible to you for the zeal of the troops of the line, and of their principal officers.

Although I be little informed of M. de Vaudreuil's views, of our resources in provisions and warlike stores, I have communicated to him, in writing, my reflections on the ensuing campaign; he has communicated his views superficially to me; although we do not agree on all points, I shall not do the less effectual execution, seconded by Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Levis and Bourlamaque. I wish that some event equally fortunate with that of the eighth of July of last year, may preserve this Colony.

The nature of the war in this Colony has radically changed. In days of yore, the Canadians thought they made it; it consisted of excursions like hunting parties; now, of regular expeditions. Formerly the Indians formed the basis; now, the accessory; other views, other maxims are therefore necessary. I say so, but old prejudices continue.

The bad situation of the troops would require an answer before the end of the campaign, should you receive this vessel in sufficient season to dispatch another this year. I have always represented; I have entered less into the true means, hoping from year to year for the termination of this thorny mission either by peace or a favorable answer from the Minister of the Marine. I enter into no detail with M. de Massiac; it is only, Sir, with you.

I am, &c.,

(Signed), MONTCALM.

P. S. I have the honor, Sir, to annex hereunto an exact return of the troops the English have in this quarter, and a particular observation which I have considered it my duty to write you in cipher, employing that which M. de Moras sent me last year.

M. Bigot to M. Berryer.

Quebec, 15th April, 1759.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to advise you in my letter of the 23rd November last, that I perceived more certificates of expense were coming in, since the commencement of the payments, from all the posts and forts of the Colony, than to the like date the preceding year, and that I was expecting the bills of exchange to be drawn in 1759 would exceed the number drawn in 1758.

I am now convinced that the excess will amount to 7 @ 9 millions, and that consequently the bills of exchange will this year be 31 @ 33 millions. I judge so, 1st, from the excess of expenses already come in and paid above those I caused to be discharged in November and December 1757 and the 3 first months of 1758, and from 2 or 3 millions which yet remain to be paid, as well for the purchase of goods last year in the posts of the Upper country as for those procured in Quebec and Montreal since the date of the last bills of exchange; 2nd, from the works and other extraordinary expenses authorized in the course of this winter and to be commenced as soon as the season will permit, which have not existed the preceding years; 3<sup>d</sup>, from the expenses occasioned by the enemy's destroying Fort Frontenac, both for the reimbursing the contractor for the provisions taken in that fort, and for the new establishments and erection of buildings at which men are working since the fall. This last item will amount to 3 millions at least.

Of all the expenses incurring in the Colony, I am acquainted with only a part, viz<sup>t</sup>: those in the interior between Camouraska and Montreal, such as expresses and voyages in that extent of country, unforeseen expenses, purchases of merchandise and certain works (façons d'ouvrages) at Quebec and Montreal, water and land carriage, construction of bateaux, pay of the land forces, salaries and other parts of the civil list, the allowance to the troops of the Line, and provisions and rations for the garrisons of the towns and the troops dispersed in the rural districts, casualties and others who are allowed rations; all these will amount together, at most, to only 9 @ 10 millions, according to the calculation I have had made thereof on the payments of 1758.

I am responsible for the expenditure of these sums, but I have no precise knowledge of the expenses incurred in the army or in the posts and forts; I meet them nevertheless, only on the certificates of the Commandants and other regular vouchers in good form. It does not thence follow that great frauds may not be committed; an Intendant could not introduce order therein except by suppressing the pretext for certain expenses, which cannot be done in war time.

The item of purchases of merchandise and other small expenses in the forts and posts is very great; the French there occasion in part that expense; they purchase twice and may be oftener, for Brandy and other trifles, the goods which the Commandant has issued to the Indians, and afterwards re-sell them to the King. These same Frenchmen put the Indians up to be continually craving, because they find their account therein, and to go up to a fort, especially one of the farthest off, is sufficient to realize a competency by this or other commerce. Were all the merchandises which are bought in Quebec and Montreal and the forts on the King's account, calculated, perhaps they would be found double what has entered in the Colony; this would happen from the purchases made in the forts; for those made at Quebec and Montreal are final, and once out of the stores never come back there any more.

The item of provisions in the forts, and of the consumption in the armies, is also very considerable in every respect, especially in what regards the Indians who always discover the secret of obtaining double and triple ration.

The King's stores are stripped of all sorts of goods; the last detachment for La Présentation have emptied them; and the Marquis de Vaudreuil informed me a few days ago, that he absolutely required a certain number of outfits and cloth for the Indians who would go down, and the movements previous to the arrival of the ships from France. I was informed that there were 100 bales of merchandise at La Chine which private persons were carrying to the Upper countries; I had them purchased. These bales will contain, with other effects I have had collected from divers merchants at Quebec, 80 @ 100 millions worth of merchandise at the prices in France, and will amount to at least 400 millions. How avoid expending an infinitude of millions with prices so excessive? You will be informed of all those prices and of the expenses incurred in 1758 by the memorandum in detail which I shall have the honor to address you by the last ships.

The war, besides, is now carried on in Canada in all respects as in Europe; the troops have their accommodations and a number of officers have as good cheer as in France, with the army. A part of the expenses which the King incurs in this war, is also to be attributed to that mode of carrying on the war.

The Marquis de Montcalm continues to complain of the bad treatment of the Officers of the Line; he says, they have not wherewith to live; tis true. Board is 300<sup>l</sup> a month, exclusive of wine; a Lieutenant cannot support himself at this rate. This General is impatiently waiting for a favorable answer from you to the demands he has made for a more liberal allowance and an order to distribute by battalion a sum in Bills of Exchange at sight.

As for myself, I have felt a pleasure in encroaching on my private funds in years of such scarcity; my emoluments do not authorize my keeping such a table as I keep; I daily invite the officers of the Regular and Colonial troops to it; I do so with the view of inducing them to support with more patience the severity of the country, and to promote union; this is more than ever necessary in the present circumstances; and it would require but a trifle to destroy it entirely, as these gentlemen are persuaded that their superiors are not on terms.

I have also procured for the people during the winter some amusements to divert them and make them forget the difficulty of living which they experience, and I have had the satisfaction of seeing that such has had its effect.

Commissary Bernier to M. de Creuille.

Montreal, 15th April, 1759.

Sir,

A small vessel is leaving here; I place little confidence in it; nevertheless, I would have to reproach myself, should it arrive, with not having profited by this opportunity, as I propose doing by all those which will offer.

After M. Doreil's departure on the 11th November, I assumed all the details of the office of Commissary, wherein I have followed the order which I found already established. I have made the inspections on the return from the campaign, and am now occupied with those which are to precede the opening thereof.

These inspections can be made here only with closed doors, on the returns of the hospitals, the mortuary extracts of the Priests of the country parishes and on the returns of the Majors. The battalions are in cantonments during the six or seven winter months, and occupy a district of more than 100 leagues. During a great part of that season, traveling is impossible either by land or water, and when they march, 'tis only in divisions and detachments, when a company is rarely altogether.

'Tis true, that when the troops are collected into corps d'armée, the Marquis de Montcalm is in the habit of making the reviews thereof, which he is pleased to communicate to the Commissary at War, whereby he derives a complete proof of his collation.

The news of yesterday was limited to the loss, in the month of November, of Fort Duquesne, which the Commandant has been obliged to blow up on the approach of a strong body of English, and to retreat to a place called Fort Machault, and to the vast preparations of the English who were marching in January and February towards Oswego, to rebuild it or enter on other enterprises.

We have been employed during the winter, building three sloops at La Présentation, in order to control Lake Ontario, and three Xebecs to protect Lake Champlain. This little navy, which is the most assured means of closing those two openings into the interior of the Colony, is to be ready at the breaking up of the ice.

The winter has been the severest experienced for seven or eight years. The river before Quebec is entirely taken. The effective of our battalions is nearly the same as in the return sent by M. Doreil to the Court in the month of October. The winter is very healthy in this climate, and the soldier lives happy and quiet with the farmer, without any duty to perform for nearly seven months. I address the Minister a list of the prices of all the articles in this Colony, especially of the commodities of the greatest necessity. I have added some observations to show that no real scarcity has ever existed in this country, and that the excessive and general dearness of all articles proceeds from a different cause, which it does not belong to me to explain. I annex to this return a long and detailed letter, in order to place nakedly before the Minister's eyes the situation to which the officers from France are reduced, especially the superior officers, who are obliged to make a decent and suitable appearance. I do not conceal therein the consequences which such a situation had nigh produced, were it not for the authority and remarks of the Marquis de Montcalm, and which it will finally produce, if the Minister does not provide against it. These documents will reach you. I pray you, Sir, to be pleased to give them a favorable attention and to contribute to their having the effects we expect from them.

How sad is that situation for the King, who incurs all the expense, and for the officers who have only their pay, in a discredited currency, to subsist on. The officers of the Colony have lands; trade; participate in business, have posts and commands; should commodities become ten times dearer, their fortune would always be on a par with the value of articles; their luxury and consumption, the same.

In fine, Sir, matters have come to the pass that will never be credited. Everything has generally reached a price seven times greater than it was in 1756. Peru has never had so much silver in circulation, regard being had to the number of men; thence it follows that the pay of the officer lacks seven-eighths of what it ought to be to allow him to subsist decently; therefore, do they all live obscurely, crush themselves by debts, and fail in necessary physical strength. The superior officers and those of rank can no longer support their character, and are confounded in the class of paupers.

I say nothing of myself in particular; notwithstanding my annual allowance of 6,000 livres, I am in debt to the Treasurer. I have sold a part of my clothes brought from France; I have lived, and lived ignobly, and my present situation is not equal to that of a sub-lieutenant at Metz. As I am equal to the other officers in rank, I, according to their example, remain silent and suffer.

I conclude my Memoir by pointing out a means of remedying this evil, without it costing the King a half penny, for none of us asks money. Should the King triple our allowances, he would aggravate the evils of the Colony, and would not increase our happiness.

I doubt not, Sir, but many other pens will draw you a like picture. I am bound to report to the Minister. I have endeavored to do so with the greatest possible order; as for the truth, I am not fearful of having exaggerated it.

Reserve for me the honor of your kindness and protection; let me be included in the general favors. His would be a soul void of nature, who, in the present conjuncture, dares to make application for himself alone.

I have the honor to be, with the most respectful attachment, Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), BERNIER.

M. de Montcalm to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 8th May, 1759.

My Lord,

I have the honor to address you duplicates of my despatches of the twelfth of April, by a vessel which is about to be sent off with intelligence of our situation.

We are always expecting ships and news from France.

The English are not in motion as yet. The information which their prisoners had communicated to us in February, appeared to indicate prompter movements. Some prisoners we took from them on the twenty-third of April, assure us that they are not to commence their march before three weeks, as they await final orders from court, and are desirous of making combined operations.

The two little vessels of sixteen guns, which were built this winter, to replace, in part, on Lake Ontario, the navy lost, through our fault, in the last campaign, have been lately launched and sailed immediately for Niagara, with the garrison composed of our troops and those of the Colony, all under the orders of Sieur Pouchot, Captain in the Bearn regiment, who had already been in command of that fort in 1756 and 1757.

M. de Bourlamaque, whose health is greatly restored, is on the march with a force of three thousand men, consisting of the battalion of La Reine, the two of Berry, the Colonial troops and Canadians. This corps will be reassembled and encamped on the heights of Carillon, between the fifteenth and twentieth of this month. The rest of the troops remain in their quarters; they hold themselves in readiness to march on the first notice. I am waiting here, with Chevalier de Levis, to see to what point it will be necessary to proceed; that will depend on the enemy's movements; their superiority forces us to receive the law from them in regard to our movements.

An Englishman, named Robert Stobe, has just made his escape from Quebec; he was a hostage for the capitulation of Fort Necessity in 1754; had been tried by Court martial in November, 1756, on an Order from the King, and condemned to be beheaded for illicit correspondence with the enemy. The execution of the sentence had been suspended, pursuant to his Majesty's intentions. He took some Englishmen along with him. This is his third escape. I do not know whether we shall be as successful as on the two former occasions in recapturing so well informed a man. You will admit, my Lord, that, having escaped twice, less liberty might have been allowed him; but whatever may be said or represented, the custom has been to keep too many English prisoners in this Colony, to detain them for too long a time and to allow them too much liberty. We learn from the New England papers, that they act as spies, and nothing prevents them transmitting intelligence and aiding in the escape of some of their most determined among them.

I have nothing to add to my preceding despatch to the Court. I am, with respect,

My Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

Quebec, 23rd May, 1759.

My Lord,

The despatches received by the Marquis de Vaudreuil from the Minister of the Marine, similar to those with which you have honored me, have at length determined him, as soon as he perceived that I was leaving Montreal, to occupy himself with the defence of Quebec, which appears menaced by an early visit from the English. I reached here in thirty-six hours and since yesterday night have already given activity to many necessary arrangements. The Marquis de Vaudreuil is to arrive in a few days. Chevalier de Levis remains at Montreal awaiting ulterior orders and to keep up a needful correspondence with M. de Bourlamaque, who commands the Carillon forces, and with the Commandants of the various posts towards Lake Ontario. In respect to other matters I refer you to the despatches of the 12th April, 8th and 16th of May, which will reach you by this vessel.

With all possible gratitude for the kindnesses with which you have been pleased to honor me, and with the most profound respect, I remain, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Quebec, 24th May, 1759, 7 o'clock in the morning.

My Lord,

You will receive by this vessel one of my letters dated yesterday, the 23rd, which I had the honor to write you at 7 o'clock in the evening. I was roused at midnight yesterday by couriers, who informed me of the arrival of 15 large ships of the line, which made their appearance on the 19th at the anchorage of Bick island, sixty leagues from this place. 'Tis assuredly the van-guard of the English army destined to attack Quebec. I have spent the whole night with M. Bigot, whose zeal equals his intelligence, sending off couriers and orders relative to everything that appears to us necessary. I fear not to tell you, my Lord, that our arrangements here are somewhat tardy. The Marquis de Vaudreuil will arrive to-morrow, or after; perhaps we shall be fortunate enough in getting some time from the English. I think we should have need of some. The Intendant and I have always been of that opinion, this winter, and were desirous to hasten arrangements in this quarter, where I should wish to have been a month ago. Fortunately we have here two of the King's frigates, La Pommone of Brest and La Tantalé of Rochefort. We are persuaded that the two frigates which sailed from Dunkirk have fallen into the hands of the English fleet. We have also received 15 ships belonging to the fleet commanded by Captain Kanry. Whether strong or weak, we shall fight somewhere or other, and perhaps be fortunate.

I have the honor to be,

My Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant.

MONTCALM.

We have here two lighters or flyboats from Brest.

Abstract of Despatches from Canada.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil and Bigot had on the 3rd December last, dispatched a schooner from Quebec with intelligence of the situation of Canada in regard to the last harvest, which turned out one of the worst. This vessel having been caught in the river by the ice, had not been able to sail again until the end of April with despatches from the Colony, amongst which are several letters, the first whereof had already arrived.

M. Bigot enters into a detail of the drawing of bills of exchange from Canada, wherefrom it appears that those which have been drawn in 1758, have amounted to 24 millions, one portion whereof arises from the expenses incurred in the preceding years, which have not been known and paid until 1758, exclusive of 1 million which had not been included in 1757. M. Bigot sees no remedy to the immensity of those expenses, although he is sensible that France could not sustain them. He attributes particularly these excessive expenses to those incurred at the posts, where the officer makes use of every pretext possible to draw the largest amount, on pretence of maintaining the Indians. He complains that the war is carried on in Canada with as many conveniences as in Europe, and says, he is occupied only in satisfying the troops of the Line, who give him more trouble than all the others.

The harvest having been most indifferent, the farmers will not sell their wheat at any price whatever; and when all the wheat in the country, over and above the farmers' support, will be seized by authority, the Quebec farmers will each have scarcely half a pound of bread a day until the arrival of succors from France. There is, besides, no salt meat, and very little fish.

12th of April, 1759.

He represents the scarcity of provisions as beyond all expression ; the poor farmer has been reduced, since the month of May last, to  $\frac{1}{2}$  a pound of bread, for which he is obliged to pay at the rate of 3<sup>s</sup> the pound ; the rich is reduced to 4 ounces, for which he pays at the rate of 8<sup>s</sup> the pound, and he secretly buys flour as high as 40<sup>s</sup> the pound ; fresh meat the same price ; pork is 3<sup>d</sup> the pound ; brandy 25<sup>d</sup> the quart ; wine 1,200<sup>l</sup> the barrel, and all sorts of merchandise 6 @ 700 per cent advance. He adds that this would not be a great misfortune, were the material not to fail ; that, having been desirous last December to reduce the people of Quebec to 4 ounces of bread per diem, he saw himself compelled to return to the half pound, in consequence of the popular fermentation he perceived, which obliged him to have a levy of wheat made by the contractor in the governments of Quebec and Montreal ; he has in like manner caused to be carried off for the support of the garrisons and for the rations supplied by the King, all the oxen and horses to be found in the country, where the farms will remain uncultivated for the want of ploughing and sowing. The farmers meet with such high prices for their commodities, that they sell all they possess ; they are gorged with money and are dying of hunger.

Provisions for the subsistence of the farmers of Quebec will hold out only until the end of May, and for the army until the 10th of July ; this he has effected by means of the tythes of the parish priests in the government of Montreal. The arrival of succors from France is expected with the greatest impatience.

He insists on the demand he had made for 4,000 barrels of pork and as many of beans for the farmers, and 8,000 barrels of flour additional, in consequence of the great distress occasioned by the bad harvest. He entertains greater fears for Canada from the want of provisions than from the enemy. He will have 600 persons more to feed this year, namely, the farmers of the River St. John, of which the English have become masters. He has been obliged to send to these poor people by land and on men's backs 3 @ 400 quintals of provisions, with some clothing.

They are aware at Quebec that the English will attack Canada by 3 different points with 60 thousand men.

During last autumn and winter, he has had 250 flat bateaux constructed for the conveyance of men and provisions to Lake Champlain ; some have also been built at Montreal for Lake Ontario, and at the Niagara portage for Lake Erie, which, added to the fitting out of two cruisers and one transport built at La Présentation, occasions immense expense.

15th April.

This letter relates to the expenses and drawing of bills of exchange of the present year, which will amount to 30 @ 31 millions.

17th ditto.

He requests that the Contractor's correspondents may be afforded means to freight some vessels, or to have them freighted by authority on the King's account, to supply the portion of the provisions which will fall short of those to be sent him this spring, so that he may receive that equivalent, in consideration of the greater exhaustion of the Colony at the close of this year. He adds, that the Contractor could not fulfil his agreement, were it not for the hope of an early peace, and that he would have already become bankrupt, had he not realized considerable gain from the merchandises he received in safety for 2 consecutive years, and especially from an English prize which has afforded him 1 million profit.

Finally, he reiterates his entreaties that the needful facilities may be afforded the Contractor for the conveyance of the provisions he demands, and for the transmission on the King's account, of the flour, pork and peas he needs for the relief of the farmers.

By letters received from the Marquis de Vaudreuil, we are informed of the following particulars relative to his negotiations with the Indians during the winter.

There is every reason for believing that the Nations on the Beautiful river and in its vicinity have made their peace with the English, since the evacuation of Fort Duquesne by Captain de Lignères of the Colonial troops in the month of November of last year.

Sieur de Lignères having retired to Fort Machault, he has been solicited by the Indians to abandon it, who represent to him that it was not strong enough to resist the English.<sup>1</sup> Meanwhile, the latter having built a fort above Fort Duquesne and making great preparations, the Indians have demanded of them the reasons thereof; who have answered that the Beautiful river belongs to them from its source to its mouth, and that they were going to Fort Machault to drive us thence.<sup>2</sup> This declaration creates great uneasiness among the Indians, who, at heart, have no greater love for the English than for the French, and it would not be difficult to determine them in our favor, had we presents to make, and succors to furnish, them.

Colonel Johnston continues haranguing them and making them presents to gain them over, especially the Five Nations. The Marquis de Vaudreuil was, in April, expecting intelligence of the success of this Colonel's negotiations.

Independent of the fort built by the English above Fort Duquesne, they have another above the village of the Chawanons, one at the River aux Cannes, whence they propose to proceed to the Illinois, and a 3<sup>d</sup>, which they call Fort Lowdon, on the River des Cherakis,<sup>3</sup> whereby they are enabled to keep in check the Nations towards Louisiana. Half the Flathead Nation is entirely on their side and the other half wavers. The Cherokees have allowed themselves to be gained by the presents of the English; so that, above and below the Beautiful river, we need not flatter ourselves with finding any allies among the Indians.

On the other hand, M. de Kerlerec, Governor of Louisiana, is asking for aid of every description to restrain the other Indians in the interior of the Colony adjoining Carolina;<sup>4</sup> and the Marquis de Vaudreuil, to whom that Governor has communicated the fermentation which exists among those Nations, represents that it is of the greatest consequence to send him those supplies. In fact 'twould be very advantageous for us to be able to gain over those Nations and to induce them to carry the war among the English of Carolina. This would be the true means of operating a diversion in Canada and obliging the English to divide the forces which they have in the latter quarter, and of apprehending nothing for the Illinois.

As for the rest, the Marquis de Vaudreuil has been informed by deserters and spies, that the English were to attack Canada by the Beautiful river, Niagara and La Présentation, by Fort Carillon, and by the river with a fleet from Europe, and by the River St. John.

Thereupon he has made the following arrangements: Sieur de Ligneris has remained with about 200 men at Fort Machault, which is not in a state to resist cannon; he is to fall back on Presqu'isle, if obliged. Captain Pouchot, of the Béarn battalion, has been sent first to La Présentation and thence to Niagara to command there, and he has been furnished with 300

Canadians, who had been designed for the Beautiful river, with orders to put himself in communication with Sieur Des Ligneris, to forward supplies to him, if Niagara be not attacked.

On the other hand, there are to be at La Présentation two corvettes of 10 12-pounders each with 25 soldiers and 25 Canadians, to discover what the enemy will possibly attempt on Lake Ontario, to prevent all surprise in the direction of La Présentation, and he has sent Lieutenant de Corbière, of the Colonials, with a detachment of 30 soldiers and 30 Canadians in canoes, also on a scouting expedition, to cover the corvettes, to notify them and the Commandants of Niagara and La Présentation, and to assure an asylum to the convoys.

In regard to Lake St. Sacrament, the Marquis de Vaudreuil has sent parties to discover the movements of the English, in order to make his arrangements accordingly; he expects to be vigorously attacked in that quarter; feels the importance of anticipating the enemy, whose movements he studies, in order to profit by the moment of their march to send off troops, militia and Indians; he arranges everything to that end, and should he receive succors from France betimes, will hasten the departure of his forces and will augment them; he has provided for placing limits to the enemy's progress, supposing they will make any; he has had two Xebecs built, which will carry artillery; they will be well armed and in a condition to dispute the passage through Lake Champlain.

As for the River St. John, the Marquis de Vaudreuil was engaged in the month of April in relieving the Acadians and Indians thereabouts, and as it will be most necessary to recall them into the heart of the Colony, he has dispatched Captain de Boishebert, this winter, to arrange and facilitate their migration. But these arrangements are not to be executed until the last moment, as it is essential to leave the farmers in that quarter as long as circumstances will permit. Consequently, he is to leave there a detachment of 50 Acadians under the command of an officer of the troops, so as not wholly to lose possession of that place.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil transmits, in cipher, a particular report of his arrangements on the river side, and for the interior of the Colony, which is annexed hereunto.

<sup>1</sup>The Marquis de Vaudreuil has written three private letters, in cipher, dated the 10th, 11th and 16th April.

He sends, with the first, copy of a letter from the Marquis de Montcalm on the operations of the next campaign,<sup>2</sup> with his answer and the plan of operations concluded on.<sup>3</sup> It appears, from M. de Vaudreuil's complaints, that too good an understanding does not exist between him and M. de Montcalm, and that the subaltern military foment considerably this division by their gossip.

By the second, the Marquis de Vaudreuil details everything he has to fear from the English in the different posts, the defensive arrangements he has made for them by falling back in succession, and the melancholy situation to which the Colony is reduced for want of provisions and goods of every description.

By the third, he asks that the Canadian contractors' correspondents be allowed the necessary facilities to replace, in the course of this year, such portion of provisions as he will not have received, in consideration of the exhausted condition of the Colony, where the harvest has been most indifferent, and no hope of a better this year, for want of seed, men and cattle.

PLAN OF FORT NIAGARA — Built and defended by M. Pouchot.
 [From Pouchot's Memoires sur la dernière guerre.]

Journal of the Siege of Fort Niagara.[Pouchot's Memoires sur la dernière Guerre, II, 42; III, 165.]

Fort Niagara is situate on the East point of the river of that name, which terminates in a triangle, whose base is the head of a horn work, 114 toises on its exterior side, all of earth, sodded interiorly and exteriorly; with a ditch eleven toises wide by nine feet deep, one half moon and two small lunettes or intrenched places of arms, with a covert-way and glacis proportioned to the works. The ditches have no revetment.

The fort (place) and half moon are palisaded on the berm. The other two sides are a simple intrenchment also in earth, sodded within and without, seven feet high inside and six feet thick on the summit of the parapet, with a fraise on the berm. These two sides of the intrenchments are on broken ground 40 feet in height. The river side would be accessible, although with difficulty. That of the lake is more perpendicular.

We must enter here into some details as to the condition of the fort at the time it was besieged. M. Pouchot had just completed the raising of the ramparts. The bastion batteries which were in barbet, were not yet finished; they were constructed of barrels filled with earth. On his arrival, he set men to work at oak blindages, 14 inches square and 15 feet long, with which he lined the rear of the large house on the lake side, the quarter most sheltered, in order to build an hospital there. Along the faces of the powder magazine he constructed, for the protection of the walls and to serve as casemates, a vast storehouse in pieces joined by a pinnacle at their summit, and in this house he placed the arms and armorers. 'Twill be remarked that such a work is excellent for field forts in wooded countries, and can easily serve for barracks and magazines. The shell falling only on an oblique plain, does it little injury, because such construction is very solid.

The garrison was composed of 149 men detached from the regiments of La Sarre, Royal Roussillon, Guienne and Bearn, under the orders of Captain Pouchot, of the Bearn regiment, Commandant; Captain de Villars of La Sarre; Captain de Cervies of Royal Roussillon; Lieutenant de Morambert of Guienne; Lieutenant Salvignac of Bearn; Lieutenant la Mitière of Languedoc; of 153 Colonials, under the orders of Captain de la Roche, of that service, Lieutenants Cornoyer and Larminac; of 133 Militia and 21 gunners, commanded by Lieutenant Bonnafoux of the Royal Corps. M. Pouchot increased this number to 100 drafted from the troops and from the most adroit of the militiamen; in all 456, and 39 employés, five of whom were women or children, who with two Douville ladies attended the hospital, sewed up gun cartridges and made earth bags.

7th July. Seven barges defiled from beneath the lofty perpendicular shores of the lake to reconnoitre the place. They were allowed to come together and to approach, but when 'twas remarked that they would not come any closer, some cannon were discharged at them, which soon drove them off. M. Pouchot immediately sent a boat to scout, which reported having seen at the mouth of the Little Swamp,<sup>1</sup> 15 @ 20 barges, each containing 20 men, who were at once considered the van-guard of the English army. He immediately sent off another scout, under the orders of the Lieutenant of the sloop, who reported having seen some barges and a camp on the shore, where there appeared to be a great many people and fires. Another scout, sent out two hours after, stated that he had discovered about 16 barges and a single tent, but a great many people were walking along the bank. The barges had all entered the little swamp, and the army was encamped in the woods.

M. Pouchot dispatched a courier immediately to M. Chabert, the Commandant of the fort at the Carrying place, with orders to fall back by the Chenondac,<sup>1</sup> in case he saw any traces of the enemy near his fort, lest he may be carried off. This courier also carried orders to bring down all the detachments, French and Indians, that may happen to be at Presqu'isle; also, orders to M. de Lignery at Fort Machault,<sup>2</sup> to fall back on Niagara with all the French and Indians he may have, enjoining on them to form a small van-guard to observe if the Little fort was abandoned, and in that case to pass by the Chenondac to Niagara, and leave merely a detachment to protect their bateaux and effects.

At noon he sent out the corvette L'Iroquoise with a month's provisions, to cruise off the Little Swamp. The wind was S. and S. W. She cannonaded the enemy's camp. In the course of the day, some scouts appeared near a copse, 2 @ 3 feet high, although M. Pouchot had, when he arrived, caused a portion of it to be cut down. Several Indians also appeared, who were looking for a shot. A few cannon balls made them retire.

At night, a Pouteoutamis and Sauter came from the fort at the Carrying place. M. Pouchot proposed to them to go out on a scout during the night, and gave them a Huron, who was in the fort, as a companion. They went along the perpendicular banks of the lake as far as the large wood at the end of the clearance, and returned by the centre of the clearance without having seen anything. An hour before day, the Pouteoutamis, who was very brave, returned thither alone. He left by the precipitous banks of the lake towards the angle which it forms in front of the place; met a canoe with three men in it, and fired on the middle one, who was wounded. The other two discharged their guns at him, without hitting him, and fled. He made the rounds of the clearance, uttering a great many bravadoes to the hostile Indians.

5th M. Pouchot sent him back in company with two Frenchmen, to M. Chabert with a letter. Being uneasy as to his situation, they dispatched one of their party to him, with word that they had seen the trails of some forty men in the woods. As these trails came from up the river, M. Pouchot feared some of the enemy had crossed over, which rendered him uneasy about those who were to come on that side; he therefore sent out to have those woods searched, but nothing was discovered within the space of a league.

The corvette was signaled at noon to send in her boat. The Lieutenant who came reports that the enemy had formed a camp on a small eminence at this side of the Little swamp, to guard the bateaux; that they appeared to be from 3 to 4 thousand men, and were very busy on the edge of the clearance towards the lake, and were making abatis at which 400 men appeared to be employed. M. Pouchot surmised that this might be the place where they were forming their dépôt for the trench. The guns of the corvette annoyed them so much that they were obliged to quit their camp and get under cover. They fired some 12's at that vessel. M. Pouchot ordered the corvette to take up a position opposite the mouth of the Little swamp, to prevent convoys entering or bateaux going out to carry their artillery to the dépôt, which was a league and a quarter from the swamp; this would protract their labors. He ordered the Captain of that craft, if overtaken by a squall, to reënter the river, and get close to the shoal which is under the fort. These precautions obliged the enemy to carry on all their operations by land, and protected the place which might be easily insulted from the lake and river sides.

In the afternoon some hundreds of Indians, who came to fire at the fort, made their appearance in the copse of the clearance. They were driven off by artillery loaded with grape; some of them were killed. At sunset M. Pouchot sent to fetch a Frenchman and two Indians from the other side of the river. The former was the storekeeper's brother that had been sent to raise the Missisakis. He returned accompanied by only one. The rest had gone away on seeing the Little fort burnt, which they imagined had been done by the English. The other Indian was an Iroquois whom M. Chabert<sup>1</sup> had sent with a letter announcing that he would come the next day. He had removed to the River Chenondac all the property he could, 20 horses which belonged to him and some oxen he had brought down on his own account from Detroit. He burned the fort of the Carrying place, as 'twas not tenable. His brother, Joncaire, had arrived on the previous evening, having been brought down by the Iroquois, the bearer of the letter. M. Pouchot made him a present.

About ten o'clock, a white flag was displayed in the clearance. M. Pouchot sent to reconnoitre it with precaution. A Captain of the Royal Americans was conducted to him with eyes blindfolded. He was led through the thickest and densest brushwood, and handed to the Commandant, after the bandage was removed from his eyes, a letter from Brigadier Prideaux, stating that as the King of England had invested him with the government of Niagara, M. Pouchot had to surrender the place to him; if not, he would oblige him to do so by superior force which accompanied him. M. Pouchot answered that he did not understand English; that he had no reply to give. Yet he perfectly understood the letter. The officer insisted on the great force he had. M. Pouchot replied that the King had confided that place to him; that he was in a position to defend it, and was in hopes that M. Prideaux would never enter it, and that before he became acquainted with them, he should at least assuredly gain their esteem. He had breakfast furnished to the young officer, and had him sent back with eyes blindfolded, to the place whence he had been brought.

In the afternoon La Force, the commander of the corvette, sent word to M. Pouchot that he saw no more barges nor dépôts on the strand, and but few people on the banks above. Thereupon M. Pouchot sent a sergeant in a bateau, who went up on the other side of the river, and reported having seen a great many people working at La Belle Famille,<sup>2</sup> from which circumstance 'twas inferred that they designed opening the trench that night. In the evening, some men in their shirt sleeves appeared on the confines of the clearance to the right of the place, who seemed desirous to open a trench. Three or four guns were discharged at them and they withdrew; which showed that it was not the place where they intended opening the trench.

The great quietness of the enemy that day, caused their operations to be distrusted. M. Pouchot, consequently, placed Captain Villars of La Sarre, in the half moon with 60 men; Lieutenant de Morambert and 30 men in the place d'armes, intrenched by the covert-way on the left; Lieutenant Cornoyer and 30 men in that of the right; Captain de Cervies, with 70 men occupied the salient angle of the covert-way of the lake bastion as far as the salient angle of the covert-way of the half moon; Lieutenant de Larminac and 40 men on the beach under the high bank of the lake bastion, behind the palisade; Captain de la Roche with thirty men at the salient angle of the bastion of the covert-way of the Five Nations bastion; M. Chabert with 60 men on the platon beneath that salient in the rear of the palisade which ran into the river; 25 men were stationed at each bastion. These different posts furnished all the necessary sentinels. The 100 gunners were distributed among the batteries. There only remained M. Bonnafox, the officer of Artillery, and Lieutenant de Salvignac of the Bearn regiment, who acted as Major. Such was the arrangement every night throughout the siege. In the day time the soldiers were occasionally relieved, in order that they should get some sleep, or employed in the different jobs which the operations of a siege demanded.

This night M. Pouchot sent out a scouting party of 30 volunteers, among whom were three or four Indians. They passed to the right, the centre and the left; fired at some hostile Indians who had crept as far as a cemetery 50 toises distant from the glacis. A Huron who had strayed from the detachment of the right, was wounded by one of our Indians whilst endeavoring to rejoin his detachment.

10th At daylight it rained, accompanied by fog, which shut out the field of operations until the day was advanced, when a parallel was discovered at more than 300 toises, which ran from about the centre of the front of the fortifications, slanting towards the left, and the lake. It commenced in somewhat low ground which ordinarily was overflowed, but was dry on account of the great drought, and thus greatly facilitated the opening of the trench, which, otherwise, the English would have been obliged to commence further off.

Both extremities of this parallel were battered with four pieces of cannon, though it rained heavily. The enemy appeared to work with a will. At night the guns were directed on the left portion, because 'twas thought that they intended advancing on that side. M. Chabert and his brother Joncaire arrived at noon with 70 persons, several women and Indians, three Iroquois; among the rest the chief Kaendaë. The Indians were pretty quiet.

11th This parallel was perceived in the morning somewhat advanced towards the left; it was briskly battered. They set about perfecting it in the day time, and were remarked throwing up batteries. They were harassed as much as possible by our artillery.

In the afternoon, M. Pouchot, being desirous to remove some stockades which were between the parallel and glacis, to form embrasures, detached some men in order to support those who were to bring back those pickets. They advanced, of their own accord, as far as the elevation at the head of the enemy's trench. They were followed by some sixty men who escaped from the covert way, and fired into the boyau of the trench. The enemy, who felt confidence on account of our small number, were tolerably off their guard, and abandoned that part. One man ran to advise M. Pouchot that no person was there. Knowing those fellows better, he ordered the man to go and tell M. de la Roche, who allowed himself to be drawn out, to retire with his troops. In that interval all the soldiers and Militia leaped over the palisades of the covert way in spite of the officers, to follow the rest. The garrison was on the point of being engaged with the entire English army, because their Indians, numbering at least 900, and all their troops, came, at the moment, to form themselves in order of battle at the head of the trench. By the officers' precautions we were fortunate enough not to go too far. The enemy were checked by a very brisk fire from the artillery, which prevented them charging our men. The English failed not, in the meantime, to lose some people, as they were under the necessity of remaining exposed. They had also to stand to their arms until night.

This affair gave rise to a very singular adventure. Kaendaé, the Iroquois chief, demanded permission to go and speak to the Indians of his Nation. M. Pouchot did not consider that he ought to refuse him, the rather as he hoped by means of this Indian to prevail on some Senecas at least to abandon the army. The Iroquois agreed to a parley at the edge of the clearance; the result was that the Five Nations would send two deputies to M. Pouchot to ascertain his opinion of them. They asked him for a pass endorsed by M. Joncaire whom they regarded as one of their chiefs. They were brought blindfolded into the Commandant's room, who recognized Tonniac's nephew who had left him 5 @ 6 days before the arrival of the English. These deputies said they knew not how they became mixed up with this war; that they were ashamed of it. M. Pouchot asked them what cause of war he had given them; that they ought to recollect they had given him the name of Sategariouaen<sup>1</sup> and that he had never deceived them. He expressed his surprise at seeing any Iroquois in the English army, particularly several who had evinced a great deal of affection for him; that they could see, by the way he fought, that he should not spare his enemies, and that his heart was bleeding at the thought of it being possible for him to strike any others than those Whites with whom he was at war. He invited them not to meddle any more in the quarrel and assured them he should not think any more about it. He concluded by notifying them that all the Upper Nations were constantly coming to his aid. Should they find themselves then in the case of shedding their blood, he promised them to interpose his authority to get them to make peace. He gave them a large belt to carry this message to their Nation.

The Missisakis who were present, wished also to speak in their turn. They expressed their pleasure at hearing the Iroquois speak of accommodating matters; that their Nation, which was numerous, would be flattered thereby; invited them not to let go their father's hand any more; that for themselves their stand was taken; they would die with him, leaving to their Nation the duty of avenging their deaths.

The Pouteotamis said to them: "Uncles: The Master of Life hath assembled us altogether on this Island.<sup>2</sup> Who hath more sense than our ancestors? Were they not the first to extend the hand to the French? Why should we not be attached to them? We do not know the English. We are charmed at your intention to stand well with our father. This is the way for us not to let go each other's hands." These speeches were continued until nine o'clock at night when the deputies were led back blindfolded. They promised to return with an answer on the morrow.

This interview caused the firing to be suspended on both sides. The enemy took advantage thereof to open a boyau of about 40 toises which otherwise might perhaps not have been done. This was a lesson for M. Pouchot.

12th At day-break, a very large pile of earth was discovered within 200 toises, apparently prepared for a battery. 'Twas battered with 11 guns, which did great execution. No sap dared to be advanced outside it, as they were briskly peppered the moment they showed themselves. In the morning, Kaendaé again requested permission to go out and hold a council with the chiefs of his Nation. M. Pouchot had no objection, warning him that he would not listen to a suspension of any of his operations, as the Whites took advantage of these intervals to work. He added that, should his compatriots resolve to come and speak to him, they were to carry a small white flag, when they should not be fired on, but admitted, provided they were few in number.

At 3 o'clock in the afternoon, Kaendaé returned with an Onondaga chief, called The Suspended Belt, and two Cayugas, who presented M. Pouchot with a large white Belt in answer to his, saying: We have heard thy message; it bore truth; our side is taken; we abandon the English army, and as a proof of it, are going to camp at La Belle Famille.<sup>1</sup> They thanked him for having given him such good council and for being pleased not to entertain any spite against them. They promised to be quiet in future. Kaendaé's council with the Iroquois had been held in the presence of Johnson, to whom that chief spoke boldly, reproaching him with having plunged his Nation into bad business. Johnson smiled, and took this reproach as a joke.

By another Belt, they asked that Kaendaé, the Iroquois women and children who were in fort, should leave it with Joncaire, whom they regarded as one of their people, so that no kettle (as they called the shells) should break their heads, especially Kaendaé's, who had charge of their transactions with the Indians of the other Nations, all of whose language he spoke.

M. Pouchot answered them, that the women and Kaendaé being present, were at liberty to answer and do as they liked. Kaendaé had assured M. de Chabert that he did not wish to leave us. He made no answer. M. Pouchot performed the ceremony, in presence of the deputies, of covering his body in advance, in case any mishap should overtake him. That ceremony consisted of placing before a person a Belt and outfit, such as is laid in his grave. His death cannot be avenged, as the man is satisfied. The women and children afterwards presented some Strings to M. Pouchot, to assure him they wished to remain with us, who were their fathers, and who had always pity on them.

These deputies also presented some Strings on the part of the Loups, or Moraiguns, who were in the Iroquois council, to induce the Ottawas and other Indians to withdraw to the head of the lake, and to leave the Whites to fight, as they themselves were going away. These two messages seemed to M. Pouchot to be inspired by the English, to disgust those Nations who were attached to us. M. Pouchot answered that he did not know those Nations who sent these Strings, and returned them. He said that, as regarded the Ottaouais and other Nations who were attached to us, they needed no council how to conduct themselves towards their father; that they were at home at Niagara, and he considered it very singular that people with whom they were not connected, should desire to induce them to quit their home. These Outaouais answered the deputies that they had come to die with their father, and told the Iroquois that they were delighted to learn they were leaving the English. M. Pouchot did not wish to return the message of the Loups, which he thought did not come from them.

The same deputies proposed to return at night. M. Pouchot refused; assuring them that all he wanted was, that they should remain quiet. He notified them that at night he did not know any one, he fired everywhere, but if they came in the day time, few in number, without any condition, that he would receive them. He sent them back each with a loaf, because he knew that the English army was eating only flour baked into cakes in the ashes.

To explain these negotiations, it must be observed that the English were employing the Indians at night to cover their workmen. Our fire from the covert way greatly annoyed them; they had lost ten of their men. M. Pouchot, who understood the nature of those people, was not sorry to get rid of 900 men, whose insults he feared more than those of the English, on account of their numbers and the knowledge they possessed of the place. By retaining some of the chiefs, the women and several warriors of the strange Nations, should any mishap occur to them, these same Indians would answer for it to their Nations or to those that they might have offended. They were delighted then to find this excuse for remaining neutral whilst awaiting events. The English on their side, dared not deny the Indians those conferences. They were trying only to turn them to the best advantage.

The Indians being gone, M. Pouchot immediately sent eight volunteers, under M. Conoyer's orders, who went quite close to the battery and heard some pickets planted. Otherwise the trench was pretty quiet. On their return, the artillery opened pretty briskly on the battery, and the musketry, on the right and left where they were to defile. M. Pouchot ordered the corvette to go and reconnoitre Chouegen and to try and learn news of M. de la Corne and of Mont-Real. This corvette cannonaded the enemy's trench pretty successfully throughout the day and sailed at night.

13th At day light Mess<sup>rs</sup> Pouchot and Bonnafoux examined the enemy's works, who had only completed a shell battery of six mortars. It fired all day with little result. We did not fire much this day from our batteries, the enemy's works being too far advanced to be able to ruin them. At night we perceived a white flag and some Indians on the other side of the river. Kaendaé demanded permission to go in search of them, which was not refused. They were some Indians coming to a council; they asked to pass the night in the fort. This M. Pouchot would not consent to. The fire of our batteries and that of our musketry were pretty brisk, but not so much so as during the previous nights, because there was no further necessity of imposing on the Indians who were covering the workmen. These Indians had told Kaendaé that they had all gone to La Belle Famille and would remain neuter. They told him also that it was reported in the camp of the English that the latter had defeated M. de la Corne at Chouegen.

14th In the morning we discovered a work, of 40 @ 50 toises in prolongation of the trench, slanting towards the lake; its extremity was within 100 toises of the covert way. They immediately set about a mortar battery from which they fired in the afternoon. Kaendaé and Chatacouen asked leave to go and speak to their people. M. Pouchot hesitated about permitting them, but the hope of obtaining some news induced him to grant them leave. They visited the Iroquois and English camps; reported having seen about 1,800 men; one of their camps was at the Little swamp and another nearer the trench; they had perceived 10 mortars, two batteries and 15 guns, three of which were of large calibre. Johnson had persuaded the Indians to remain, by offering them the pillage of the place which they were to assault in two or three days; finally, they had but few provisions and were expecting a convoy. No more Indians were seen in the trench from this day. The Iroquois asked to go to the other side of the river, through fear of the shells, a hundred of which had been thrown during the day. M. Pouchot had them put across the river with their women, very glad to be rid of them. They had been to the Chenondac<sup>1</sup> to take the M. de Chabert's cows and oxen, saying, 'Twas better they should have them than others. They carried this meat to the English camp. The enemy have been employed perfecting their works. We have kept up a very brisk fire on the place at which we supposed they wanted to commence the continuation of their trench towards the lake.

15th At day-break they appeared working at the battery. They have thrown, throughout the whole day, a great many shells with 10 mortars. We had several wounded by splinters. In the evening a deserter came in; he was a sort of Frenchman who was with some Iroquois of Kunoagon. He reported that the English army was composed of Halket's, the Royal American, Loudon's, the York and Jersey regiments, and 900 Iroquois or Loups; that they had formed three camps, one at the Little swamp, another near the lake, one in the middle of the woods, and the Indians at La Belle Famille he said the English were to put their guns, consisting of 15 pieces, in battery next day; and added, that they were short of provisions; that the Indians were complaining of being obliged to fast; that they were expecting a convoy from Chouegen where they had a considerable camp, from which M. de la Corne was repulsed when he attempted an attack on it.

16th Rain all day. Two barges appeared at a great distance in the lake; the 12-pounder could scarcely reach them. They wished to reconnoitre the place. The enemy opened a fire of musketry from their trenches. They had crowned the top of their trenches with saucissons in order to cover their sharp shooters.

17th The fog, which is pretty rare in this country, especially in summer, and rises only very late, prevented us observing that the enemy had made new works. They unmasked their artillery by a cannon shot from Montreal point at the opposite side of the river, which entered the Commandants chimney and rolled beside his bed on which he had just lain down. They had erected, at that place, a battery of two large guns and two howitzers. They unmasked, at the same time, two other batteries, one of five guns, the other of two large pieces and two howitzers. They were all served that day with great industry, and were answered in like manner. The battery on the opposite side of the river obliged the construction of épaulements and blindages, because that part of the place being covered only by an intrenchment, the shots took, in reverse, the bastions and other defences of the fort. During the night a very brisk fire of musketry was kept up on our side, and the enemy replied as briskly up to midnight, when they ceased. They threw shell and grenades, at intervals, throughout the entire night. M. de Morambert was slightly wounded.

18th In the morning there was no appearance of the enemy having advanced any works. They appeared busy repairing the damages caused by our batteries. A great smoke was noticed in the evening in their trench. One of our balls had set fire to one of their powder dépôts. General Prideaux<sup>1</sup> was killed on this day, in the trench. The fire was pretty brisk on both sides, and redoubled at night, with shot, shell and grenades, which gave us great annoyance. Several soldiers were wounded, and some killed. At night, believing that the enemy was to begin on his left to form a zigzag ahead, or to open a parallel, we kept up a very active fire.

19th The enemy were observed to have made about 30 toises of work in advance, parallel to the bank of the lake, by a double sap, whence they opened a zigzag boyau almost equal to the front between these two batteries. They merely perfected it through the day, and kept up a hot fire from cannon, mortars and howitzers. We answered them very briskly from our artillery.

In the afternoon the corvette made her appearance. She was lavouring at a great distance. At sundown M. Pouchot sent off seven men in a bark canoe, which run great risk of being sunk by the volleys of cannon from the enemy, one of whose balls carried away a paddle. As the enemy was expected to advance further, a very active fire was kept up from the covert way and corresponding works.

20th At daylight we noticed that the enemy had formed the other branch of the zigzag; that they passed from our right to the left, to the edge of the high precipice of the lake, quite near a ravine which lies 30 toises in advance of the left branch of the covert way. They kept up a very hot fire especially of their musketry, until midnight. Ours somewhat slackened towards daybreak, in consequence of the exhaustion of the troops and the bad condition of our arms. They perfected that trench the whole of this day and posted some sharp shooters in it, who greatly annoyed those who were tending the battery of the lake bastion, where several were killed and wounded. The canoe sent to the corvette came ashore this night. The vessel had brought despatches from Montreal and Quebec, where they were uneasy about us, but they knew not of our being besieged. They gave intelligence of the operations of the English at Quebec. About ten o'clock in the forenoon, M. Pouchot sent back the canoe with his despatches for Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil and de Montcalm.

21st At daybreak we observed that the enemy had constructed the return of his zigzag from left to right, running towards the salient of the half moon, which they could not reach on account of the sharp fire we made throughout the entire night, to which they replied very briskly until about one o'clock in the morning. This work is about 70 toises long. It appeared this day that they wanted to erect a battery at the extremity of this boyau, towards the salient of the half moon. The enemy's fire was not as lively during this day as during the previous evening, because they were busy finishing their trenches and constructing their batteries. Their musketry nevertheless greatly annoyed our batteries.

About 7 o'clock in the evening, the enemy redoubled their fire from their last parallel. It has been very hot until past midnight. Several men were killed and wounded in the place. We answered very briskly by our fire from the works and covert-way, where three guns have been placed which fired each 50 rounds loaded with grape. A squall, which lasted but too short a time for us and would have flooded their trenches, interrupted this firing.

22nd At day-break we supposed the enemy had extended a parallel along a ditch which was at the extremity of the glacis; but they only perfected those works and their two batteries. That on the left, of 8 guns, was more advanced than that on the right. Their fire from the trench of their right, on the lake bastion, was very heavy, and from the left, on our works, which they seriously annoyed. They fired few shell.

Towards 9 o'clock in the morning they commenced to send us red hot shot from the battery placed on the opposite side of the river. The battery where their large guns were planted did the same. Owing to M. Pouchot's precautions in keeping barrels full of water in front of the buildings, and squads of carpenters ready with axes to repair to places exposed to the flames, the fire made no ravages although it had commenced at divers places, even in the storehouses; this was by no means astonishing, all those buildings being of wood. The enemy could never understand it. They directed their fire, which was very hot, against the battery of the lake bastion in order to prevent its playing. M. Bonnafoux, the officer of artillery, was slightly wounded and ten men were killed or wounded. The cannon and howitzers dismounted three of the five guns which were on the same bastion; ruined the point of that bastion so that we could not descend on the berm. The shell ploughing into the ground and then exploding, tore away the newly laid sodding, and at each explosion made openings of 6 @ 8 feet. At night the enemy opened from their parallel a very hot fire on our works and discharged shot and grape at the breach and the attacked bastion. 'Twill be observed that our batteries on the bastions, which were at first formed of barrels filled with earth, having been ruined, they had to be constructed of bags full of earth, which, being laid across each other, formed pretty efficient merlons, easily changed according to the direction of the fire. Unfortunately, these earth bags gave out, being soon torn, worn or burnt in the service. Wadding for the cannon also failed, as well as hay, the supply made by M. Pouchot being exhausted. The beds were stripped of their paillasses, the straw of which, at first, afterwards, the linen, was used.

In the night of the 22nd and 23rd, the enemy pushed their trench forward as far as the hauteur of the salient of the covert way of the half moon, and kept up all night a hot fire of grape and shot against the breach, as well as of musketry, and threw a great many shell. He was answered from the place, but our arms were in so bad a condition, that scarcely one out of ten was serviceable, and in the following morning not a hundred were of any use, notwithstanding all the repairs daily made on them. Seven smiths or armorers were continually employed to repair them. Servants and the wounded were kept washing them; the women attended the sick and wounded, or were busy sewing cartridges or bags for earth. This day M. Pouchot was under the necessity of leaving only a small post of soldiers in the branch of the covert way of the attacked bastion, as the Canadians did not wish to remain there any longer, on account of the briskness of the enemy's fire. Efforts were made to repair the breach and the palisades of the berm below, but with little success, notwithstanding the willingness of the soldier to work there. At 10 o'clock in the morning, a white flag appeared on the road from La Belle Famille to the Carrying place. M. Pouchot responded by a like flag. 'Twas four Indians sent by Mess<sup>rs</sup> Aubry and de Lignery. They were brought in; they handed two letters, one dated the 17th and the other 22nd July, in the former of which, from Presqu'isle, was acknowledged the receipt of those from M. Pouchot of the 7th and 10th stating that they had immediately set out from Fort Machault; that they felt able to engage the enemy with success and to oblige them to raise the siege. In these same letters, they asked M. Pouchot's advice as to the best course to adopt to relieve him. These Indians told M. Pouchot that they had passed through the camp of the enemy's Indians, with whom they had held a council in Johnson's presence; that they had presented the Iroquois with five Belts on the part of the Nations who were accompanying M. de Lignery, requesting them to retire; otherwise, they should strike them the same as the English. The latter assured them that they would not meddle with the quarrel. By the same channel we learned that there were about 600 French and 1,000 Indians,<sup>1</sup> who, when passing the little rapid at the outlet of Lake Erie, resembled a floating island, so black was the river with bateaux and canoes.

M. Pouchot immediately answered these letters, after having deliberated with all the officers of the garrison, in order to profit by their opinions. We shall repeat here that M. Pouchot had in his letter of the 10th, notified M. de Lignery that the enemy may be 4 @ 5 thousand, exclusive of Indians; that if he did not feel able to attack them, he ought to pass by the Chenondac in order to arrive at Niagara by the other side of the river, because he would be able to drive off the English who were on that side to the number of only 2,000, and could only with great difficulty be reinforced. He would come from there safely to him, because after defeating that force, bateaux would be sent to bring them to the fort.

M. Pouchot doubted not that the English would read his answer on the return of the Indians; but he was satisfied if it could only reach its destination. He requested M. de Lignery to call to mind what he had already written him; told him that the enemy were in three divisions; one at the Little swamp guarding their bateaux, another about the centre of the wood near their trench dépôt, and the third convenient to La Belle Famille; that there may be at present about 3,900 Indians; that if they felt themselves strong enough to attack any of these divisions, this was at present the best course to pursue, because the enemy, being very near the place, dare not strip its trench. He added, that if they succeeded in defeating one of those posts, 'twas presumable the siege would be raised; that they ought to have scouts ahead, whose reports would enable them to decide on the best course to adopt.

M. Pouchot made four copies of this letter and handed one of them to each of the Indians; one of whom was an Onondaga, the second a Delaware, and the third a Chaouanon, so as to avoid jealousy, and in case the English should retain any to save one, which turned out to be the case.

After having refreshed themselves, those Indians departed with the same ceremony. About two o'clock in the afternoon the Onondaga came back stating that he had lost his wampum, which is tantamount to a European losing his jewels; that he had returned in quest of it, and had entrusted his letter to another Indian. M. Pouchot, thereupon, considered this Indian rather as a spy than a friend, and accordingly distrusted him. The result showed that he was mistaken.

The enemy kept up, the whole day, a tremendous fire, during which their artillery was served in the best style, utterly demolishing the battery on the flag bastion; only two feet of the upper part of the entire length of its parapet remaining. 'Twill be remarked that the evening previous, we had been obliged to construct our embrasures with bundles of peltry for want of other material, and to use blankets and shirts from the stores for wadding for the cannon. Efforts were made to place two guns in battery on the left side of the curtain, in order to diminish the enemy's fire.

The Canadians could no longer be persuaded to continue firing into the enemy's embrasures, which would have greatly deranged them. The fire was too hot. Those who were stationed in any quarter, sat down for protection, and went immediately to sleep, notwithstanding all that the officers and sergeants could do to prevail on them to stand to their posts and work. The rest of the garrison, in spite of all possible willingness, was not less harassed. Nobody had been in bed since the 6th, being obliged to be either in the works or employed at divers indispensable operations. So few people were remaining, that there was neither time or convenience for sleeping.

At night the enemy's fire slackened considerably, especially that of the artillery; they fired only two pieces loaded with ball and grape at the breach, to prevent its being repaired. This diminution was owing, M. Pouchot suspected, either to their desire to raise the siege in order to go and meet a reinforcement, or to arrangements for some serious attack. The greatest possible precaution was taken. We had a great many wounded this night and some killed in our works, which 'twas desirable to repair.

24th We heard some firing in the direction of La Belle Famille. 'Twas some of M. de Lignery's Indian scouts, who fell in with an English guard that was placed over 22 bateaux which they carried overland to cross the river in, and to communicate with the detachment at the Montreal point. A dozen of them were killed and their heads cut off and stuck on the top of some pickets. This event drew down others. It induced the Indians to ask Mess<sup>rs</sup> Aubry and de Lignery to wait until the Iroquois had been requested to oblige us to make peace with the English. M. de Lignery dissuaded them from it and wished them to follow him, being on the point of attacking. They refused to do so; some thirty only of the most determined accompanied M. Marin.

M. Pouchot hearing an extraordinary fire of musketry, repaired immediately with M. Bonnafoux to the Five Nations' bastion. He perceived some English who were flying pretty precipitately to their main guards, some troops who were defiling from the centre camp to the border of the clearance, to join them at the entrance of the ground at La Belle Famille, where we saw somewhat in reverse an intrenchment of trees. Two guns were directed against it which were discharged two or three times. At this time M. Pouchot noticed some Indians here and there with a white flag. He supposed at first that it might be a piece of bravado on the part of some Iroquois, or a ruse to draw out a sortie. He ordered two guns to be fired between the English and them, to disperse them, or if they were friends, to signify to them that some enemies were yonder, and to prevent them advancing, because seeing them so few, he feared they would fall into an ambuscade. He warned M. Bonnafoux of it. It produced no other effect than the display of a large white flag. A troop was seen at the same time defiling into a path 7 @ 8 feet wide, with great confidence in very close column in front. It appeared that on perceiving the enemy, very close to which it found itself, that the troop endeavored to place itself in close order of battle without ranks or files. On its right appeared some thirty Indians, fronting the enemy's left flank. This battalion commenced firing one or two volleys when approaching the latter, who appeared making a forward movement beyond their abatis; but having been received with a third volley, retreated pretty precipitately. The battalion then moved forward to enter the abatis, but were checked by a volley from the enemy when it knelt to fire into the intrenchment. In this interval, a considerable quantity of rain fell, which wet their arms. Whilst one half this battalion was firing, the other half appeared retreating somewhat percipitately; the enemy having fired two volleys at those who stood. Very few remained. Some fifty appeared to be firing whilst retreating often kneeling on the ground. Thereupon the English issued from their intrenchment, almost in files, charging with fixed bayonets; but from the little musketry we heard, we judged that the entire battalion had retired. 'Twas in our eyes so trifling, that we concluded in the rain, it might be M. Marin or some other officer, who had come to reconnoitre the enemy and had pushed them to that place.

Whilst this affair was passing, a sergeant who was in the covert-way, judging from the silence in the trench, that it was abandoned, asked of M. Pouchot permission to make a sortie. Although of opinion that the trench was, on the contrary, well reinforced, he (in order to foster emulation among the soldiers and to gratify them), called out 150 volunteers, which was all they mustered, except the officers and sergeants, and ordered M. de Villars to place himself at their head, recommending him to leave the covert-way only with the greatest precaution, and when he should give the signal, but to make a great deal of noise. He enjoined on him to place people on the palisades, as this would not fail to draw the enemy out and enable us to judge of their situation. In fact, the moment the English saw people astride of the palisades, the entire trench seemed immediately to swarm with men stript to the waist and with companies of grenadiers at the head of the trenches. Some cannon balls were sent at them, which made them get under cover, and our sortie did not take place.

On the arrival of the reinforcement, the Onondaga who had returned, having recognized M. de Lignery's troops, requested M. Pouchot's permission to go out and fight with them, which was granted. He passed freely through the enemy's army, which doubtless paid no attention to him, and joined our troops about noon. He returned towards two o'clock, and recounted the whole of our disaster, which he could scarcely credit, imagining that the English had put the thing in his head. He told us that all had taken to flight; that Mess<sup>rs</sup> Aubry, de Lignery, de Montigny, and de Repentigny were prisoners, and wounded, and that all the other officers and soldiers had been killed.<sup>1</sup> We hoped this man was not telling the truth.

When M. Pouchot perceived this retreat, he ordered all the batteries that were still effective, to redouble their fire, so as to keep the enemy in check; they returned it to us with great spirit, which again caused the loss of many of our men. At four o'clock in the afternoon, the enemy beat the rappel in his trench, from which an officer came out to parley, who was brought into the fort. He brought a letter from Johnson, who was in command of the army since Prideaux's death.

Johnson said, in his letter, that confidence may be placed in whatever Major Hervey,<sup>2</sup> Lord Bristol's son, might state in his name. The latter gave the names of all the Canadian officers who were taken prisoners. Although M. Pouchot was advised, beforehand, by the Indian, in order to protect himself against any reproach, he pretended ignorance and incredulity, until those officers should be shown to some one of the garrison. Captain de Cervies, of the Royal Rousillon, went to the camp; he saw M. de Lignery wounded, and the others in an arbor, near Colonel Johnson's tent. He could scarcely speak to them, and came to report to M. Pouchot.

This news, which had at first been retailed by the Indian, and now confirmed by this officer, had so depressed the courage of the garrison, that M. Pouchot and the other officers had all the trouble in the world to restrain the soldiers and Militia in their posts which they were abandoning on every side, as if all was over. If the enemy could see this disorder, he might assuredly have taken advantage of it. The German recruits, of whom we had a great many in the Colonial troops, and who had arrived this year in Canada, were the most mutinous.

M. Pouchot assembled all the officers of the garrison to deliberate on the situation of the fort, and to adopt the most proper course. He left M. Bonnafox to describe its condition as the most capable judge thereof. He began at the covert-way, and 'twas agreed that the enemy, considering their proximity, could not fail to be masters of it within two days, either by sap or assault. We had only 110 men to guard the covert-way from the bank in front of the lake bastion to the salient angle of the half moon, and 25 men in the place d'armes of the right, who were guarding as far as the salient of the covert-way of the Five Nations' bastion. There was an interval of more than 8 @ 10 feet between the men who lined the front attacked. The arms were in so bad a state, that there were not more than 140 muskets fit for service; most of them were without bayonets. The Colonials and Canadians, having none, wood-cutters' knives had been fixed to the end of a stick to serve instead, and these they carried with them

He was elected to Parliament, for the borough of Bury St. Edmunds, in 1763, and on the 6th of August, 1766, was appointed captain in the 1st Foot Guards, with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel in the army; and served in that corps until 13th June, 1774, when he exchanged with Major Leland, and went on half pay of the 98th foot. On 29th August, 1777, he became Colonel by brevet; Major-General 20th November, 1782; Lieutenant-General 12th October, 1793, and General in the army 1st January, 1798. to their posts. Of 54 thousand weight of powder, which had been in store, 24 had been consumed. Only very few 4 and 6-pound balls remained; those of 12 were all gone. There was no hope, therefore, of a vigorous defence. The ditches were without any scarp; the earth having crumbled down, the slopes got to be so gentle that a person could run up and down them. To avoid this inconvenience, a palisade had, indeed, been set up at the bottom of the ditch, but the enemy being liberty to descend there everywhere, could kill the entire garrison between the palisade and the covert-way, because by getting mixed up with it, the flanking guns could not protect the men. Besides, there remained, at this time, no more than sixty men in the place, exclusive of gunners. The palisades opposite the breach were all broken, and it was very easy to go down into the breach which occupied two-thirds of the face of the bastion in the ditch. We had hors de service or lost, 10 men of La Sarre, 9 of Béarn, 8 of Royal Rousillon, 13 of Guienne, 43 of the Colonials, 26 Militia, in all 109 men, killed or wounded, and 37 sick.<sup>1</sup> Independent of these losses, our small force and the superiority of the enemy, the place could be very easily insulted from the river and the high banks of the lake.

All these considerations induced the officers of the garrison to request M. Pouchot to consent to a capitulation. Up to that time he had not said anything. He requested those gentlemen to examine well whether any resource remained. They represented to him the exhaustion of the garrison, which had not lain down for 19 days, and had been continually under arms or at the works; that the delay of one day, and of even eight days, were that possible, could not save the place and would result only in the useless loss of still more brave fellows, the rather as no help was to be expected from any quarter.

M. Pouchot, sensible of the truth of these reflections, called in the English officer and demanded a capitulation, on condition that the garrison should march out with the honors of war, and be conveyed to Montreal with its property and that of the King, at his Britannic Majesty's expense, in the shortest possible space of time. Negotiations continued the entire night, as M. Pouchot was not willing to recede from his propositions. Colonel Johnson sent him word frankly, that he was not master of those conditions, otherwise he would grant them. At daybreak, M. Pouchot wished to send back the officer, on the ground that being about to be a prisoner, he would risk the event. Thereupon the entire garrison demanded to capitulate. The Germans, who constituted the majority, mutinied, which the English officer unfortunately observed, and therefore became more firm. M. Pouchot was then obliged to be satisfied with the following Articles:

ARTICLE I.

The garrison shall march out with their arms and baggage, drums beating, and match lighted at both ends, and a small piece of cannon, to embark upon such vessels as the commanders of his Britannic Majesty's forces shall furnish, to convey them to New-York by the shortest route and in the shortest time.

ARTICLE II.

The garrison shall lay down their arms when they embark, but shall keep their baggage.

ARTICLE III.

The officers shall keep both their arms and their baggage.

<sup>1</sup> The garrison being composed of only 486 men, as already stated, there remained then 340 capable of bearing arms. Why then have the English accounts (Entick, IV., 139) stated that it numbered 607 effectives when it marched out Pouchot. — Ed.

ARTICLE IV.

The French ladies, with their children, and other women, as well as the chaplain, shall be sent to Montreal, and the commander of his Britannic Majesty's troops shall furnish them with vessels and subsistence necessary for their voyage to the first French post, and this is to be executed as soon as possible; those women who choose to follow their husbands are at liberty to do it. Granted, except with regard to those women who are his Britannic Majesty's subjects.

ARTICLE V.

The sick and wounded, who are obliged to remain in the fort, shall have liberty to depart, with everything that belongs to them, and shall be conducted in safety, as soon as they are able to support the fatigues of a voyage, to the place destined for the rest of the garrison; in the meantime, they are to be allowed a guard for their security against Indians, and shall be attended and fed at his Britannic Majesty's expense.

ARTICLE VI.

The Commanding officer, all the other officers and private men who are in the service of his Most Christian Majesty, shall quit the fort without being subject to any act of reprisals whatsoever.

ARTICLE VII.

An inventory shall be made of all the military stores in the magazine, which, with the artillery, shall be delivered up, bona fide, as well as all other effects, which are the property of his Most Christian Majesty, and which are found in the magazine at the time of the capitulation. The vessels and boats are included in this article.

ARTICLE VIII.

The soldiers shall not be plundered nor separated from their officers.

ARTICLE IX.

The garrison shall be conducted under a proper escort to the place destined for their reception; the General shall expressly recommend to this escort to hinder the Indians from insulting any persons belonging to the garrison, and shall prevent their being pillaged by them when they quit their arms for embarkation; and the same care is to be taken on every part of the route where Indians may be met with.

ARTICLE X.

An exact list shall be made of the names and surnames of the soldiers belonging to the different troops, as well Regulars as Militia, and all others who are employed in his Most Christian Majesty's service; and all those who are so employed, in whatever capacity, shall retain their baggage, and shall be treated in the same manner as the rest of the garrison.

ARTICLE XI.

All the Indians, of whatsoever Nation they may be, who are found in the garrison, shall be protected from insult, and be allowed to go where they please. Granted; but it will be advisable for them to depart as privately as possible.

The articles being accepted, the General of his Britannic Majesty's forces shall be put in possession of a gate of the fort, but this cannot be done until to-morrow. To-morrow at seven o'clock in the morning.

W<sup>m</sup> JOHNSON.

Niagara, 25th July, 1759.

26th In the afternoon the garrison marched out of the fort to descend to the beach, with musket on the shoulder, drums beating and two pieces of large cannon at the head of the column. As soon as the troops had reached the bateaux in which they were to embark, they laid down their muskets and immediately pushed off, although the lake was very rough.

We could not see the officers who were prisoners. Johnson had given his word that he would ransom from the Indians those they had taken; for, seeing our men taking to flight, they pursued and captured a great many. On this occasion a tragical event occurred. Cadet Moncourt, of the Colonials, had formed an attachment with an Indian, to whom he became bound in friendship. This Indian, who belonged to the English army, seeing his friend a prisoner, expressed a great deal of sorrow at his situation, and said to him: "Brother, I am in despair at seeing you dead; but take heart; I'll prevent their torturing you;" and killed him with a blow of a tomahawk, thinking thereby to save him from the tortures to which prisoners among themselves are subjected.

The rest of the troops who escaped from the field, retired to an island above the fort of the Carrying place, where Rocheblave had been left with about 150 men to guard the canoes and bateaux, whence they proceeded to Detroit, together with the garrisons of Presqu'isle and Fort Machault, under the orders of M. Belestre, who could not take a part in the action, as he was sick. Of 400 men, more than 250 were killed, almost all Colonials, who were very brave, and had done good service in these parts. A great many French from the Illinois were either killed or taken. All the prisoners were conveyed to New-York, the same as the garrison of Niagara.

Narrative of the Siege of Quebec, published by the French.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Since the English have commenced hostilities in Canada, the different arrangements they have made to render themselves masters thereof are well known, as well as the immense force they have collected in the upper part of the continent to attack our establishments in that quarter and those they were preparing to send up the River St. Lawrence to lay siege to Quebec at the same time.

We learned on the 17th and 19th of May last, by divers reports of the Captains, of a small fleet of merchantmen which had sailed from Bourdeaux under the convoy of M. Kanon; by 3 ships which sailed from Rochefort commanded by M. de Vauchin<sup>1</sup> and by M. Sauvage a captain of a frigate which sailed from Brest, that an English squadron was coming up the river after them. Advice had already been received of the spring expedition the enemy was meditating, through two Acadian prisoners in New England whence they had made their escape. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, the Governor-General, was then at Montreal, where he had been occupied for a long time exclusively with all the means practicable to place the frontier posts in a state of defence. He had sent 1,500 men to Niagara under the command of Captain Pouchot of the Bearn regiment, who had that fort fortified and he had transmitted orders to M. de Ligneris, Captain of the Colony in command at the Beautiful river, to fall back on Niagara with about three thousand men that he ought to have. Chevalier de la Corne another Colonial Captain, was likewise detached with 1500 men to guard the upper end of the rapids near La Présentation on Lake Ontario. M. de Bourlamarque, a Brigadier of Infantry, was entrusted with the defence of Carillon with 500 men who were to be sustained by 1,200 others that were at Fort St. John at the outlet of Lake Champlain, under the orders of M. Rigault de Vaudreuil, exclusive of the Indians commanded by M. de la Corne de Chapte. The Marquis de Vaudreuil having thus made all his arrangements for the Upper part of Canada, and determined the operations for the defence of Montreal which he confided to M. de Levy, Major-General (Maréchal de Camp), sent his orders to the Marquis de Montcalm at Quebec, to accelerate all the arrangements he had a long time before concluded on, to oppose the powerful efforts of the enemy. Three days afterwards he repaired in person to the Capital.

Whilst he was engaged with M. Bigot, the Intendant of the Colony, in distributing the feeble resources of the country and in making sure of the subsistence in all the governments, in accordance with the plan of arrangement concluded on by that Intendant, who on his side was occupied with the management of the provisions, the means of procuring them and establishing dépôts useful and certain under all events, those parts of the town which remained open were closed by stockades; new batteries were erected on the Palace wharves and on the construction at Cul de Sac. Cannon was also placed on the top of the hill leading from the Lower to the Upper town, and a small [camp] was formed of the 5 battalions of troops of the line which happened to be convenient, of about 200 men of the Colonial troops and of the Militia and other Canadian farmers who assembled with so much activity and zeal that a corps was immediately organized of 11 @ 12 thousand men which was stationed at Beauport to oppose any landing and be there in a position to aid the town. An intrenchment was erected at the same time from the Falls of Montmorenci to Quebec; communicating forts were added throughout, and a troop of cavalry of 150 men, organized under the command of M. de la Rochebaucourt. M. de Fiedmont,<sup>1</sup> Captain of Artillery, furnished the plan of 12 large wooden canoes on which a twelve-pounder was to be mounted, and the construction was completed with that of 4 bomb-ketches which carried an 18-pounder, besides a floating battery worked by sails and carrying 12 pieces of cannon, two of which were 24's. A quantity of rafts were constructed loaded with fireworks, to set fire to the enemy's ships, independent of the fire ships; at the mouth of the Little river, were grounded two dismasted vessels on which again were erected batteries to oppose a landing.

In the night of the 24th and 25th of May, the beacons announcing the enemy, were lighted at Point Levy and the guns of the town repeated the signal. On the same day Mess<sup>rs</sup> Aules and Pleine, Canadians, posted at St. Barnabée to observe what was passing in the river, sent word to the Marquis de Vaudreuil that they had seen 14 English men-of-war and transports. This was, in fact, the enemy's van under the command of Admiral Burel<sup>2</sup> destined to intercept the succors we were expecting from France. On receiving this news, vigilance was redoubled at Isle aux Coudres and along the South shore below Quebec, from which the women and children and cattle were removed into the more distant concessions, and Captain de Léry, of the Colonials, intrusted with these operations, was also directed to order the farmers capable of bearing arms, to hold themselves in readiness to repair to Quebec on receiving notice to that effect from the Marquis de Vaudreuil.

Some days after, the arrival was confirmed. Some troops landed and formed a camp there. That island had been evacuated by the farmers, whose property the enemy did not injure, walking about very quietly and in the fullest security, which emboldened some Canadians, settled at St. Paul's bay, who crossed over, lay in ambush in the woods, and took three prisoners, among whom was Admiral Burel's grandson. The Indians sent thither under the command of M. de Niverville, dared not do the like, no matter what invitation that officer extended to them, for fear of being surrounded. The English, on their side, were taking advantage of every movement, and lost no time in sending barges to sound and lay down buoys in the channel of the Traverse, through which they passed some of their ships at once. 'Twas then that we learned that the enemy received additional reinforcements and had already collected about 30 vessels of every description.

M. de Courtemanche set out for the Island of Orleans with a detachment of 600 men, Canadians and Indians; the latter had some bark canoes belonging to their comrades, which attacked 7 English barges, and the firing was very brisk on both sides, without the loss of a single man on our part. We carried off one of these barges, on board of which were 8 Englishmen who were taken to Quebec, and reported that the landing party consisted of 1,500 men.

<sup>2</sup> Vice-Admiral PHILIP DURELL was commissioned Captain in the Royal Navy 6th February, 1742. In 1743 he commanded the Eltham, 40, in the attack on Porto Cavallo, Venezuela; in 1744, was attached to Sir John Norris' fleet on the Home station, and subsequently to the Leeward island fleet under Sir Peter Warren, and in April, 1745, the Eltham, Captain Durell, joined the fleet which was to reduce Cape Breton. In 1747 he commanded the Chester, 50, and was attached to Commodore Fox's squadron which chased Admiral Bois de la Mothe's fleet; in August, of the same year, he commanded the Gloucester, 50, in the fleet under Hawke which attacked the French Admiral Létendur; in 1748, he served again under Hawke; in 1755, he commanded the Terrible, 74; and in 1756, the Trident, 64, in the expedition under the unfortunate Byng. Early in 1758, Commodore Durell was dispatched to Halifax in the Princess Amelia, 80, to expedite the embarkation of the army against Louisbourg; and on the reduction of that place was promoted to be Rear-Admiral of the Blue, and left in command of the North American station. In February, 1759, he became Rear-Admiral of the Red, and accompanied the expedition against Quebec, still in command of the Princess Amelia. For his conduct on that occasion, he received the thanks of Parliament, and in 1763 was promoted to be Vice-Admiral of the Blue. After the peace he was not in commission until 1765, when he was sent in the Launceston, 44, to relieve Lord Colville in the command of the North American station at Halifax. He died in this command soon after his arrival. Beaton. — Ep.

On the following morning, M. le Mercier, commandant of the artillery, went to the Island of Orleans with some field pieces of the calibre of eights, with which he discharged red hot shot at the enemy anchored at St. Francis, but neither his shot nor that which the English returned had any effect.

From the 18th to the 19th of June. A courier sent by M. Aubert, came to announce that the remainder of the English fleet, amounting to about 15 sail, was at St. Barnabé. This last division, joined to the first, formed then a fleet of 160 vessels. A few days after, some anchored at Isle aux Coudres, others immediately passed the Traverse, and positive intelligence was received that M. de Saunders commanded it, and that General Wolf was coming at the head of a landing force of 10 thousand men. No other information could be obtained from prisoners and deserters.

27th June. At 6 o'clock in the morning three men-of-war appeared within sight of Quebec, and anchored there to facilitate the operation of a frigate which came to take soundings along the Island of Orleans, after which the whole three disappeared, and the wind from the northeast having freshened considerably, in the afternoon, some of the enemy's transports were cast ashore. On the same day were seen from the village of Beaumont, 120 or 130 sail along the Island of Orleans, but among these were few men-of-war and merely some frigates, to cover the landing which was effected at noon on that island. The enemy formed in good order and encamped on the heights of St. Laurent to the number of eight thousand men, according to the judgment of M. de Courtemanche, who was obliged to cross to Beauré in order to effect his retreat, as he was not able to oppose such a force with his small detachment. There was question of burning that fleet, if possible, and an attempt was made to do so in the course of the night between the 25th and 29th, by sending six fire ships against it, which did not effect any good; some were pushed beyond the current and stranded, the others caught fire too soon, and burned even in sight of Quebec. A man named Dubois, captain of one of these fire ships, and his mate, perished in the flames. Only one of these vessels approached the fleet, whose armed boats turned it aside although on fire. Rafts would have immediately taken its place, had not the strong northeast wind which was blowing, driven them ashore near the Falls of Montmorency, where they were wrecked.

30th Learned that the enemy had landed at Beaumont, a parish below Point Levy; that they had killed a man there and taken one or two prisoners, and that the officers and farmers who were still in that parish, had been obliged to retreat precipitately into the woods. It was ascertained also, the same morning, that the enemy were advancing by land even to Point Levy. They had anchored 15 ships there to facilitate another descent which they effected in the afternoon. Thereupon Sieur Charest, a farmer and Captain of Militia, asked permission of the Marquis de Vaudreuil to proceed with some people to that point, of which he is the Seigneur, to oppose the enemy's operations. He set out about 2 o'clock in the afternoon with 15 men, who were joined by other farmers of the Point, where the English had already posted 1,500 men around the church. Sieur de Charest had then 60, who fired until evening and killed 40 or 50 men on the English, without having one wounded. About 4 o'clock, the Marquis de Vaudreuil sent him some Indians, whom it was impossible to unite with that party. They scattered through the woods and took one prisoner, who announced a general descent on the following night. Whereupon 'twas resolved not to send any more men to Point Levy, and so recall Sieur Charest, who returned to Quebec at 10 o'clock at night, and left behind him some stragglers who still kept firing at the enemy the entire night.

Under the impression that the English would make the general descent at Beauport, and that 'twas there the fate of the Colony was to be decided, the Marquises de Vaudreuil and de Montcalm and M. Bigot, the Intendant, proceeded that night, with the principal military officers and others, to the camp that had been formed at Beauport. The command of the town was left to M. de Ramezay, the King's Lieutenant, with a garrison of 1,500 Regulars, Militia and the crews of the ships destined to serve the batteries.

The Beauport camp was fixed a quarter of a league above the falls of Montmorency, and M. de Levy, Maréchal de Camp, commanded it. Headquarters were established at La Canardière, whence the Marquises de Vaudreuil and Montcalm transmitted their orders to all the posts.

1st of July. M. de Levy arrived at Quebec which he reached through the woods. He came out by the Arlaca road, a little above Point Levy. At 10 o'clock, 2 frigates advanced into the basin where they anchored, and were fired at from bomb-ketches which had approached to drive them away.

On the same day, Sieur Charest was sent back to Point Levy to ascertain if the English had landed any artillery there, but could not approach sufficiently close to find out.

2nd The same Militia officer was again at that point at 4 o'clock in the morning; he returned at noon, and said that the enemy's camp covered nine arpens of ground in width by 12 in depth, below the church, and that no artillery was to be seen there as yet, although he approached pretty close. A proclamation was brought in the same day, which General Wolf had caused to be affixed to the door of the church of Beaumont; 'twill be found at the end of this Narrative. In the afternoon of that day, a detachment of the enemy, about 600 strong, made its appearance on the heights which crown the shore in front of the castle of Quebec; the cannon of the town fired on it, and about 7 o'clock in the evening, that troop defiled to the camp which the English had formed near the church of Point Levy.

The sight of that camp and the mounted cannon which were already discernable from the Beauport shore, excited such a sensation among the Canadian farmers, whose bravery is so well known, that they met together, in a large number, on the 3rd, and demanded permission of the Marquis de Vaudreuil to send 4 or 5 thousand men to the South shore, to attack the English camp; but this manœuvre was disapproved by the Marquis de Montcalm, who had assumed, with the Governor-General, the defence of Canada, on the Quebec side.

4th M. de Niverville, a Colonial officer, was detached, with about 200 Canadians and Indians, to encamp at Sillery, one league above Quebec, and at noon the enemy sent a boat, with a white flag, to bear a letter to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, wherein the Admiral demanded intelligence of the three Englishmen taken at Isle aux Coudres, and advised him that he should send in some Acadian women, taken in the river. M. le Mercier was directed to convey the answer, and the day following the Acadians were sent in, who reported that the enemy had landed some mortars at Point Levy, and that they had a landing force of only ten thousand men. They were seen, daily, promenading, with assurance, around the houses at Point Levy, although the farmers who had retired into the woods harassed them continually, and killed some every day, whenever they strayed from the detachment.

6th A barge came, in the morning, to sound the channel North of the Orleans church, opposite coming the camp occupied by M. de Levy, who had assumed the command thereof, since his down from Montreal. That General detached some Indians in canoes, who pursued them as far as the Island of Orleans, where they forced 200 Scotch Highlanders to retreat, with the loss of 10 men. They also left two of their men there and reëmbarked in their canoes, after having killed an Englishman whom they had taken, because they were closely pursued by a strong detachment which had come to the assistance of the Highlanders, so that two of those Indians, not being able to reëmbark as soon as the rest, threw themselves into the water and swam to the camp.

The floating battery which had been anchored opposite, fired, about 5 o'clock in the evening, some shot at the frigate which had come into the basin and was supported by the fire from the ships, but they did not do much harm to that battery, whence six bomb-ketches and canoes of M. de Fiedmont's pattern, approached to cannonade the frigates, but were briskly answered from the guns of the ships, and, although the English have pretended that they did not suffer from our fire, the frigates dropped down a little towards the Island of Orleans.

On the following night, a French prisoner escaped from the ships by swimming, and made pretty nearly the same report as the Acadian women, except that he announced that the English were expecting a reinforcement of six thousand men, in default of which they were proposing to substitute four thousand sailors, and that they had resolved on an attack within three days.

8th The enemy erected batteries on the south side, opposite the Castle of Quebec, and worked at the same time at a redoubt a little above, to cover themselves. Some shell and shot were fired at these workmen, who appeared to suffer, but did not abandon their occupation, and, at the same time, and for several hours, the ships cannonaded M. de Levy's camp considerably. The galiots also bombarded that quarter, and, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, 30 barges or boats repaired to two vessels which were anchored pretty near the shore at Ange Gardien, which created the impression that that place had been selected for a descent. The galiots commenced the bombardment again at 8 o'clock at night until the next day. They threw several shells into the camp; only one man, however, was very slightly wounded.

9th M. de Levy broke up his camp and retired into the intrenchments below, near the beach. In the afternoon the enemy continued bombarding, to cover a descent effected at Ange Gardien and lower down. At the breaking of that day, their camp at Point Levy and the Island of Orleans was noticed to be greatly diminished, which created an apprehension that they had made a considerable descent at Côte de Beaupré. A hundred Canadians and Indians were detached on a scout, who went down beyond the falls of Montmorency, where they were surprised by the enemy's van-guard, supported by a large boat, on which the Indians imprudently fired several volleys. They pretended to have killed 150 men, and that they had only 15 killed or wounded. Two Canadians and the interpreter of those Indians were killed. The enemy had already posted about five thousand men, with two pieces of cannon on the heights of Ange Gardien, pretty near the Falls of Montmorency.

On the afternoon of the same day a mortar was conveyed to Beauport, and the ships were bombarded and obliged to sheer off out of range.

10th The batteries of the town reopened their fire on the workmen employed at Lauzon, and on the batteries begun by the English on the 8th. Shells were also thrown at them which appeared to be well aimed and fell in their midst. A man deserted from them that day who crossed over to Quebec and reported that 6 14-inch mortars and 8 32-pounders would be ready that night or, at latest, the next morning, to fire on the town; that 6,000 or 6,500 men had landed at Beaupré; that no more than 1,000 were remaining at the camp at Point Levy and the batteries connected therewith; and, finally, that the officers were reporting throughout the army that they had lost only 45 men in the affair of the previous evening near the Falls of Montmorency, notwithstanding the Indians brought in the following morning 60 scalps taken during that action.

11th A second French prisoner escaped from the English army. It is five days since he left the Island of Orleans. Deserters reported that they were fortifying their camp on the heights of Ange Gardien with men and batteries. Throughout the whole of this day the enemy was seen transporting artillery to the battery which was to cannonade the town in front. Shell and shot were discharged on the teamsters and workmen. They must certainly have lost a great number of people this day, and a prisoner since reported that one shell alone had killed 17 men. The Canadians, always full of ardor and uneasy at seeing the progress of the enemy's works, renewed their representations to the Marquis de Vaudreuil for permission to form a strong detachment, with which they proposed to cross to Point Levy and destroy the enemy's works. The General, who was acquainted with the intrepidity of the farmers, consented, notwithstanding the remonstrances which reached him from other quarters, and promised to send that detachment under the orders of Major Dumas of the Colonial troops.

In the night of the 11th and 12th, four Sauter Indians penetrated to the enemy's camp at Ange Gardien and killed two men; but one of themselves was wounded. Some movements occurred thereupon among the van-guard of the English which approached towards those we had posted, under the command of Captain de Repentigny, of the Colonials, on the hill near the Falls of Montmorency to guard the pass, who thereupon fired at, and thus stopped, them. He killed 60 of their men and lost only two Canadians.

12th M. Dumas, who commanded the detachment designed to proceed to Point Levy, conducted it to Cap Rouge, above Quebec, to be prepared to cross during the night to the South shore and to surprise the enemy next morning at break of day. This detachment was composed of 150 Regulars commanded by Captain Dugla, of the regiment of Languedoc, of some soldiers of the Colony, of about 300 Canadians from the camp at Beauport and of a great part of the Militia of the town who volunteered, so that M. Dumas left with nearly 1,200 men. He would have had a larger number had all those who earnestly entreated been allowed to go. Even some of the Magistrates readily offered to accompany the detachment.

On the same day the English were seen working at an intrenchment on the heights of Point Levy, but they were not visible except from the hill of the destroyed citadel, because of the wood between them and the town. Some ships wanting to get closer to each other in the basin about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the bomb-ketches cannonaded, the ships returned the fire, but nothing of interest resulted. At nine o'clock the English unmasked the gun and mortar batteries they had erected against the town on the South shore; they united their fire with that of the gunboats, and in the course of that first night, the town received upwards of 200 shell which inflicted considerable damage.

13th M. Dumas brought back the detachment he had conducted to the South shore, because in the darkness of the preceding night some mistakes had been committed by the sentinels, which led to such serious errors that the Canadians fired too precipitately and having discovered themselves, his project aborted.

14th The English discharged several rounds of artillery from the camp at Ange Gardien on that of M. de Levy, and at 5 o'clock in the evening recommenced their bombardment, which had slackened since the morning of the 13th and it has since continued without intermission and with very great vigor, up to the 17th September. On the morning of the same day, four bomb-ketches advanced on some boats which were conveying troops and ammunition from the ships to the camp at Ange Gardien, but 15 barges attacked them and were obliged to retreat. The bomb-ketches were in their turn forced to the same manœuvre by the fire from the ships and camp.

16th A shell set fire to a house on the hill leading from the Lower to the Upper town, and nine houses were burnt in this first conflagration.

17th Some Indians with three Canadians who had advanced near the enemy at Ange Gardien, led 100 English into an ambush, by making the three Canadians only approach the camp, who pretended to fly, and engaged with the small detachment of the enemy which they saw coming out, and the Indians perceiving it within range, fired a volley, killed several English and took three prisoners. M. de Levy was terribly exercised this night by the mortars and batteries erected on the borders of the Falls of Montmorency. He had only 58 men killed, however.

18th A man-of-war with three ships and two bateaux passed in the night in front of the town, and anchored half a league above. They sent afterwards to set fire to a fire-raft which was in the Ance des foulons, and endeavored to break up by cannon-shot the rafts that were seen in that cove, lying on the beach, but did not succeed. M. Dumas marched immediately with 500 men to oppose the landing which was to be apprehended at that place. That detachment was reinforced next morning and on the following day. The greater part of the cavalry also proceeded thither; finally, about 900 men were assembled there. M. Dumas divided them by platoons in all the coves from Quebec as far as Cap Rouge, in which the enemy could land.

19th Captain Deboishebert, of the Colony, who was bringing back 100 men from Acadia, reported that about 30 vessels were still in the river, and from that time no further intelligence could be had of what reinforcements the enemy received, but they have acknowledged since, that during the course of the campaign, they had got 300 vessels into the river, 22 of which were large men-of-war, several frigates and four bomb-ketches. On the same day, a mortar and some 18-pounders were conveyed to Samos,  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a league from the town; batteries were erected there, which fired before night on the man-of-war that had come to anchor opposite L'Ance du foulon, which was forced to sheer off.

21st At day-break the English landed 400 men at Point aux trembles, 7 leagues above Quebec, who rummaged the houses, from which they took nearly 200 women prisoners, the majority of whom had gone thither from Quebec for safety. Some men also were found there. They have since said, that the object of this descent was to obtain information as to the real condition of Canada, either from the farmers' papers or by intercepting some letters, but that the fire which some Indians had opened on them had determined them to secure the women, who, in other respects, were treated politely and sent back the next day to Quebec under a flag. Two Canadians were killed, however, on occasion of that descent; two others were wounded; and it has not been ascertained how many English were killed. They admitted but three killed, one of whom was a Captain of Grenadiers.

22nd The bombardment was very brisk throughout the night, and a shell caused a fire in the vicinity of the Cathedral, which was burnt, together with 16 private houses.

23rd A flag brought some effects belonging to the ladies taken at Point aux trembles, and two frigates attempted at day-break to pass opposite the town, but the fire from the batteries made them turn back and resume their anchorage.

25th The vessels anchored below Quebec sent some barges to attack the bomb-ketches which had been stationed along shore at that side, and took two of them that the crew had abandoned; the remainder were saved by the intrepidity of fifteen Canadians, who freed them by the fire of their musketry, and killed seven of the English.

26th This morning a patrol of the enemy approached the Falls of Montmorency and was attacked by M. de Repentigny, at the head of 200 men, whilst the Indians were trying to harass it, but an entire column came to the aid of that patrol, turned and surrounded M. de Repentigny's men. He, however, effected his retreat in very good order; he had only 12 men killed or wounded, and the Indians assure that the enemy had lost more than 150. On the same day, Sieur Lesris, an officer of Militia, who had been on a scout on the Point Levy side, fell in with a detachment of 7 Englishmen; killed four of them, and captured the other three prisoners, although he himself was severely wounded; he had only one man killed. These prisoners stated that the English had entered St. Henry, one of the parishes in the concessions of Point Levy; had captured the Priest of that point, who had retired to St. Henry, 54 men capable of bearing arms, 64 women and 169 children, whom they had conveyed on board a ship, after having removed a large number of cattle.

27th Sieur Courval, a Canadian, who had given these last years proofs of bravery, and was in command of one of the ships of Sieur Kanyon's convoy, conducted in the course of the night, 72 rafts freighted with fireworks, against the enemy's fleet; he performed that duty like a brave man, but its success did not correspond with his zeal, although he did not set fire to the rafts until within musket range of the first ship, for only three transports were burnt, as the barges had very adroitly grappled the rafts, and Sieur Courval being hotly pursued, owed his safety only to the assistance which the bomb-boats afforded him.

29th Sieur Charest, who had passed some days before at Point Levy, brought back a new proclamation which General Wolf had had affixed to the door of the church at St. Henry. It will be found at the end of this narrative. It was intended to intimidate the farmers and threatened them with calamities which they have only too well experienced since; for up to the day Quebec capitulated, the enemy directed their efforts to lay waste the surrounding country, and have each day burned houses or barns at Côte de Beupré, and in that neighborhood, on the Island of Orleans and on the south shore. The ravages they have committed in the rural districts are immense; but it is singular that, carrying everywhere fire and destruction, they should have spared the churches of those parts, and almost nothing else.

31st At 10 o'clock in the morning, two men-of-war ran ashore, with all sails set, above M. de Levy's camp, which they cannonaded very briskly, whilst 50 pieces of ordnance ranged along the Falls of Montmorency, thundered at it also. We had, however, only 30 men killed or wounded by cannon shot or grenades. The enemy wished, under cover of that fire, to favor a new descent for which they had a quantity of bateaux and barges alongside their ships. They came off about five o'clock in the evening and made towards the two vessels that had stranded in the morning, and landed 2,000 men who marched immediately, in order of battle, against M. de Levy's camp. At the same moment another body of 5,000 forded below the Falls of Montmorency. The first platoon reached the 1st of our redoubts below M. de Levy's intrenchments, who was preparing to receive them, when the Marquis de Montcalm directed him to allow the enemy to advance, in order, as he said, to kill the more of them. But the Canadians could not wait for more than the first line; they were carried away by the desire to attack the enemy; the Montreal Militia especially were advancing at the same time that they were demanding permission to do so, and under M. de Levy's orders charged that troop with so much bravery that it retired precipitately and beat a retreat. One part reëmbarked in the barges, and the other joined the second platoon of 5 thousand men which had remained in the order of battle and spectators of the action at the crossing of the Falls of Montmorency, whence they retired to the camp. The crews of the stranded ships set them on fire and returned to the fleet in their boats. It has been ascertained that the enemy lost, that day, 700 men killed or wounded, all of whom they removed except 68 dead bodies, which were abandoned at the foot of that redoubt with some wounded, who were removed to the general hospital. Among the latter was a Captain of the Royal American regiment, who died of his wounds some days after.<sup>1</sup>

August 1st The Marquis de Montcalm sent men to visit the hulls of the burnt ships, who found some artillery in good condition on board, and removed a portion of the tools of every description fit for working at intrenchments.

2nd There was a few hours' suspension of hostilities to ask for the clothes belonging to the Captain of the Royal Americans, who was a prisoner.

4th The English demanded another to send those effects and the 5th There was a third to communicate the Marquis de Vaudreuil's answers to two letters which he had received from Admiral Saunder and General Wolff. That of the former was very courteous, but the General dwelt severely on the pretended cruelties committed by the Indians and urged the Marquis strongly not to employ those Savages, as he termed them, in the present war. Many of the English embraced this opportunity to visit Quebec and some of the French also visited the enemy.

6th There was an alarm through the night in the town, on occasion of some barges which the sentinels had seen defiling, and it was confirmed about mid-day by a courier from Cap Rouge who reported that a great many of them were along the South shore a league and a half from Quebec. This movement caused reinforcements to be sent to the guards posted at that quarter, which had been reduced since the return of M. Dumas, who had been replaced by M. de Bougainville.

7th Intelligence was received that the ships which had passed before the town, had gone with several barges as far as Point aux trembles.

*Canada Campaign from the 1st of June to the 15th September, 1759.**

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Despite of opinions on all sides, there was perfect security throughout the winter in Canada for Quebec on account of the dangers of the River St. Lawrence.

<sup>1</sup> Captain DAVID OUCHTERLONY was commissioned Lieutenant in the 60th foot on the 7th February, 1756. He was afterwards promoted to a company. He died of his wounds on the 23rd August, 1759. Knox, II., 81. — Ed.

20th May. News from Quebec of an English fleet in the river; general alarm; farmers ordered to abandon their houses between Quebec and St. Barnabée; the women to retire into the woods; the men to hasten to the Capital.

30th May. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil, de Montcalm and de Levis with five battalions and all the Militia of the Colony formed a junction at Quebec; these, joined to the sailors and inhabitants of the town, composed about 15,000 men.

Since the first of May, M. de Bourlamaque marched with three battalions and the Militia, to Carillon with orders to blow up that post and Fort St. Frederic on the approach of the English army, to retire to Isle aux Noix near St. John and intrench himself there; which was done in the fore part of August.

At the same time some pickets and Militia were sent to Niagara with M. Pouchot who was to take the command of that fort. About the middle of July, it was besieged and taken by the English after they had defeated the reinforcement brought by M. de Ligny. The English general was killed.

Throughout the whole of June the English fleet arrived in succession with the land forces who took up a position at Isle aux Coudres, the Island of Orleans and at Point Levy, without any opposition, although Indians and Canadians had been sent to all those places to harass them, but returned always without firing a shot.

Throughout the same month councils on councils were held at Quebec. It was resolved to arm eight vessels as fire ships, to build gun-boats; the latter were of some advantage.

Again, at the same time, it was resolved to encamp the entire army at Beauport, to fortify the shore by redoubts and intrenchments, and to abandon the defence of the town to the sailors, who were to man the guns, consisting of more than 2,000 cannon, and to the citizens, who were formed into companies to mount guard.

Between the tenth and eleventh of July, at night, the English army, which before had been seen encamped partly on the Island of Orleans, partly at Point Levis, landed below the Falls of Montmorency, where they fortified a camp with several redoubts, in which they placed 50 cannon and a number of mortars; with these they kept up a fire, day and night, on the left wing of our army, which they obliged to break up camp, and where nothing was afterwards stationed but strong guards.

In the night of the 12th and 13th they unmasked a battery at Point Levy, and some days after several others of heavy guns and mortars, which did not cease firing on the town, day nor night, until the capitulation; that is to say, for 64 days.

The month of July was but one continual cannonade from the enemy's batteries on our camp and on the town, and there were several fires at different times which consumed nearly 200 houses.

31st July. The enemy stationed two ships in front of the Falls which kept up a cannonading from noon until 4 o'clock, when the enemy formed into column, attacked our redoubts, carried the first, but were forced by the second which commanded it, to retire with the loss of 4 or 500 men, and their General wounded.

During that time and throughout the month of August, the enemy, under cover of the night, sent above Quebec at different times, as many as 20 ships of all sizes, whereby our force was divided through fear of a landing above Quebec; and protected by those ships, burnt the baggage of the troops at Dechambeau, 14 leagues above Quebec, and seriously impeded the arrival of the provisions which were coming from Montreal. All the merchantmen and the King's frigate were sent three leagues farther up. M. de Vainlair<sup>1</sup> captain of fire ships, who commanded them, proposed very useful plans, which were not heeded. Provisions began to fall short; we were about to be conquered by famine. All those who had specie [hoarded] were invited to give it for Bills of Exchange at sight on the Intendant's bankers; with that, wheat was obtained from the farmers; beef was never wanting, the enemy had some of ours at discretion, but this the farmers could not hide as they did their wheat.

On the first of September the English set fire to all the settlements below Montmorency and on the Island of Orleans and burned at the same time their camp which they evacuated on the third; and had their army conveyed back to Point Levy; one would have supposed they were thinking of going away, but on the night of the eighth and ninth, they sent some more ships above Quebec, on board which they put in the day time three or four thousand men. M. de Bougainville who guarded that side, was reinforced by the élite of the troops and had nearly four thousand men between Quebec and Cap Rouge (three leagues). Confidence prevailed by reason of the nature of the bank which was very lofty, precipitous and wooded. The design of the enemy was, it was supposed, to go and lay waste the settlements previous to retreating. At the foot of the rampart in a place called L'ance des meres, the acclivity was bare of wood, but appeared so difficult and high, that 'twas thought useless to construct a redoubt there, and a mere guard of 30 or 40 men was stationed there merely to give an alarm.

It was at that spot that the enemy landed at four o'clock on the morning of the 13th, surprised the guard asleep, gained the heights to the number of more than four thousand and there formed in order of battle before eight o'clock. The entire camp of Beauport arrived there at the same hour. The Marquis de Montcalm formed three columns, attacked, and the fate of Quebec was decided by nine o'clock. On the side of the enemy, the General was killed, his second dangerously wounded; on ours, the second General killed on the field and the Marquis de Montcalm mortally wounded so that he survived only 12 hours. This misfortune precipitated a general flight and desertion; no one was willing to recognize any longer either authority or commander. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, carried away by the torrent, waited only for the night to withdraw, abandoning all the baggage and the town with only three days' provisions.

The loss on our part was 5 or 600 killed or wounded; nearly as many on the side of the English. The town capitulated on the 17th of September and the garrison not prisoners, had all the honors of war.

<sup>1</sup> Sic. But quere, Vancelain! M. de VAUCLAIN, Lieutenant in the navy, commanded the naval forces. He was a descendant of one Vauclain of Yvetaux, who had been preceptor of Louis the thirteenth; his family was rich and opulent, yet he had never commanded anything but merchantmen, but had so distinguished himself that the minister had cast his eyes on him in preference to all others to confer on him a particular command, and engaged him to proceed to Canada where he commanded the frigate Atalante. Memoires sur le Canada in Collections of Quebec Literary and Historical Society, 1838, pp. 138, 181. — Ed.

M. de Vaudreuil's Instructions to M. de Ramezay.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Copy of the Memoir to serve as Instruction to M. de Ramezay, Commandant at Quebec, sent by the Marquis de Vaudreuil on the 13th of September at nine o'clock at night.

The position which the enemy occupies above Quebec, notwithstanding the powerful efforts we have just made to dislodge him, becoming every moment still more inaccessible, in consequence of the intrenchments he has erected, joined to the check we have received and to the want of provisions which fail us entirely, places us in the absolute necessity of making our retreat, no other alternative being left to maintain ourselves in the Colony.

We advise M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, that he is not to wait for the enemy carrying the town by assault; therefore, as soon as he shall fail of provisions, he is to hoist the white flag and send the most capable and intelligent officer of his garrison to propose its capitulation agreeably to the subjoined articles, which we support by our observations in the margin.

ARTICLE FIRST.

To demand the honors of war for his garrison, and that it shall be sent back to the army in safety by the shortest route [To this article has been added] with arms, baggage, six pieces of brass cannon, two mortars or howitzers, and twelve rounds for each of them.

OBSERVATIONS.

Note. This is not the time to insist; you must consent to be prisoners of war, in order to be conveyed, officers, soldiers and sailors, to France, on condition of not serving there until exchanged.

TERMS GRANTED.

The garrison of the town, composed of the land forces, Marines and sailors, shall march out of the town with arms and baggage, drums beating, matches lighted, with two pieces of French cannon, and twelve rounds for each piece, and shall be embarked as conveniently as possible, to be landed at the first port in France.

ARTICLE SECOND.

That the inhabitants shall be preserved in the possession of their houses, goods, effects and privileges.

Should the enemy make any difficulty in consenting, let there be added to the first article:—until the possession of Canada be determined by a Treaty of Peace; and give him to understand that this is for the interest of his B. M.

Granted, on laying down their arms.

ARTICLE THREE.

That the inhabitants shall not be molested for having borne arms in the defence of the town, for as much as they were compelled thereto, and

In case his Majesty should desire to keep it, if the General demands the disarming of the inhabitants, and that they shall promise not

Granted.

ARTICLES.	OBSERVATIONS.	TERMS GRANTED.
the inhabitants of the Colonies of both Crowns equally serve as Militia.	to serve any more against his B. M., to consent thereto.
ARTICLE FOUR.
That the effects of the absent officers and inhabitants shall not be touched.	Ought to be granted.	Granted.
ARTICLE FIVE.
That the inhabitants shall not be removed nor obliged to quit their houses, until their condition be settled by a definite treaty between his most C. M. and his B. M.	Ought to be granted.	Granted.
ARTICLE SIX.
That the exercise of the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion shall be maintained; that safeguards shall be granted to the houses of the clergy, friars and nuns, particularly to his Lordship, the Bishop of Quebec, who, animated with zeal for religion and charity for the people of his diocese, desires to reside in it constantly, to exercise his episcopal authority in the town of Quebec freely, and with that decency which his state and the sacred offices of the C. A. and R. religion require, whenever he shall think proper, until the possession of Canada shall be decided by a treaty between his most C. M. and his B. M.	Prove that it is for his B. M.'s interest, in case Canada should remain his, and that in Europe, in all the conquests the different Sovereigns make, they alter the exercise of religion only in so far as those conquests remain theirs.	Free exercise of the Roman religion is granted; safeguards are granted to all religious performances <sup>1</sup> as well as to the Bishop, who shall be at liberty to come and exercise, freely and decently, the functions of his office whenever they shall think proper, until the possession of Canada shall have been decided between his B. M. and his most C. M.
ARTICLE SEVEN.
That the artillery and warlike stores shall be faithfully given up, and that an inventory of them shall be made out.	Should the enemy refuse the inventory, the article is not to be disputed.	Granted.

ARTICLE EIGHT.

That the sick and wounded, the commissaries, chaplains, physicians, surgeons, apothecaries and other people employed in the service of the hospitals, shall be treated conformably to the cartel of the 6th of February, 1759, settled between their most C. and B. M.'s.

OBSERVATIONS.

A necessary article, and to be insisted on, even though the garrison surrender themselves prisoners of war.

TERMS GRANTED.

Granted.

ARTICLE NINE.

That, before the delivering up the gate and entrance of the town to the English troops, their General will be pleased to send some soldiers to be posted as safeguards upon the churches, convents and principal habitations.

Granted.

ARTICLE TEN.

That the King's Lieutenant, commanding in the town of Quebec, shall be permitted to send information to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General, of the surrender of the place, as also that that General may send advice thereof to the French Ministry.

ARTICLE ELEVEN.

That the present capitulation shall be executed according to its form and tenor, without being subject to non-execution under pretence of reprisals, or for the non-execution of any preceding capitulations.

The English General will, perhaps, consider this article useless; he must be told modestly that it is a fitting precaution to obviate all difficulties; as for the rest, if he object, it is not an article to insist on.

Granted.

Minute of the Council of War previous to the Surrender of Quebec.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Minute of the Council of War, on the surrender of Quebec, with the signatures and opinions of the members. 15 September, 1759.

This day, the fifteenth of the month of September, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine, M. de Ramezay, Lieutenant for the King in the Government of Quebec, having judged necessary to assemble the Council of war of the principal officers composing his garrison, to deliberate on the means of defending the place of Quebec, bombarded and cannonaded since the twelfth of July last, and invested on the thirteenth of September, after the loss of a battle and the retreat of the army which protected the place; and after having caused to be read the orders of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, the Governor-General, it has been verified that this place, little capable of defence, being enclosed partly by a mere palisade, might, with its artillery and warlike stores, hold out, some time, against the efforts of the enemy, if provisions were in sufficient abundance, but the returns produced by the Contractor-General's clerk, and the exact investigations made at the houses of the different private inhabitants of the town, have proved that there are remaining, of all sorts of provisions, only about fifteen or sixteen thousand rations, said rations being reduced one-half, and even to one-fourth, to feed more than six thousand people, whereof two thousand six hundred are women or children, one thousand @ twelve hundred men, in the hospitals, servants or prisoners of war, and two thousand two hundred fighting men, soldiers, Militia or sailors.

After this exposé, M. de Ramezay, President in his quality of Lieutenant for the King in the place, has required Mess<sup>rs</sup> C. de Bernet, Lieutenant-Colonel of Infantry, Chev. Doms Lestangelles, D'aureillan, D'aubrespy, St. Vincent, Parfourne, Bigot, Marcel, Captain of Infantry, Cinge, Pellégrin, Captain of the port, Joannés, Captain-Adjutant of the Regiment of Languedoc, Major of the place, to give their opinions, in writing, in order to decide on the course to be pursued in the present conjuncture, who have voted as follows:

The exposé of the Council of War, and the reasons which have obliged it to be assembled, being considered, I see no other course to be adopted than to endeavor to obtain from the enemy the best capitulation possible. Quebec, 15th September, 1759.

(Signed), PELLEGRIN.

The total want of provisions and the hopelessness of any succor, being considered, my opinion is to surrender the place, and to leave as honorably as we shall be able. Quebec, the 15th September, 1759.

(Signed), D'AILLEBOUT, Captain.

The investment of the place being made; the enemy's batteries on the eve of opening, without any hope of relief, the army which covered us, fallen back, as we can judge by the Marquis de Vaudreuil's Memoir of Instruction to M. de Ramezay, threatened with famine in two days, I am of opinion that it is time to arrange with the enemy to obtain honorable conditions, which would be refused were he aware of the want of provisions to which we are reduced. Quebec, 15th September, 1759.

(Signed), LUSIGNAN, JUN<sup>r</sup>.

To reduce the ration and push the defence of the place to the last extremity. Quebec, 15th September, 1759.

(Signed), FIEDMONT.

After M. de Ramezay's exposé, the sole article of provisions determines me to the opinion, that it is scarcely possible to expect any greater extremity; to endeavor [to obtain] from the enemy the most honorable capitulation possible, such is my advice. Quebec, 15th September, 1759.

(Signed), MARCEL.

The extremity to which the place is reduced for provisions being considered, my opinion is, to demand a capitulation. Quebec, 15th September, 1759.

(Signed), BIGOT.

The reasons above submitted and proved being considered, and after having reduced the garrison of this place to the lowest ration, my advice is to capitulate. 15th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1759.

(Signed), PARFOURNE.

Having considered the exposé by which we are assembled, the return of the provisions, the quantity of mouths in this place, invested on all sides, I conclude that it is very proper to obtain from our enemies a capitulation as advantageous as possible. Quebec, 15th September, 1759.

(Signed) ST. VINCENT.

The exposé and the small amount of provisions being considered, I consent to capitulate in the most honorable manner possible. Quebec, 15th September, 1759.

(Signed) D'AUBRESPY.

The extreme scarcity of provisions which exists, the impossibility of receiving any, and the very bad, dilapidated fortifications, oblige me to vote that there be obtained as soon as possible a capitulation honorable to the King's arms and in which the Regular troops shall be at liberty to join their corps. 15th September, 1759.

(Signed) D'AUREILLAN.

The small amount of provisions in the place being considered, we ought to endeavor to make an honorable capitulation. Quebec, 15th September, 1759.

(Signed) DE L'ESTANGCELLES.

On the report that has been submitted [to] the Council of war, the scarcity of provisions that prevails, my opinion is to make proposals. 15th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1759.

(Signed) CHEV. DORUS.

Considering the scarcity of provisions which entirely fail us, I am of opinion to capitulate, on condition of obtaining from the English General the most honorable capitulation. Quebec, 15th September, 1759.

(Signed), Chev. DE BERNET.

Considering the return of the provisions, which proves that there cannot be more than six or seven days' supply in the place, on reducing the ration to one-fourth, and obliging even the women and children to go out, which could postpone the surrender of the place but a few days, my opinion is, that after having sent from the town a picked detachment of six hundred men, more or less, to join and reinforce the army, the remainder, taken by preference from the Militia of the town and government of Quebec, should capitulate in order to obtain, according to M. de Vaudreuil's instruction, the most honorable conditions. 15th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1759.

(Signed), JOANNÉS.

Considering the instructions I have received from the Marquis de Vaudreuil and the scarcity of provisions, proved by the returns to me furnished, and the searches I have had made, I conclude to endeavor to obtain from the enemy the most honorable capitulation. Quebec, 15th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1759.

(Signed), RAMEZAY.

M. Bernier to the Duke de Belle Isle.

[ Département de la Guerre, Paris ]

Quebec, 19th September, 1759.

My Lord,

I have the honor to address you, inclosed, the triplicates of my despatches of the spring, which it has been impossible to transmit sooner in consequence of the interruption of all communication between this country and France. I hope they will prove to you my exactitude and zeal for the service. They will depict to you our situation at the time, but everything has again changed unfortunately since that time. You will have learned it, however, from other sources, without my entering into the detail thereof, in the despatch I have now the honor to write you.

The historical summary<sup>1</sup> of our campaign, fortunate in its inception, deplorable in its results, is all that I am permitted to draw up, by the want of time and the immense labor imposed on me in a town unexpectedly captured, and whose garrison is to be embarked in twenty-four hours from its capitulation. What prudence does not perhaps allow me to write, Chevalier de Bernet, and many other officers who are going back to France, will be able to inform you of.

It is impossible for me to furnish, at this moment, the present situation of the Regular troops; they are more weakened by what has fallen into the enemy's hands than by what they might have suffered from sickness.

As for the rest, I cannot be too much satisfied at the facilities afforded me by the English Generals in the duties of my office, and especially relative to the last cartel.

Eventually, when the disorder into which we have fallen, will be dispelled, I shall have the honor to render you an exact account of everything that will relate to my office.

I annex hereunto a return of the killed and wounded on the day of the thirteenth, as exact as it has been possible for me to procure it, having had no communication with our army, which leaves us in ignorance as yet of what was remaining on its side.

I have drawn up the return of the Regular troops taken in the town, which consists of five pickets, making, in all, seventeen officers and 174 soldiers, wherein I have specified the last returns I have drawn up at their respective regiments, and according to which they will have to be paid their allowances in France. I have handed a statement thereof to Chevalier de Bernets, as time does not permit me to make many copies of it, which I shall send by and by.

Chevalier de Bernets, who has distinguished himself in the defence of the place, and on whom the greatest labor has devolved in consequence of the sickness of the titular Commandant, will tell you, my Lord, better than I could write it, the situation in which we are left.

M. Marcel, Aid-de-Camp to the Marquis de Montcalm, honored with the confidence of his General, will be well able to supply what the former may omit.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

BERNIER.

P. S. Having been able to obtain, in time, a copy of the inspection I made of the Regular troops that have embarked, I have the honor to address it to you, exclusive of that handed to M. de Bernets, to serve at the landing of said troops.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

Head Quarters, St. Augustin,
4 leagues from Quebec, 21st 7<sup>ber</sup> 1759.

My Lord,

I have the honor to report to you that on the night of the 12th @ 13th of this month, General Wolf having completed the landing of his army at l'anse des meres, carried the heights in the rear of Quebec. The Marquis de Montcalm, who was the first informed of the circumstance, supposed no doubt, that it was only a detachment. That General, carried away by his zeal and great vivacity, dispatched the pickets of the different regiments, a part of the battalions and Canadians, and advanced himself without communicating his arrangements to me.

Immediately on hearing of this movement, my Lord, I feared the action would be brought on before the junction of the corps under the command of M. de Bougainville, composed of the elite of our troops; I ordered the advance of the remainder of our forces, with the exception of the posts of the line of Beauport and set out immediately to place myself at the head of the army.

The Marquis de Montcalm unfortunately attacked before I had joined him; he perceived his defeat the same moment, and so great was the disorder among the troops that, forced to retire himself, he was then mortally wounded.

When I arrived, my Lord, on the field of battle, the flight was so general, that I could not stop a soldier. I rallied about 1,000 Canadians, who by their bold front, arrested the enemy in his pursuit.

M. de Ramezai, who was in command at Quebec, surrendered the place on the 18th of this month, on the conditions set forth in the capitulation, copy whereof is hereunto annexed. I expected a more protracted resistance, having adopted the surest measures to convey provisions and men into that town. M. de Ramezai was advised of the fact.

I recalled Chev<sup>r</sup> de Levis, after the Marquis de Montcalm was wounded, and immediately upon his arrival, marched with the army confident of relieving Quebec.

I hope, my Lord, that you will please to express to the King the poignant regret I have felt at this occurrence in a moment so unexpected. I beg you to assure his Majesty that I have adopted the best measures not only to preserve his provinces, but even to repair our losses, if circumstances permit.

Chev<sup>r</sup> de Levis reunites the qualities of the excellent General; I shall agree with him on all points.

I postpone to another time, my Lord, entering into details respecting our position.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and most obedient servant.

Articles of Capitulation demanded of his Excellency the General of his Britannic Majesty's troops, by Mr. de Ramsay, the King's Lieutenant, commanding the upper and lower towns of Quebec, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of St. Lewis.

The Capitulation demanded on the other side, has been granted by his Excellency, General Townshend, brigadier of the armies of his Britannic Majesty in the manner and on the conditions expressed below.

ART. 1st.

Mr. de Ramsay demands the honors of war for his garrison, and that it shall be sent back to the army in safety, and by the shortest route, with arms, baggage, six pieces of brass cannon, two mortars or howitzers, and twelve rounds for each of them.

1.

The garrison of the town composed of land forces, Marines and sailors, shall march out of the town with arms and baggage, drums beating, matches lighted, with two pieces of French cannon, and twelve rounds for each piece; and shall be embarked as conveniently as possible, to be landed at the first port in France.

ART. 2.

That the inhabitants shall be preserved in the possession of their houses, goods, effects and privileges.

2.

Granted: Upon their laying down their arms.

ART. 3.

3.

That the inhabitants shall not be molested for having carried arms in the defence of the town, forasmuch as they were compelled to it, and the inhabitants of the Colonies of both Crowns, equally serve as militia.

Granted.

ART. 4.

4.

That the effects of the absent officers and citizens shall not be touched.

Granted.

ART. 5.

5.

That the inhabitants shall not be removed, nor obliged to quit their houses, until their condition shall be settled by their Britannic and most Christian Majesties.

Granted.

ART. 6.

6.

That the exercise of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion shall be maintained; that safe-guards shall be granted to the houses of the Clergy, and to the monasteries and convents, particularly to his Lordship the Bishop of Quebec, who, animated with zeal for religion, and charity for the people of his diocese, desires to reside in it constantly, to exercise his episcopal authority in the town of Quebec, freely and with that decency which his state and the sacred offices of the Roman religion require, whenever he shall think proper, until the possession of Canada shall be decided by a treaty between their most Christian and Britannic Majesties.

The free exercise of the Roman religion is granted, likewise safe-guards to all religious persons, as well as to the Bishop, who shall be at liberty to come and exercise, freely and with decency, the functions of his office, whenever he shall think proper, until the possession of Canada shall have been decided between their Britannic and most Christian Majesties.

ART. 7.

7.

That the artillery and warlike stores shall be faithfully given up, and that an inventory of them shall be made out.

Granted.

ART. 8.

8.

That the sick and wounded, the Commissaries, Chaplains, Physicians, Surgeons, Apothecaries, and other people employed in the service of the hospitals, shall be treated conformably to the cartel of the 6th of February, 1759, settled between their most Christian and Britannic Majesties.

Granted.

ART. 9.

9.

That before the delivering up the gate and the entrance of the town to the English troops, their General will be pleased to send some soldiers to be posted as safe-guards upon the churches, convents, and principal habitations.

Granted.

ART. 10.

10.

That the King's Lieutenant, commanding the town of Quebec, shall be permitted to send information to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General, of the surrender of the place, as also that that General may send advice thereof to the French Ministry.

Granted.

ART. 11.

11.

That the present capitulation shall be executed according to its form and tenor, without being subject to non-execution under pretence of reprisals, or for the non-execution of any preceding capitulations.

Granted.

The present Treaty has been made and executed in duplicate by and between us, at the Camp before Quebec, this 18th day of September, 1759. Signed and Sealed.

Signed to the Minute: CHA'S SAUNDERS.
GEO: TOWNSHEND.
DE RAMEZAY.

Chevalier de Montreuil to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Camp at Pointe aux tremble, 22nd 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1759.

My Lord,

The check we have had the misfortune to experience on the thirteenth of this month on the heights of Quebec, has been occasioned by the surprisal of a post between l'anse des Mers and that of the Foulon, distant one-eighth of a league to the north above Quebec. A body of about 4,500 English had time to form on the plain before the arrival of our little army encamped at Beauport, from which were detached, the moment the enemy had conveyed several ships above Quebec, five companies of grenadiers, five pickets of troops of the Line of fifty men each, one hundred volunteer soldiers taken from the five battalions, five hundred picked Canadians, and about six hundred selected at random, to be under the orders of M. de Bougainville, who was to observe the enemy's movements above Quebec, where they had sent twenty-two sail, one of which was a fifty gun ship, and several frigates. The corps d'élite, the greater portion of which was at Cap Rouge, two leagues and a half from the spot at which the enemy landed, was notified too late, and arrived at the St. Foix road in presence of the enemy only two hours after the loss of the battle, which commenced at ten o'clock. Had the Marquis de Montcalm postponed one instant marching against the enemy, they could not have been attacked in consequence of the favorable position which they were going to take up, having even begun some intrenchments in their rear. M. de Bougainville's detachment could have had more than time sufficient to come to our relief, had he been notified early, as was to be expected, from the arrangement of his posts from Quebec to Cap Rouge, where he then was in person. The Marquis de Montcalm, not seeing him arrive, could not but think he had not been notified at all, and determined to attack, seeing his destruction certain, if he waited any longer, and the impossibility of dislodging the enemy, should they once become masters of the height called the Côte d'Abraham, half a gunshot from Quebec. People will not fail to inform you, as well as the Minister of the Marine, verbally or in writing, that he was too precipitate in attacking; that he ought to wait for M. de Bougainville's reinforcement, and dispute the ground by a running fire. All these means would not have prevented the enemy establishing themselves on Côte d'Abraham the moment they would have had time. Although I regarded the Marquis de Montcalm too enlightened to presume on giving him any advice, I, nevertheless, took the liberty to tell him, before he had given the order of battle, that he was not in a condition to attack the enemy, considering the small number of his army. Note. That exclusive of the two thousand men detached with M. de Bougainville, eight hundred had been sent to the Upper country, one hundred of whom were soldiers picked from the five battalions present at the affair of the 13th of this month. Please permit me, my Lord, to express to you the deep sorrow I feel at this unfortunate event, and the loss of the Marquis de Montcalm. I shall serve with the same zeal and application under Chevalier de Levis' orders. I flatter myself I shall find in him the same kindness the former entertained for me, and I dare make oath before you, that a few days before his death he did me the honor to tell me, that he would request you to be pleased to grant me the rank of Brigadier in preference to all others in this army. You have excited in me the hope, my Lord, by the letter you wrote last year to the Marquis de Montcalm about me, that I should have the good fortune to be invested with that rank in a short time. Honor me, at present, I pray you, with your protection and kindness.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,
Chev. DE MONTREUIL.

M. Daine to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Quebec, October 9th, 1759.

My Lord,

Incessantly occupied since the arrival of the English before Quebec, to the day of its surrender, I have not been able to keep an exact journal of what has occurred, therefore, I shall not send any detail respecting it. I only propose having the honor of rendering you an account of what caused the capitulation concluded on the 18th ultimo, by M. de Ramezay, who commanded there, after having held a council of war, at which all the officers of the garrison gave their opinions in writing.

I have also had the honor to inform you in my preceding letter that, on the 13th of the same month, we had lost a battle almost under the walls of the town, and several officers of the different battalions who were in that action, among others the Marquis de Montcalm and Brigadier Sennezeurgue; that the remainder of the army which had escaped, was to fall back on the town, instead of which it took to flight in disorder and confusion, and abandoned that unfortunate town to itself, without any defences or provisions, and without a sufficient number of men capable of defending it, as you have been able to judge, my Lord, by the detail thereof I had the honor impartially to communicate to you. But, as my letter might have been intercepted, permit me to repeat to you the detail.

After the battle of the 13th, the Marquis de Vaudreuil sent word to the Commandant to hold out, as he was about to send him some relief of every description. This Commandant was accordingly induced to postpone the capitulation, but seeing that he waited nine<sup>1</sup> days in vain, he finally determined to capitulate with the unanimous consent of those who composed the Council of War, and on the reiterated demands of all the officers who had a perfect knowledge of the resistance so poor a place was capable of, with so much the more reason, as to feed 800 men employed at the Upper and Lower town batteries, 5 @ 600 fighting men, the majority of whom were worn out and unwilling, and 2,676 persons, women and children, according to the information I took in my quality of Lieutenant-General of Police in the town; it had only 15 barrels of flour, 23 of Indian corn and 25 of rice, a little pork and some other refreshments, so that there was, at most, only provision for one day and a half, even by reducing the ration. In this extremity, and in order not to expose the garrison and the people to a general assault, and thereby to the fury of the avenger, according to the laws of war, the Commandant judged that hesitation was no longer excusable. He then concluded the most honorable capitulation that was ever made.

As I have already described in one of my preceding letters, I shall not again dwell, my Lord, on the defect of the fortifications of that place open on all sides, it being enclosed at different points only by a simple palisade!

In such a position, can it be said with justice that the Commandant was in too great a hurry, and might have waited? No, without doubt, unless to expose his garrison and the people to be put to the sword, which would indubitably have been the case.

Never was rout more complete than that of our army. Posterity will scarcely credit it.

The center of the column is still the King's, and there is no appearance, as the season is too far advanced, that the enemy can penetrate either by the rapids or by Isle aux Noix. We cannot have any news from those parts, the communication being stopped.

As the inhabitants of Quebec and those of the neighboring parishes, cannot be removed to France according to the terms of Article 5 of the capitulation, they have not been able to dispense with taking an oath not to bear arms against the King of England, nor with promising not to communicate any intelligence to the French to the prejudice of his service. Under these circumstances, they have wished me to remain in the town to judge according to our laws and constitutions, the disputes that may arise between them. I concluded on doing so with the consent of the English Generals, until next year, when I shall repair to France, unless a treaty between the two crowns restore this unfortunate town to the King.

I have adopted this course, my Lord, only with the view of being useful to the King and the poor inhabitants of the town and adjoining parishes, who are suffering and groaning from want of provisions and money to buy any, in consequence of the non-circulation of the ordonnance money.

You have, up to this date, honored me with your kindness, which is extremely necessary to me now that I am ruined by the loss of my situation and the little furniture and effects I possessed, whereby I am reduced to the most extreme indigence, having no funds in France.

It is very saddening for me, my Lord, after 44 years service, with as much zeal as disinterestedness, to see myself and my family on the brink of dying of hunger, if you have not the goodness to continue your protection to me, in order to obtain for me from the King some gratuity and an office that might support me.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DAINE.

Operations of the Army under M. de Montcalm before Quebec.

Extract of a journal kept at the army commanded by the late Lieutenant-General de Montcalm.

Canada expected, since the fall of Louisbourg, to be attacked this year simultaneously on all sides. Quebec, the only barrier of this Colony on the river side, being, from the nature of its fortifications, incapable of sustaining a siege, attention was directed, since the beginning of the winter, to putting it at least beyond the danger of a coup de main. The Minister's orders, which came by the first vessels announcing the enemy's designs against this place, urged M. de Vaudreuil to omit nothing to put it in a state of defence. Nevertheless, the work still languished, but the arrival in the river of a fleet of 13 sail, the intelligence of which was received on the 23rd of May, roused men from their languor. M. de Montcalm was already at Quebec, whither M. de Vaudreuil went in a few days after. Several councils were held, at which the defect of the fortifications of the place appeared a new not to admit of the slightest hope of being able to hold out. It was merely resolved :

To close the town either by walls or palisades on the side of the river, where 'twas absolutely open.

To increase the batteries of the Lower town, the communications between which and the Upper, would be intersected and defended by artillery, and to furnish the ramparts with cannon both on the land and river sides.

To form new batteries at the Palace ship yard, for the purpose both of defending the mouth of the River St. Charles and flanking the quarter commonly called the Canoterie.

To line the right bank of that river with intrenchments from its mouth to the General Hospital; to sink two ships in it on which batteries would be erected; finally, to throw an estrade there in order to prevent any surprisal the enemy might attempt in that direction, with a view to occupying the heights commanding the town.

To line the crested bank from the River St. Charles to the Falls of Montmorency with intrenchments, at certain distances whereof should be erected redoubts and redans furnished with batteries, the fire of which might cross each other at different points; and also to take some precautions at L'ance des mers and Sillery, although that quarter was deemed inaccessible.

To construct a pontoon of a hexagon figure, capable of bearing 12 guns of large calibre, and 6 gunboats, each carrying a 24-pounder; to place four 8-pounders on a gabarre, and arrange 8 flat bateaux so as to receive each a gun of the same calibre: all these vessels were intended as a defence during the night, both to the approaches of the town and the intrenchments, and were themselves to send bark canoes ahead, which patrolling throughout the night would be able to give notice of the slightest movement on the part of the enemy.

Such was the plan I proposed in the Memoir the late Marquis de Montcalm demanded of me on the operations relative to the Marine. It was not followed at first, but was fallen back on towards the middle of the campaign.

To convert eight vessels into fire ships and construct 120 rafts loaded with combustible matter, to be let loose on the enemy's fleet when within reach.

These rafts were launched towards the end of July. The current was mistaken and they produced no effect.<sup>1</sup>

Finally, to send the remainder of our ships as far as Three Rivers and even Montreal, and to store there the greatest part of our provisions, one month's supply of which only should be kept in the place for the army.

M. de Montcalm wished, in the beginning, that only fifteen days' supply should be retained; as he did not dare flatter himself with being able to stay the first effort of the enemy, he spoke of abandoning that place at the very moment he was making the fate of all Canada dependent on it, as may be seen by Article 6 of the capitulation, the draft of which he then furnished.

The army consisted of 5 battalions of land troops, (about 1,600 men); about 600 Colonials, 10,400 Canadians and sailors distributed throughout the batteries, 918 Indians of different nations, and a troop of cavalry composed of 200 volunteers taken from the different corps and to be posted promptly wherever the enemy should show themselves, to be attached to the General's suite and to convey orders: in all 13,718 fighting men.

The formation of this corps gave rise, in the beginning, to a great many jokes; M. de Montcalm did not originate it. It has since been universally admitted that vast service was derived from it.

So strong an army was not anticipated, because it was not expected that there would be so large a number of Canadians; the intention was to muster only the men capable of sustaining the fatigues of the war; but such an emulation prevailed among that people, that old men of 80, and children of 12 @ 13 were seen coming to the camp, who would never consent to take advantage of the exemption granted to their age. Never were subjects more deserving the bounty of their Sovereign; on account either of their constancy at labor, or their patience under the difficulties and wretchedness which, in that country, have been extreme; in the army they were subject to all the corvées.

<sup>1</sup> Those parts of this Document printed in Italic are in a different sort of manuscript from the other portions, as if a commentary of the author, or of another person, distinct from the Journal. They are put in Italic letter merely to mark this distinction in the writing, which cannot be well shown in print otherwise. — En.

M. de Montcalm wished to have the Militia incorporated into the battalions, and M. de Vaudreuil consented. All were then subjected to regular service.

No means imaginable were omitted to procure the greatest promptness in the execution of the different arrangements.

Meanwhile the enemy's fleet, favored by a Northeast wind, which has constantly prevailed whilst they needed it, was advancing and becoming daily more numerous in the river.

The vanguard, (13 sail, big and little), found itself at anchor in the beginning of June, under the Isle aux Coudres; the English did not land there however until 3 days after; at first they feared to encounter ambushes there, but finally finding it had been absolutely abandoned, they scattered themselves over the island without any precaution, which the inhabitants of St. Paul's bay remarking from the tops of their mountains, sent word accordingly, and thereupon 'twas resolved to dispatch M. de Niverville, a Colonial officer, thither with a detachment of Canadians and Indians, to endeavor to take some prisoners. He proceeded thither, but the sight of the English frightened the Indians who refused to attack, and the expedition had to be abandoned. Among the Canadians was a young man named Desrivieres, who, indignant at the cowardice of his companions, declared to them that, not wishing to participate in the disgrace of having abandoned, without cause, a project the execution of which was so easy, he was going to undertake it single handed; thereupon some farmers belonging to the island, who were in the same detachment, offered to accompany him; they set off, to the number of 10, and soon returned with three young midshipmen whom they had captured.

We learned from these young men nothing more than we already knew of the projects England was forming against Canada; they told us nothing respecting either their strength or operations that has not been since verified; they told us that the fleet was bringing 30 thousand men, including troops and seamen, and that was exact, but it appeared to us by their deposition, that Admiral Durel, who commanded that first division, was uneasy for the remainder of the fleet; they added, that at the moment they were taken, more than 600 persons were on the beach unarmed, whom the smallest detachment could have destroyed; that they had remained three days on board, without daring to land, and had not concluded on sending their canoes ashore until by their observations they were fully convinced that no person remained on the Island; that as for the rest, the Admiral had given the strictest orders to leave everything in the state it may be found, and threatened with the severest punishment those who should commit any disorder.

June 8th. Eight ships came up as far as Cape Torment, sent to sound the Traverse of the Island of Orleans, where all the marks laid down to designate the channel had been destroyed; experiencing no opposition in their operations, they were on the 14th able to come to an anchor in front of St. Francis, whither they immediately dispatched two boats; they expected to find that place also abandoned, but were mistaken; we had a pretty considerable party of Canadians and Indians, but the impatience of the latter on seeing the English (which is ordinarily the case) did not permit us to derive all the advantage we might gain and expect from the confidence with which those barges made their appearance at the landing. M. de Courtemanche, a Colonial officer, who commanded the corps, had given orders to his troop to allow the English to land and even not to oppose their reëmbarkation, hoping to induce them thereby to return the next day in still greater numbers and still greater security; this ruse might succeed, but the Indians having yelled even before the boats had touched the beach, the latter shoved back after having been exposed to some musket shots, which wounded nobody.

16th M. Lemercier, Commandant of the artillery, obtained an order from M. de Vaudreuil to have 4 guns conveyed to the Island of Orleans, with which he fired some volleys at the vessels. The latter replied, and that artillery was brought back to town. This will not be the only occasion, 'twill be perceived, where time has been lost.

Some English barges which had advanced to reconnoitre one of the coves of that island, having been discovered by some Indians, were sharply pursued, and one of them overtaken and carried off; 8 men were found on board; these prisoners confirmed what the 3 midshipmen had stated, and added only that the ships were to rendezvous before the town.

The only service rendered by the artillery, which had been conveyed to the Island of Orleans, was to check those barges, whose object was to cut out a schooner armed as a fire-ship, which had been sent thither.

26th At night the greater part of the fleet was anchored at the Island of Orleans.

27th One ship and two frigates advanced this morning to reconnoitre the town. Mr. Wolf was on board, and we have since learned that as soon as he had taken an exact reconnoissance of the town and our intrenchments, which had been already completed, he did not conceal from some of his principal officers of the army who accompanied him, that he did not flatter himself with success. These three vessels retired in the afternoon, and that same night, in spite of a N. E. wind that was blowing pretty stiff, Mr. Wolf caused a landing to be effected near St. Laurent, where he encountered no resistance. M. Courtemanche's detachment then consisted of 800 men, Canadians and Indians; he was ordered to rejoin the army. Some days before, all the families and cattle belonging to the farmers were removed from the island.

The entire fleet having finally come together, 'twas thought proper to bring the fire-ships into operation before the enemy should be masters of both banks of the river, as it was not intended to contest the ground at Point Levy with them; orders were accordingly issued to prepare for starting, and at nightfall, they set sail with a light breeze from the S. W. to the number of 7 only; the Sth had been burnt in the harbor through the imprudence of the men who were preparing it, and the vessel which was to take its place was not yet ready. But two causes militated against the success of this expedition; these fire-ships were not chained two by two, as had been agreed on, and the pilots had the cowardice to set fire to, and abandon them more than a league and a half from the fleet; how indignant soever those in the army were at the conduct of the commanders of those fire-ships, yet, M. de Vaudreuil was unwilling to say anything disagreeable to them, and employed them that very moment at different batteries. This experiment cost the King about a million, and the life of Sieur Dubois de la Miltière, a young man of promise, who commanded one of these fire-ships; his mate met the same fate.

The Memoir I communicated to the Marquis de Montcalm contained also my opinion on the employment of fire-ships; after discussing the advantage that might be derived from them, I explained, according to the knowledge I may have obtained of the craft and what I have often heard intelligent seamen say, both the precautions to be taken in the preparation of those vessels and the conduct to be observed, to enable them to accomplish the object proposed. I had, above all, insisted on the necessity of chaining them 2 to 2, and I believe that all intelligent seamen will agree that it was hardly possible to derive advantage from them in a stream, the rapidity of which is known to the whole world. My Memoir was read at the Council.

29th At night the English landed at Beaumont point, on the south shore. M. de Lery, a Colonial officer, who was reconnoitring there with a detachment, thought he should be surprised: He had merely time to escape, after having lost some of his men.

30th In the morning the enemy following the bank of the river made their appearance at Point Levy to the number of 3 thousand men: A detachment of Indians whom we had sent to that quarter kept up a fire on them the whole night, under cover of the woods; killed two of their men and took one prisoner, according to whose deposition we were to be attacked the next night. That disconcerted the plan which had been formed, to convey a large body of troops across the river to drive the enemy from that quarter before securing a position there, and reduced us to adopt all possible precautions to give them a warm reception on landing.

1st July. It happened at the break of day, by some misunderstanding, the origin of which could not be discovered, that the Militia of the right fired, without any cause, a general discharge of musketry; we thought ourselves attacked in that quarter; the whole army flew to arms and rushed thither.

Nothing else of interest occurred throughout that day; our Indians and some Canadians exchanged shots at Point Levy with the enemy's light infantry, and brought us at night a proclamation of Mr. Wolf, which they had found posted on a church door. I append hereunto a copy of it. The object this General proposed thereby is very palpable; his character is also perfectly perceptible therein. As for the rest, there were at Point Levy only about 3,500 men, who pitched their camp at the foot of the church. The rest of the army was on the Island of Orleans.

2nd The enemy reconnoitered the entire extent of the right of the river, which faces the town, and employed the following days in tracing the different works they wished to erect there. As for us, always apprehending an attack on our intrenchments, we kept within the bounds of a most strict defensive. Murmurs meanwhile were heard in the army at this inactivity. 'Twas remarked, that it was so much the more easy to annoy the enemy in his works, that supposing even an attack should be repelled, a secure retreat was always to be found in the woods in the rear, where the Canadian and Indian, 'tis known, possess so great an advantage over the Regulars. To this reasoning, it was answered, that being scarcely able to flatter ourselves that we should be strong enough with all our forces (the army was then assembled) to prevent the English landing at Beauport, it would be imprudent, by weakening that quarter, to expose ourselves to open a passage there to the enemy, to whom we should find ourselves, that very instant, obliged to abandon Quebec. The intelligent reader will weigh the pro and con, but certain it is, that the enemy never intended attacking us in front at our camp at Beauport. We have had the misfortune not to be able to perceive the advantage of the position we had taken there; it did not escape Mr. Wolf, who knew how to appreciate the effect which ought to result from the fire of our different batteries, and that of our musketry composed of Canadians, not one of whom, all the world knows, but is a hunter.

M. de Montcalm, according to the talk of some Colonial officers who had navigated, was a long time persuaded that the English had a landing force of 20 thousand men. In vain I endeavored to disabuse him by the plainest demonstrations, referring to the number and size of the vessels which composed the fleet; he did not alter his opinion until he saw my calculation verified by the depositions of divers prisoners and deserters.

6th We learned by intelligence received from Carillon, La Présentation and Niagara, that these three forts were threatened. 'Twas then regretted that this last had been too much weakened, the force of which might have been increased about 1,000 men, who were sent to the Beautiful river, without any reasonable view of utility to the King's service.

7th Our boats exchanged shots with the frigates that were approaching Beauport.

8th The batteries which the enemy was erecting opposite the town were, it was noticed, considerably advanced; some volleys of shot and some shells were discharged at them from the place, but M. de Montcalm, considering on the one hand that this fire retarded the enemy's labors but little, and on the other hand, that the state of our magazines required that we should economise our powder, made M. de Vaudreuil consent to order the fire against that quarter to cease.

This silence excited murmurs, but M. Lemercier the Commandant of the artillery, demonstrated its necessity by submitting a statement of the powder.

Towards the evening of the same day, some forty barges full of troops, supported by a frigate, advanced towards the Falls of Montmorency, whilst a 60 gun ship was cannonading the intrenchments on our left, and a ketch was throwing shell.

This movement created the belief that the enemy might intend landing at Ange Gardien, but, the conviction that the River of the Falls was nowhere fordable, making it to be regarded as very indifferent whether the enemy would proceed thither, no precaution was taken to offer any opposition there, and no attention even was paid to the representations some farmers of Ange Gardien made on this subject, who offered to go thither, assuring, from the knowledge they had of the locality, that with one hundred men the English could be prevented ascending the hill, which in fact does not fail of being sufficiently steep and wooded.

Finally, about 9 o'clock, the enemy landed some men who, having reported that part to be entirely abandoned, were followed by the detachment the barges were conveying, which, during the remainder of the night, were busy passing troops from the Island of Orleans to the Falls, so that next morning, at the break of day, Mr. Wolff was there at the head of three @ 4 thousand men. Then all illusion disappeared. The post of the Falls was no longer considered contemptible, when, on beholding the enemy there, it was admitted that it commanded most advantageously the entire left of our camp, and people were at the same time convinced that the river on which it rested was, as the farmers had announced, fordable at divers places. Chevalier de Levy, who was in command at that quarter, perceived the error our false security had just led us to commit, and undertook to repair it by endeavoring to force the enemy to abandon that post. He marched thither with 600 men, preceded by some Indians; reported to M. de Vaudreuil the course he was taking, and asked that Governor at the same time for orders as to his ulterior operations; no time was lost in giving him an answer, whereupon he thought it his duty to bring his troops to a halt.

M. de Vaudreuil told him positively not to run any risk, and that he was preparing to go in person to the spot. He did not arrive there, however, until two hours after.

Meanwhile, the Indians, who continued to advance, soon encountered in the woods, after passing the river, a detachment of about 500 men, whom they obliged to fall back on the main army, which they did not fear to attack. They dared not, however, go too far, on observing that they were not supported. They returned, worn out by fatigue, after having killed or wounded a hundred of the enemy, and brought back 36 scalps as a proof of their success. It had been our policy to have had them press very far. We have since been informed by a sergeant who deserted from the enemy's army, that the English had landed in disorder, to which the dread of being every moment attacked by the Indians, did not a little contribute.

Things being in this state, M. de Vaudreuil thought proper to defer the arrangements for a more considerable attack; he contented himself with summoning a Council of War, the result of which was, that we must remain in our intrenchments; neither the real position of the enemy nor his strength was known, it was alleged; the truth is that M. de Montcalm was not of the opinion to attack, and having, previous to the Council, privately spoken to the heads of the corps, it may be said that he had in some sort disposed them to represent matters as impracticable. M. Bigot was the only one who voted for the attack, and it may be said, in support of his opinion against the pretended inconvenience of exposing ourselves to the loss of everything, by hazarding an almost general engagement with troops reported to be already intrenched.

1st That the enemy was in a very disadvantageous position, inasmuch as the ground 'twas occupying was absolutely commanded by the woods whence we were to make the attack.

2nd That supposing we should have been repulsed, these same woods would have always assisted our retreat, since they must not only be traversed to reach the fords of the river, but moreover, being very thick and backed by lofty mountains, would certainly not have been liable to be turned.

3rd That the subject of subsistence also merited serious attention. The country was already suffering from a serious scarcity; it was therefore so much the more essential to make every effort to endeavor to oblige the enemy to raise the siege of Quebec; for, admitting even that he could not carry that place by assault, we, by dragging things to any length, were always exposed to the danger of being forced by the failure of provisions, to open its gates, and consequently those of the entire Colony, to him. Everybody is aware that nothing is more casual than the crops of this country, and those of this year must have been as abundant as they have been (contrary to the usual course of things), to allow us to escape the rigors of famine; besides, we did not require all our forces to attack Mr. Wolf in the disadvantageous post he was occupying; I will add, that never was more ardor visible than was manifested on this occasion by the soldier, the Canadian and Indian, and I owe several of the officers of the different corps the justice to say, that they appeared to despair on seeing such happy arrangements neglected.

10th The enemy was observed to be fortifying himself at the post he took up the previous evening, where already two field pieces and batteries were in course of erection, destined to batter in reverse the intrenchments which Chevalier de Levy was guarding, whereby that General officer was obliged to change the position of his camp, which continued on the other hand, to be annoyed by the fire from the ship and bomb-ketch. Some shells thrown from a mortar which had been brought from the town, soon obliged those vessels to remove to the offing.

11th From both sides of the River of the Falls a pretty brisk fire was kept up between our Indians and the enemy's light troops. There were some killed and wounded on both sides; the loss however was much greater on the side of the English.

The enemy's works at Point Levy appearing to be pushed on with very great vigor, the uneasiness of the town augmented and excited some murmurs on the part of the people, because, said they, the enemy was permitted peaceably to erect gun and mortar batteries by which they expected to be crushed. Although several officers pretended, and M. de Montcalm was persuaded himself that those batteries were at too great a distance to do serious injury to the town, yet to avoid discouraging the towns people, M. Dumas, Major-General of the Colonial troops, who volunteered, was permitted to organize a corps of one thousand men, to cross with it to the south shore, in order to endeavor to dislodge the enemy from that quarter and to ruin their works. Men of all ranks, even to the mere scholar, volunteered in crowds for this detachment, which in consequence numbered 1,400 men, including the Indians; M. de Montcalm added to it some fifty volunteers from the Regulars.

To all who saw in this, the attack, only of a mob of Militia, without discipline, on Regular troops in their intrenchments, this expedition will appear imprudent, but 'twill cease to be so considered when it is known that those intrenchments were commanded by woods whence they could be fired on, and that those militia unacquainted with the handling of arms, excell incomparably the regular troops in the affairs which are decided purely by musketry. However that may be, M. Dumas set out at 10 o'clock at night; but having been obliged to go up as far as Sillery, he could not cross the river earlier than the night of the 12th @ 13th. Then was to be seen all the extravagances a panic is capable of producing. Scarcely did they set foot on the right bank of the river, when they imagined themselves surrounded by the enemy; three times did M. Dumas endeavor to rally his men and three times did his soldiers, mistaking each other for enemies, fire on and fling one another from the top of the bank to the bottom in order to regain their canoes. A retreat became absolutely necessary. The failure of this expedition called forth a great many remarks. Without wishing to endeavor to make known the true causes thereof, I shall simply say, that according to the report of M. Dumas and some other officers of his detachment, the Regulars, the Canadians and even the simple scholars who composed the party, had nothing to reproach each other with; they all equally gave way to their fright. The Indians alone, who formed the van-guard, behaved well, and found everything in disorder, when they returned from their scout with information that the enemy were not making any movement; as for the rest, it may, without fear of hazarding anything, be said, that this misadventure caused us the loss of one of the most favorable opportunities to strike a blow on the enemy, which the singular uneasiness we have since learned they were continually in, might have rendered of so much the greater advantage, as, not only were they unable to make a very vigorous resistance in a position that is commanded, where they had as yet only some imperfect intrenchments, but 5 large mortars and three 32-pounders with which they fired very briskly on the town that very night, might have been rendered unserviceable.

14th The enemy commenced firing some guns from the batteries they were erecting at the Falls, whereby some of our men were killed and some wounded; they also sent some strong detachments to examine the fords; we thought with the intention of trying to cross at that side. M. de Montcalm accordingly determined to alter his arrangements somewhat; he stripped his centre a little, to post at the head of the fords some strong detachments which intrenched themselves there, and he had Chevalier de Lévis' lines reinforced towards the river, where epaulements were erected against the enemy's batteries. As these different works could not but be very considerable, they fatigued our men very much; 6 guns more of a small calibre were brought from town to that quarter to annoy the enemy in his works, but 'twas no longer time, his artillery being greatly superior to ours, which had to be removed.

16th The enemy throwing into the town a great many shell and fire pots, some fell on a house filled with hay, which was not attended to in sufficient season. The fire progressed and the conflagration communicated to 8 neighboring houses, which were completely burnt. The Point Levy batteries opened on the town to increase the disorder, but we did not delay silencing them by the superiority of our fire.

The enemy's works appeared rapidly advancing at the Falls, where some mortars were already in position, from which they threw shell that did not fail to annoy our troops in their camp. Here we undertook to set up a mortar, but this work languished so much for want of arms that it became useless before it could be completed. It was abandoned.

On the same day we received news from Niagara and Carillon, from which we learned that the English were already laying siege to the former fort and that M. de Bourlamaque, despairing of being able to maintain the latter, notwithstanding the new works he had just added to his fortifications, was preparing to fall back on Isle aux Noix so soon as the enemy, who, he knew were marching, should make their appearance to attack him. He was afraid of being turned by St. Frederic, and 'tis pretended that he had received positive orders to retreat; 'tis impossible to avoid one reflection thereupon. If it had been resolved, before the opening of the campaign, to abandon Carillon, why exhaust the troops with fatigue and the King with expense, to increase the defences of that fort? M. Bourlamaque had, besides, appeared in all his letters previous to that moment, of the opinion that he was able to make a vigorous resistance there 17th A small detachment of our Indians having crossed the River of the Falls, took some prisoners, three of whom they brought us, according to whose report we could scarcely determine Mr. Wolf's real intentions; we merely discovered, from the detail they gave us of his forces and movements, that, having only 9 @ 10 thousand Regulars at most, and estimating our army at 15 to 18 thousand, not only did that General not dare to attack us in front, but he was still under a continual apprehension of being attacked himself; they added, that it was generally reported in their army that the General was not sanguine about taking Quebec until he would be joined by General Amherst, whom he was expecting with the greatest impatience, and that, fearful of running short of provisions, the soldier's rations had been reduced to 7 ounces of biscuit and an equal quantity of salt meat. The depositions made by the different prisoners or deserters are pretty uniform as to that reduction.

The same prisoners told us, moreover, that an old man and some women of the North shore were daily carrying refreshments to the English camp, and had also pointed out to General Wolf the fords in the River of the Falls. 'Tis easy to be inferred, from this intercourse, that the enemy was in no wise harassed.

M. de Vaudreuil was fully of the opinion, according to the Canadian custom, to send some detachments to annoy the enemy. M. de Montcalm was always afraid of weakening himself.

Some farmers who had been taken by the English, and had been set at liberty, after having received much attention from them and from Mr. Wolf himself, returned to us to-day from the enemy's camp. The above behavior was relative to the contents of the proclamation.

17th On the same day the Indians, having requested leave to march in detachment, were permitted to do so; they set out to the number of 5 @ 600, to lie in ambush behind the camp occupied by the enemy at the Falls. This expedition met with no success.

An English sailor who had been taken prisoner, on being interrogated as to what was thought of our fire-ships in the fleet, told us that great alarm had been felt as to their effects, but much surprise was created by the manner they had been conducted, especially at the precipitancy with which they had been set on fire.

A 60 gun-ship, with 5 frigates or transports, passed in front of the town in the night of the 18th and 19th, on their way to set out to anchor at Sillerie. There was not a doubt, but they intended either to cut off our supplies, as they might have been informed that we had stored the greater part of them in our frigates, or to attempt a landing near Sillerie; two guns were posted there, and M. Dumas was immediately dispatched thither with 600 men, with orders to follow on the river side the movements of those vessels, but he was unable to prevent the burning of our last fire ship, the fitting out of which was being completed in L'anse des mers; the English likewise attempted to destroy the rafts we were having prepared there, but were repulsed.

20th One of General Toushend's servants came to us from the enemy's camp, who assured us that there were at the Falls only about three thousand men; this, agreeing with our observations, M. de Montcalm recalled some troops from the left to reinforce the centre. The enemy harassed our left considerably by the continual fire of shot and shell from the batteries at this camp at the Falls.

21st We learned that 4 000 of the enemy's grenadiers had landed at Point aux trembles. M. Dumas received orders to march thither, and a portion of the cavalry was added to his detachment; but the enemy had reëmbarked, their object having been to obtain exact intelligence of what was passing in the country; they contented themselves with seizing all the women whom they found in that village, about one hundred only of whom, however, they carried away; among these were some ladies belonging to the town, who had taken refuge there; the enemy were harassed and pursued by some Indians, who ran and killed and wounded some of their men; General Volff had received the idea of this expedition from Stoho,<sup>1</sup> an English officer, who had been taken as a hostage for the affair of Fort Necessity; convicted of having, notwithstanding his character, kept up some correspondence with the English Generals prejudicial to our service, he had been condemned to be hanged, but the Court having ordered the suspension of that sentence, 'twas thought proper to restore him the liberty he had previously enjoyed in his quality of hostage; he took advantage thereof to effect his escape, and was seconded by an individual who had deserted from New England, and had been some years settled at Quebec, who, acquainted with navigation, embarked with him about the middle of last May in a simple canoe, in which they reached Louisbourg.

22nd The commander of a vessel was sent to propose to the town a suspension of hostilities during 6 hours, in which time the women taken at Point aux trembles were to be delivered up; the proposal was agreed to. All the women, though of different ranks, spoke equally well of the treatment they had received from the English officers; several of them even supped with Mr. Wolf who joked considerably about the circumspection of our Generals; he told <sup>1</sup> ROBERT STOBO was the only son of a merchant of Glasgow, where he was born in the year 1727. He emigrated to Virginia, 'tis said, somewhere about the year 1742, and in 1754 was appointed a Captain in a regiment raised by that Province to repel the encroachments of the French. He was with Washington at Fort Necessity when it capitulated in July of that year, and was left in the hands of the French as hostage for the fulfilment of the articles agreed to on that occasion. He was removed thence to Fort du Quesne, of which he drew up a plan and had it conveyed to the commanding officer at Wills' creek. His correspondence fell into the hands of the French on the defeat of General Braddock, and he was, consequently, committed to prison, at Quebec, whence he attempted to escape in 1756, but was overtaken and brought back, and was afterwards tried on a charge of treason and sentenced to death. This was mere form, it seems, for orders had been already received from France not to put the sentence into execution. He made a second attempt to escape but was again brought back; in 1758 he made a third attempt, and succeeded in joining the British army at Louisbourg. He accompanied it to Quebec, where he was very useful to the English by his knowledge of the localities. After the reduction of that place he returned to Virginia, whence he sailed for England in February, 1760, with letters from General Monckton recommending him to the favor of government. He received a commission of captain in the 15th regiment of foot, 5th of June following; returned to America, and in 1762 served in the West Indies. In 1767 he went to England, and left the army in 1770, in which year, it is supposed, he died. Memoirs of Stobo, Pittsburgh, 1854; Army Lists. — Ed.

these ladies that he had afforded very favorable opportunities for an attack and had been surprised that no advantage had been taken of them.

In the course of the night of the 22nd and 23rd, another conflagration was caused in the town by the vast quantity of fire pots which the enemy continued to throw into it; 18 houses were in consequence reduced to ashes; the Cathedral shared the same fate. The Point Levy batteries did not cease firing all the time; ours replied during the continuance of the conflagration, but when it had been arrested, they discontinued. These troubles were not yet over, when, at 4 o'clock in the morning, one of the enemy's frigates, with a transport, attempted, under favor of a light breeze which sprung up in the N. E., to take advantage of the embarrassment, in which they doubtless thought we were, to pass up to Sillerie. They were mistaken; all the gunners had remained at their post; but the wind having changed the very moment when those vessels began to receive the fire of our batteries, they retired without much loss; our fire was this day very well served.

24th This day was passed in negotiations between the town and the fleet, with which M. Lemercier, the Commandant of the artillery was entrusted, relating to indifferent matters. On the same day we had a very sensible proof of the disorder which prevailed in the army. A great number had gone from it to hunt, who having discovered considerable game towards St. Foy, kept up such a continual fire that the Indians supposing we were attacked at Sillerie, proceeded thither; on their return they represented that some inconvenience might result from such practice; M. de Vaudreuil perceived it and forbid the army to hunt any more.

25th This morning a mistake caused us a pretty serious alarm: a letter came to the camp from St. Michael's cove, informing M. de Vaudreuil that the English had landed there; this news appeared confirmed by the report of cannon which was heard in that direction. The drums were beaten and the army seized their arms; 'twas nothing, however, but the attack of some of our gun boats which, being collected together in that cove, had attracted the attention of the ships and were briskly cannonaded by them, whilst barges were sent to seize them; two were cut out; three went up again to Cap Rouge, and one grounded, which was saved by the fire kept up by some Canadians who had ran thither from the neighboring post. M. Dumas had left M. de St. Martin, a Colonial officer, there with 180 men and had himself marched with a thousand men as far as Jacques Cartier, where 'twas feared the enemy would take up a position; he received orders to have some intrenchments thrown up there. We learned, on the same day by a new prisoner taken on the left, that the enemy had already a formidable artillery at their camp at the Falls, and were continuing to erect gun and mortar batteries there. From that quarter also came, towards evening, a young Canadian, who is still a child, and had previously been taken by the English and released by them in order to deliver an anonymous note to M. de Vaudreuil, containing injurious reproaches against the Governor on the subject of some scalps taken by the Indians, and of some soldiers killed by the Canadians whom they called assassins. He added that, previous to leaving the English camp he saw notice given to some Canadians who had been taken with arms in their hands, to prepare to die; that he saw them led out by some musketeers, and that he was scarcely out of the camp when he heard several shots fired. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil and de Montcalm thought it fitting to come to some explanation on that subject with Mr. Wolf; the tenor of their letter, written in the name of the former, embodied all the dignity, politeness and firmness compatible with the circumstance. M. Lemercier, who was charged with the delivery of that despatch, added a second to it, which he wrote to Mr. Wolf by order of M. de Vaudreuil, wherein, after having proposed to that General various arrangements respecting parleys, he observed that the use of them appeared to be growing somewhat too frequent. Mr. Wolf on the next day had the following letter communicated by one of his Aids-de-Camp to M. de Vaudreuil.

"Sir

"I have the honor, by order of my General, to answer your Excellency's letter brought to him yesterday by M<sup>r</sup> Lemercier respecting some particular articles on the subject of parleys, wherein he complains in your Excellency's name, of the too frequent use of such parleys.

"The General cannot express his astonishment sufficiently at this question: Eh! wherefore have the English demanded a parley? Let the answer be given by those who have received their liberty on the occasion of those parleys.

"General Wolf learns from an intercepted letter written at the Camp of Beauport, that three grenadiers of the Royal American Regiment, taken some days ago, were destined to be burnt alive in your camp. Mr. Wolf would wish to know what has become of them, so as to regulate his conduct in future accordingly.

"The British troops are only too much exasperated; the enormous cruelties already committed, and especially the base infraction of the capitulation of Fort William Henry are yet fresh in their minds.

"Such acts deserve and if repeated will certainly meet, in future, the severest reprisals; all distinction will cease between Frenchmen, Canadians and Indians; all will be treated as a cruel and barbarous mob, thirsting for human blood.

"I have the honor to be, &c.,

"(Signed), ISAAC BAARRÉ.<sup>1</sup>
"Adjutant-General."

<sup>1</sup> Lieutenant-Colonel ISAAC BAARRÉ was born in Dublin in 1726, where his parents, who were from France, kept a small grocery store. He entered the army in 1747, through the influence, it is supposed, of the Bishop of Clogher, and was commissioned Lieutenant in the 32nd foot 1st October, 1755. He accompanied the expedition against Louisbourg, and was appointed, by General Wolfe, "his only protector and friend," Major of brigade on the 12th May, 1758; and on the 4th May, 1759, Adjutant-General of the army against Quebec, with the rank of Major in America and Captain in the army. He was severely wounded, near the person of General Wolfe, in the engagement on the plains of Abraham and lost the sight of one of his eyes in consequence, and in West's celebrated picture is represented as one of the group of officers collected round the expiring General. He soon after went, for the recovery of his wounds, to New-York, where he was appointed Adjutant-General by Amherst, under whom he served in 1760, and in September was sent to England with the despatches announcing the surrender of Montreal. As a reward for his services he was promoted to be Lieutenant Colonel in the army 19th January, 1761. Being a gentleman of parts and address, he attracted the attention of Lord Shelburne, by whose interest he was elected, in December following, to a seat in Parliament for the borough of Chipping Wycombe, and appointed Lieutenant-Colonel commandant of the 106th regiment, or Black Musqueteers (which, however, was disbanded at the peace), and Governor of Stirling Castle, the pay of which was £6 10 a day. His votes in Parliament being opposed to the Court, he was dismissed from the last office in November, 1763. He became, thereupon, one of the leaders of the Opposition, and in 1765 immortalized himself in the debate on the Stamp Act by his eloquent vindication of the American Colonists (Bancroft's United States, V., 240), which gave birth to the "Sons of Liberty." On the formation of the Rockingham Ministry in 1766, Lt. Col. Barré was named Vice Treasurer and obtained a pension of £3,200 as a compensation for the loss of his sinecure office of Governor of Stirling Castle. In the promotion of 1772, the name of Lieutenant-Colonel Barré, who was then again in opposition, was designedly passed over, in consequence of which he threw up his commission in the army 8th February, 1773. He relinquished his pension on being appointed Clerk of the Pells. In his latter years Colonel Barré was totally blind, and died in 1802, in the 76th year of his age. Grenville Papers; Chatham Correspondence. Out of respect for his character, his name has been given to several towns in the United States of America. — Ed.

The following is the answer which M. de Vaudreuil ordered M. de Bougainville to make to Mr. Wolf:

"Sir

"By order of the Marquis de Vaudreuil I reply to the letter written him by M<sup>r</sup> Isaac Baarré, respecting the three grenadiers belonging to the Royal Americans who were taken prisoners. Your Excellency ought to have regarded as soldiers' gossip the tales related in the intercepted letter; the fate of those three prisoners has been the same as that of all the others taken by the Indians; the King has ransomed them out of their hands at considerable expense. The Marquis de Vaudreuil has not instructed me to reply to the menaces, invectives and accusations with which that letter abounds; no doubt you have not read them. Nothing of that sort will make us either cowards or barbarians. Our proceedings are known in Europe and our public papers establish our justification in the matter of the infraction of the capitulation of Fort William Henry.

"I have the honor to be, &c.,

(Signed), BOUGAINVILLE.

26th At the dawn of day, a strong detachment of English being come to fire at that commanded by M. de Repentigny at the head of one of the fords of the River of the Falls, about 400 Indians were sent across a little further up to turn the enemy, but they applied for a reinforcement which was promised them. They waited, meanwhile, in the woods, lying on their faces in presence of the enemy for 5 hours without noticing any movement among our troops. Finally, carried away by their impatience and moreover seeing the enemy profiting by that time to convey fresh troops into the woods, they determined to make the attack alone; it was so impetuous that, according to what we since learned from a sergeant who deserted from the enemy's camp, and some Canadians who happened to be prisoners there, the English, obliged to fall back, retired more than two hundred paces from the field of battle in order to rally, and the alarm extended as far as the camp, to which Mr. Wolf himself returned for the purpose of ordering up the artillery through roads he had had opened; thereupon the Indians seeing themselves almost surrounded, effected their retreat by the ford, their communication with which they had preserved, after having killed or wounded more than 150 of the enemy and lost only two or three of their own men; they met at the pass of the river, the party which was sent to their aid, and which M. de Levis would never take upon himself to dispatch, without having received an order from M. de Vaudreuil. The entire army regretted the loss of so fine an opportunity.

27th Although les anses des mers, du foulon, de Sillery and de St. Michel were regarded as inaccessible, nevertheless the Engineers were sent thither for the purpose of having ditches and abatis constructed in the slopes leading thereto; about 400 men were also distributed throughout these different posts. Some Canadians brought us from the South shore three prisoners who were part of a detachment of 7 men which they had defeated; the four others had been killed.

28th The enemy unmasked, opposite the town, a new battery of 5 pieces of cannon.

29th The enemy's ships which were above Quebec were making different movements; they went up, within a few days as far as St. Augustin and afterwards returned to anchor at Sillerie. We concluded that they wanted to attract our attention on that side, but what was passing at the camp of the Falls, which we saw bristling with cannon and mortars, appeared to demand our exclusive regard. A detachment of 300 Indians was sent to that quarter; having three days' provisions; they were to lie in ambush in the woods in the rear of the enemy whose communication with the country 'twas desirable to cut off.

30th All quiet.

31st Such was not the case to-day. About 10 o'clock in the forenoon, the wind blowing violently from the Southwest, two large transports set sail from the enemy's fleet and advanced towards the Falls of Montmorency; they were soon followed by a 60 gun ship, and all three took up a position opposite Chevalier de Levis' intrenchments, within short cannon range of which the transports grounded full sail sett; the ship kept off, forming with the two former a triangle, whence at the very moment a heavy fire was opened against our lines, which were enfiladed by that from the formidable artillery Mr. Wolf had at the Falls. Whilst our left was exposed to this double cannonade, a great number of barges which were remarked early in the morning to be in motion, after having received troops at Point Levy and from various vessels, were forming themselves into column at the head of the fleet. We could then no longer doubt the enemy's intention to attack us; the army assumed their arms, and the different corps repaired to the intrenchments. The violence of the wind which continued blowing from the S W., the ebb and the occurrences on our left, not allowing us to fear an attack on any other parts of our lines, M. de Montcalm weakened them somewhat and repaired in person to Chevalier de Levis' camp. Finally, about 5 o'clock in the evening the barges, after having, by divers movements, tried to conceal from us the real point of attack, ranged themselves in three divisions; directed their entire course towards the Falls, and precisely at the moment of low water, touched ground along side two vessels which were high and dry on a very fine shoal. Under cover of their fire all the troops effected a landing without confusion, and formed themselves in order of battle, whilst the force encamped at Ange Gardien was crossing, in column, the River of the Falls, to join them. On account of the distance, we were able to oppose to all those movements, only the fire of a few guns of small calibre, placed in some redoubts that had been thrown up in front of our intrenchments; having fired the whole day on the ships, those redoubts unfortunately ran out of ammunition towards the close of the action; they suffered, besides, considerably from the fire they had been exposed to; both these reasons necessitated their abandonment on the approach of a body of Grenadiers which advanced to the attack and ascended thither; but hardly did these become masters of the place than the brisk fire of musketry they received from our intrenchments, which most advantageously commanded those redoubts, obliged the detachment to retreat; the junction of both the enemy's divisions being effected at this moment, we were expecting a general attack, but a violent storm which supervened, having probably opened Mr. Wolf's eyes to the temerity of his undertaking, that General retreated; it is even probable that he went so far only because he had relied too much on the effects of his artillery; he expected that the Canadians and Indians, frightened by the shell and shot, would not hold out, and that in consequence of their flight, his troops might ascend the bank without encountering any great obstacles; but it is due in justice to all the corps of the army which M. de Montcalm had collected there in succession, to say, that they exhibited, on this occasion, all the firmness that could be expected, and that they manifested the greatest impatience to be engaged; feeling all the advantage of their position, they were full of a confidence from which we could, without presumption, anticipate the total defeat of the English army, had it persisted in advancing. It divided a second time; the greater portion recrossed the River of the Falls to regain the camp at Ange Gardien, and the remainder reëmbarking set fire to the two transports, the burning of which put an end to this affair. In the course of it we have had some 60 men killed or wounded by the shot and shell; the enemy's loss, according to the report of prisoners and deserters who have come in since, amounted to about 500 men, almost all grenadiers; a captain of the Royal Americans, and two soldiers were taken prisoners there.

1st August. The ship which was at the Falls rejoined the fleet. The provisions reserved at Quebec for the subsistence of the army, being nearly exhausted, it became absolutely necessary to have some brought from Batiscan; but as the transportation by water appeared very hazardous since the enemy had rendered themselves masters of the river, no course was left but to have them brought by land, which still was not unattended by difficulties. There remained in the country only young children, women, or old men whose infirmities did not permit them to bear arms. It was, however, with the aid of such weak hands that 700 barrels of pork or flour were conveyed on 271 carts from Batiscan to the army, 18 leagues. The subsistence of the troops was thereby assured for 12 or 15 days, but from that moment, alarm was felt at the difficulties that service would eventually encounter; a number of carts were already broken; the women and children who guided them, rebuffed by such rude labor, left no hope of their being able to support it long; regret was begun to be felt at having placed the army's stores at so great a distance.

2nd A few hours truce, during which M. Lemer cier was instructed to go and deliver to General Wolf some letters from M. de Vaudreuil and the Captain of the Royal Americans, who was taken prisoner in the affair of the 31st. This officer, after having spoken in his letter in terms of great praise of the behavior of the French, by whom, he said, he had been rescued with the greatest difficulty out of the hands of the Indians, requested of his General some necessities which he stood in need of.

3rd The enemy continued to strengthen the artillery at the camp of the Falls; M. Dumas brought back to the army the greatest portion of the troops he had at Jacques Cartier, where he had orders to leave only 200 men.

4th Another truce to receive Mr. Wolf's answer to the letters which had been written him on the 2nd. In sending his officer the required baggage, he reproached him, in the answer he sent to his letter, with having, by his imprudent conduct, given M. de Montcalm reason to believe that there was but little discipline in his army, wishing thereby adroitly to convey the impression that his attack of the 31st had been only an error. As for the letter he addressed to M. de Vaudreuil, he made a long enumeration in it of the grievances of the English Nation against the troops of Canada, and superadded most ferocious expressions to reproaches full of bitterness and spite. 'Twas proposed to continue, for the longest time possible, the sojourn in town of the officer who brought these despatches, in order to profit by that interval, to remove to the mortar and gun batteries the material necessary to construct merlons there; these batteries being in barbet, the gunners who served them were greatly exposed to the enemy's fire; already, many of the men were killed at them, but the measures that had been adopted in this regard, were disconcerted in consequence of the little order which prevailed in the different parts of our service. Whilst waiting for the English boat at one of the extremities of the Lower town, a merchant officer who was serving at the batteries, left the other end as soon as the boat appeared, and, having received from the English officer the letters and baggage he had to deliver, sent him immediately back. Five new deserters came over to us to day; their depositions contained nothing of interest. We learned this same day the evacuation of Forts Carillon and St. Frederic, which were blown up, the former on the 27th, the latter on the 31st of July; the retreat from Carillon was so precipitate and disorderly, that 20 soldiers were left behind who were prevented by drunkenness from following the troops; they were taken by the enemy, who also found several cannon and 4 mortars in that fort, the fortifications of which had been only slightly damaged.

5th The Point Levy batteries continued to keep up a very brisk fire on the town. Three new deserters came over to us.

In the night of the 5th and 6th several barges passed in front of the town, and went up as far as the ships, whence a pretty large quantity of effects was landed. As these different movements which the enemy was observed making in that quarter, created an impression that it might be with a design to attempt something there, M. de Montcalm determined to send a reinforcement thither, so that we found ourselves then having, between Quebec and St. Augustin, about 1,000 men, whereof M. de Bougainville had the chief command.

7th Divers vessels which were anchored at Cap Rouge, after having been pretty considerably lightened, went up as far as Point aux écureuils. The King's frigates and the ship Le Fronsac were then at anchor at the foot of the Richelieu; i. e., 3 leagues above Point aux écureuils. The wind did not yet allow of their going any higher up: the intention of the English was probably to capture them, but they took advantage of the north wind which had brought the latter, to ascend the rapid. M. de Bougainville thinned his post somewhat, in order to form a detachment with which he followed the enemy's ships along the river side.

8th Three sailors who deserted from the enemy's fleet came over to us. The English ships which were at Les Ecureuils dropped down again to Point aux trembles, where they made several attempts to land some men, but were always repulsed by M. de Bougainville; nothing of importance occurred there however. M. de Montcalm sent to the camp some small field pieces and howitzers which had been left in the town.

The large quantity of shell, carcasses and fire-pots which the enemy threw during the night of the 8th and 9th, into the place, occasioned a 3rd fire in the Lower town; 152 houses were reduced to ashes there. We learned on the same day that Niagara had capitulated on the 24th of July, and that the surrender of that fort had been preceded by the defeat of our division which had returned from the Beautiful river. This event increased considerably the dejection which the news of the evacuation of Carillon and St. Frederic had already spread among the people; 'twas feared that the enemy encountering only feeble barriers at the entrance of the Cataracoui river would leap the rapids and suddenly pounce on Montreal, which was at the moment bare of every sort of defence; there were some detachments at La Présentation and Isle au Galo; 'twas thought necessary to reinforce these posts; 1,000 men were detached from the army with orders to proceed thither with all speed, and 'twas considered indispensable to entrust Chevalier de Levy with the command of so delicate a quarter; he set out that very day for that place.

11th A detachment of 700 men, composed of Canadians and Indians crossed the River of the Falls to attack some of the enemy's workmen who were making fascines. The firing was pretty sharp; 'twas calculated that a hundred men had been killed or wounded; we had only 7 wounded; things would have been pushed farther had the Outaouas been willing to attack. They did not feel, on that day, disposed to fight, and took scarcely any part in that affair; under all circumstances an adverse fortune appeared to disconcert enterprises from which we might expect the most fruit.

12th On the next day, we had another instance of it. The English, repulsed at Point aux trembles, turned their views to the other side of the river; they were met, on landing by some shots from the farmers who were returning home, but made good their position to the number of 7 @ 800 men. M. de Montcalm wishing to profit by the circumstance of the passage at Point aux trembles of the troops he was sending to the rapids, to have the enemy attacked in their new camp, by M. de Bougainville's corps, gave orders to that Colonel to cross to the right of the river and to operate there whilst his posts, well guarded, would become a snare into which the enemy might fall if they did not expect him on the other side; nothing was better combined, but the bad weather deranged all, and the fear of delaying too long the relief which was being sent to the rapids, caused the project to be abandoned.

On the same day, four vessels of the enemy's fleet wished to profit by the N. E. wind that was blowing, to go up again above Quebec, but were becalmed opposite the town; they wheeled about and by aid of the ebb, which supervened, regained their anchorage, without having suffered much from the fire of our batteries.

13th We learned that the enemy's division, encamped opposite Point aux trembles, having spread through the country, burnt all the settlements there. M. de Montcalm apprehending from the movements the enemy were making thereabouts, that they were intending some other considerable enterprise, determined on reinforcing the detachment under the command of M. de Bougainville, which was increased to 1,600 men, and divided among the different posts. Some Canadians released by the English, brought M. de Vaudreuil a third Proclamation published by order of Mr. Wolf, in which after having referred to the two former, that General threatened with the severest reprisals those farmers who would not lay down their arms by the 20th of August.

A courier arrived from St. Paul's bay to inform us that the English, who had not before dared to land in that quarter, where they had encountered a good many musket shots every time they made their appearance had at length, some days ago, landed in consequence of the treachery of a Swiss farmer settled in that Parish, and had already burnt 22 houses.

On the same day, the Indians brought us in two prisoners from the South shore, and a new deserter came over.

15th We sent a detachment of about 1,200 men into the Parish of Ange Gardien, with a view to surprise the English there, who, 'twas said, were scattered about. No good came of that expedition. The Indians, following the example of the troops, who for some time occupied themselves solely with marauding and pillage, disbanded themselves, and advanced without precaution towards a house, which they supposed abandoned; 'twas full of Englishmen, whose fire they received, which put them to flight; nothing more was to be undertaken in that direction, and a retreat was necessary. Three prisoners were brought in from the South shore; they were taken by some Canadians, but seized by the Indians, who also brought us 4 scalps.

16th A new fire broke out in the Upper town; its progress was fortunately arrested; one house only was reduced to ashes. We were kept in the greatest state of anxiety by the difficulties experienced in the transportation of provisions, and the dread of seeing them every moment cut off by the enemy. The roads were already become very bad, and water carriage dared still be used as far as St. Augustin and Cap Rouge, only with such caution as rendered all the operations very tedious.

17th We learned by three new deserters from the enemy's army that a severe dysentery was prevailing there, which had already destroyed a great many people. 5 Canadians arrived from Niagara, who had escaped from the enemy after the surrender of that fort. These men report that the English were busy repairing the fortifications of the fort; that they had detached a large body of troops to conduct their prisoners to New-York, and that there were remaining at Chouaguen, when they passed there, only about 2,000 men, who were making no movement; from this circumstance, 'twas inferred that the English had no intention to come by the Rapids, where Chevalier de Levy then was with 2,500 men.

18th We received by land a fresh supply of flour, the stock of which the want of carts had caused to become very low.

19th We learned that a corps of the enemy of about 1,200 men had landed at Deschambeaux M. de Bougainville repaired immediately thither with his men preceded by the cavalry, and M. de Montcalm went in person with the Major-General and some troops as far as Point aux trembles (7 leagues), where, having learned that the enemy had reëmbarked, after having burnt the house in which the baggage of the army was stored, he returned to the camp, which he did not reënter until the following morning. The English did not lose a man in that expedition; they reëmbarked on perceiving the approach of our troops, carrying with them a great many cattle which they had collected together in the country.

I must say that no blame can attach to our troops if they were not able to charge the enemy when retreating; they endeavored to do so with much ardor; they used prodigious diligence to get there, but the English Commander, who expected to be attacked, had them closely watched by his ships, according to whose signals he regulated his movements. Two deserters came over to us from that detachment; a third arrived from Mr. Wolf's camp, who informed us that that General, being disposed to reëmbark in a short time, was sending parties in all directions to burn all the buildings and lay waste the country. He added, that some misunderstanding existed between the land and naval Commanders. We had already heard this, and it is since confirmed.

21st, 22nd, 23rd and 24th were remarkable only for the almost continual rains which, causing us the most lively apprehensions for the harvest, were rendering the transportation of our provisions extremely difficult. The enemy were burning in all directions; houses were seen on fire, simultaneously, at Côte de Beaupré, from the Falls of Montmorency to St. Anne, at the Island of Orleans and all along the right bank of the river.

25th The enemy was remarked diminishing his artillery at the Falls, and reëmbarking. Two vessels at Point aux trembles dropped down to St. Michel, whence, after landing some troops on the South shore, they returned to their former station. On the same day we learned that the Abenakis of St. Francis had stopped two English officers (Mess<sup>rs</sup> Hamilton<sup>1</sup> and Kennedy<sup>2</sup>) accompanied by 7 Indians whom M. Hamerst had despatched through the woods to Mr. Wolf. It appeared, from the letters that were found on them, that Mr. Amherst's operations were, henceforward, to depend on the success Mr. Wolf should meet with before

<sup>2</sup> Captain DAVID KENNEDY was commissioned, on 13th October, 1747, Captain in the 44th foot, which regiment made the unfortunate campaign under Braddock in 1755. He was engaged, also, in the unsuccessful attack on Ticonderoga in 1758, and in 1759 was attached to Gage's 80th Light Infantry. He had been despatched, by General Amherst, with a flag of truce to offer peace to the Indians of St. Francis, by whom he and his party were detained. Captain Kennedy retired from the army soon after. Mante, 228; Army Lists. — Ed.

Quebec. By letters written to different Colonels we learned, also, that singular astonishment prevailed in Mr. Amherst's army at the construction (éducation) of Carillon; the strength of the fortifications of that place were somewhat exaggerated, and many jokes were uttered at the precipitancy with which we had retired from it. As the enemy's ships, anchored above Quebec, greatly embarrassed the transportation of our provisions, the project was formed to have them carried off by our frigates. M. de Vaudreuil, to whom that proposal was submitted in a favorable point of view, approved of it, and nothing was thought of but its execution. Seamen will decide whether it were easy to carry, by boarding, in a river with a rapid current, well armed vessels, one of which had 50 guns, commanded by men who were daily making us admire the activity of their manœuvres; but a serious inconvenience was experienced at the outset, viz: To complete the crews of the frigates destined to operate, our batteries had to be stripped considerably of the sailors who were there acting as gunners.

26th Another deserter came to us from the camp at the Falls.

27th A second, a sergeant in the Royal American Regiment came in, who announced to us the approaching departure of the fleet, and assured us that Mr. Wolf would break up his camp at the Falls within 8 days. He added, that the Abbé de Portneuf, parish priest of St. Joachim,<sup>1</sup> having been taken by the Rangers, together with 9 farmers who were with him, had been massacred after laying down their arms, and that the scalps of these unfortunate men had been carried to the camp. This fact has since been verified by the report of a 10th farmer who was in that detachment and had escaped.

During the night of the 27 and 28th, five new frigates or transports of the enemy went above Quebec; they met from the bateaux of the place, but a feeble fire. These vessels by forming a junction with the former opposite St. Augustin, caused our project to abort, and the sailors were recalled.

In the course of the night of the 29th @ 30th, the tide being high, the vessels at St. Augustin cannonaded and fired briskly on a small deserted Island near their anchorage, where they had noticed, the day before, at low water, some people pass on foot to save hay, and who had retired on the return of the tide.

29th Three new deserters came in, who confirmed what the serjeant had told us. They also stated that Mr. Wolf, being attacked by a severe fever, had been confined to bed for the last six days.

30th The enemy unmasked a new gun battery at Point Levy; 21 pieces were then there.

31st Considerable movement occurred in the Point Levy camp; also in the fleet, which made us suppose that the enemy was preparing to send some vessels above Quebec; those already above, went up from St. Augustin to Point aux trembles, whence 'twas inferred that they designed attempting the passage of the Richelieu to go and attack our fleet: we had learned, 2 days previously, that a ship, no matter what her draft, could easily ascend that Rapid. This caused us the greater uneasiness, as one of the strongest of the contractors' frigates had the evening before, run ashore at Grondines. Our little naval force became, by that loss, reduced to the other three of his vessels and the two King's frigates, all which had orders to prepare to oppose the passage of the English.

On the night of the 31st of August and 1st September, five more of the enemy's ships went above Quebec. The movements the English were making near the Falls of Montmorency, left no longer any doubt that they were resolved to abandon that camp. A great quantity of material was observed to be put on board of boats on which our batteries fired, without any answer from those of the enemy, which were already dismantled.

The news we received this same day calmed somewhat the uneasiness we felt for Montreal. We learned on the one hand, by deserters from Mr. Amherst's army, that that General was disposed to confine the operations of this campaign to repairing Forts Carillon and St. Frederic, (the latter had been totally destroyed). And on the other hand, M. Bourlamaque assured that the advantageous post he had taken at Isle aux Noix, the intrenchments he had had thrown up and the formidable artillery he had mounted there, placed him in a position not to fear the enemy, however numerous they might present themselves. That island, 'tis known, is in the River Sorel which it divides into two very narrow arms. The channel was closed to barges by strong stockades (estacades) which 'twas expected the enemy would not attempt to turn by land. Both banks of the river presented only deep swamps covered with timber, a passage across which could not be effected except with extreme difficulty, and 'tis evident that in lengthening the circuit in order to seek more solid ground farther off, the labor would have to be very considerably increased together with the risks of being seriously annoyed.

2nd The news we received of the return to St. Michel and Sillery of the enemy's fleet which lay at Point aux trembles, dissipated the apprehension we felt that it would go up as far as Batiscan. The enemy continued to evacuate their camp at the Falls, whence two columns crossed in the evening to the Island of Orleans. Further movements in the fleet, which led to the belief that the enemy might intend to attack our intrenchments; what seemed to confirm this opinion was the discovery of six buoys anchored opposite Beauport, which we caused to be removed; a great many people thought 'twas only a feint. 'Twill be seen that they were not wrong.

3rd At 6 o'clock in the morning we noticed quite a movement in the camps and fleet of the enemy. One hundred barges or canoes full of men started from Point Levy in order to go and lie to in the centre of the fleet; 'twas remarked at the same time, that some fifty more of them were going through the same manœuvre near the Falls of Montmorency; there was no longer a doubt of the enemy wishing to effectuate the attack which the buoys of the preceding evening appeared to announce. The entire army was ordered under arms. The different corps formed in line of battle each at the head of its camp, and in this position waited for the fleet under cover of which the English were expected to effect their landing. The weather was fine although the wind was from the Northeast. They got off about 10 o'clock and the barges which had gone from Point Levy returned thither. 'Twas thought at first that the roughness of the river had alone obliged them to do so, but the barges of the Falls that had gone into the offing, having taken the same course, opened our eyes by recalling our attention to the camp at Ange Gardien which was completely evacuated. Then those who were heard secretly finding fault with M. de Montcalm because Chev<sup>r</sup> de Levy did not attack the English when they landed at the Falls of Montmorency, although the latter officer could plead the orders he had received not to hazard anything, treated him with the same rigor for not having fallen on their rear guard on the same ground and under circumstances infinitely more favorable. (I have already spoken elsewhere of that ground).

M. de Montcalm and his principal officers, to try to justify themselves for having lost so fine an opportunity, answered that if the enemy had not been attacked when reëmbarking, 'twas only because more than 2,000 men were perceived lying on their faces behind the intrenchments of their camp, at the moment they were thought to have crossed again over to the Island of Orleans, and there was danger of falling into some snare.

'Tis worthy of remark that people were busy in our camp persuading that there was nothing very [extra] ordinary in Mr. Wolf's manœuvres, and that M. de Montcalm, on the contrary, was comporting himself on that occasion as a consummate General. The reader can judge.

One part of the troops from the camp at Ange Gardien remained at the Island of Orleans, and the other went to take post above the batteries at Point Levy.

Engineers and several other officers who have since been to visit Mr. Wolf's camp, agreed unanimously that no position was more disadvantageous than that which that General had been obliged to take. 'Twas for that reason that he lined his camp with eleven redoubts, almost all intrenched, fraised and palisaded.

4th M. de Montcalm, regulating his movements by those of the enemy, stripped his left somewhat and removed the principal part of his forces to the right of his camp. He also sent the battalion of Guyenne to encamp on the heights of Quebec, whence it could repair, in case of need, equally either to Sillery or into the town, or towards the River St. Charles. Our misfortune willed, as is soon to be seen, that it should be withdrawn from that post two days afterwards. The Point Levy batteries, increased by the artillery which the enemy had removed from the camp at the Falls, were keeping up a continual fire on the town.

5th A corps of about three thousand English having marched towards the Etechemin river, M. de Montcalm reinforced M. de Bougainville by pickets from the army, almost all the Indians and the remainder of the volunteers. A frigate belonging to the enemy reascended to Cap Rouge, where it cannonaded one of our schooners which had arrived there the preceding evening from Montreal, with a cargo of flour; we had two gun-boats there which obliged it to sheer off.

The flour was the product of the grain that we had been able to procure within the government of Montreal for cash. Had it not been for this supply, provisions would have certainly failed the army, which would have to be mostly disbanded.

6th The enemy continued its movements above Quebec, which failed not to cause us uneasiness. One of their schooners passed in open day before the town, towing two long boats, which the fire from our batteries, not very brisk, 'tis true, was unable to check; those of the enemy profited by that moment to cannonade ours, in which we had five men killed or dangerously wounded.

7th The fleet which lay above Sillery, then consisting of 18 vessels, went up to Cap Rouge accompanied by some sixty barges full of troops, which after having made a show of wishing to land, regained the offing and went to land at the right of the river M. de Bougainville followed their movements.

The night of the 7th and 8th, four new little vessels passed above Quebec and joined the fleet anchored at Cap Rouge; they encountered a very hot fire from the batteries of the town without being incommoded thereby; 'twas thought in the camp that the enemy would attempt a landing about La Canardière, near the River St. Charles. The entire army, despite of very bad weather, spent the night in bivouac.

The European flour and that made from the purchased grain, as has been stated, being all consumed, the army was, since some days, no longer drawing its subsistence, except from the harvest of the Montreal government, which fortunately turned out extraordinarily fine, but hands were wanting to save it. M. de Rigaud had already detached two hundred Militia for that purpose. This help not being sufficient, M. de Vaudreuil directed Chevalier de Levy, who had returned from the Rapids to Isle aux Noix, to increase it. That general officer had quit the Rapids without, however, disgarrisoning them, on the assurance of his scouts who had returned from Chouaguen, that the enemy was quiet in that quarter. The rains continued to render the transportation of our provisions very difficult, and were exciting in us much apprehension for the crops of the governments of Quebec and Three Rivers, which, nevertheless, were not less beautiful than those of the government of Montreal.

9th The enemy, probably considering the houses of the town sufficiently damaged, directed the most of their fire against the suburbs of St. Roch.

10th The enemy appeared to build a new intrenchment above their Point Levy batteries; we did not understand what could be the real object of it. Their little fleet extended from Cap Rouge to Point aux trembles.

11th Throughout the day, on the road leading to the enemy's batteries, a considerable movement of gun carriages was perceptible, and the fleet, anchored above Quebec received all the troops scattered throughout that quarter.

12th The enemy kept up a very sharp fire the entire day on the town; the fleet, anchored from Cap Rouge as far as Point aux trembles, was continually in motion; towards night some vessels were detached from it, which came to an anchor at Sillerie. The movements we saw the enemy making since some time, above Quebec, and the knowledge we had of the character of Mr. Wolf, that impetuous, bold and intrepid warrior, prepared us for a last attack. Such a resolution was really fully adopted in the English army; after breaking up the camp at the Falls, a Council of War, as we have since learned from divers English officers, had been held, at which all the general officers voted unanimously in favor of raising the siege; the naval officers observed that the season, already far advanced, was rendering the navigation of the river every day more dangerous, and the officers of the line, disgusted at the tediousness of a campaign, as fruitless as it was difficult, considered it useless to remain any longer before intrenchments which appeared to them impregnable. Both added, moreover, that their army, always a prey to disease, was melting insensibly away. Then, Mr. Wolf, seeing that he could not gain anything by openly resisting the general opinion, adroitly took things by the other side. He declared to the members of the council that, so far from differing with them, he was, on the contrary, of their opinion in regard to the inutility of prolonging the siege of Quebec; that therefore, in the proposition he was about to submit to them, he wished to divest himself of the quality of General, in order to throw himself entirely on their friendship for him.

"Finally, Gentlemen," said he to them, "as the glory of our arms appears to me to require that we should not retire without making one final attempt, I earnestly demand of you to be pleased not to refuse your consent thereto; I feel that, in this instance, it is necessary our first step should place us at the gates of the town. With this view, I am about to try to get a detachment of only one hundred and fifty men to penetrate through the Sillerie woods, and the entire army will prepare to follow. Should this first detachment encounter any resistance on the part of the enemy, I pledge you my word of honor that then, regarding our reputation protected against all sort of reproach, I will no longer hesitate to reëmbark."

The zeal that animated so brave a general communicated itself to all the officers who heard him, and nothing was any longer thought of in his army but the arrangements necessary for the execution of so noble a plan.

M. de Montcalm, on his side, anxious for the quarter seemingly menaced by the enemy, and fearful, especially, that they intended cutting off our supplies, dispatched additional reinforcements to M. de Bougainville, who then found that he had under his orders, including Indians, about 300 men, scattered in different posts from Sillerie as far as Point aux trembles. 'Twas the élite of the army, in which were reunited all the grenadiers, all the pickets, all the volunteers of the army and the cavalry: the order to continue to follow, attentively, all the enemy's movements, was reiterated to him. His centre was at Cap Rouge.

Things were in this state, on both sides, when about midnight, between the 12th and 13th, Mr. Wolf after having, by different movements, endeavored to attract our attention on the Saint Augustin side, sent his barges to feel the post adjoining Sillerie. Fortune appeared in this emergency to combine with the little order which prevailed among our troops, so as to facilitate the approach of those barges.

A convoy of provisions was to come down that same night by water to Quebec; the rumor was circulated through all the posts in front of which it was to pass, without agreeing, among themselves on any rallying cry; but some unforeseen event having prevented our bateaux taking advantage of the night tide to sail, their departure was postponed to the following day, and no attention had yet been paid to warn those same posts of the fact. The consequence of this twofold neglect was, that when our sentries saw the enemy's barges advancing, they took them for ours, and satisfied with the word "France," which was returned to the challenge, allowed those barges to pass without giving themselves the trouble to reconnoitre them.

Three captains were in command at those posts:

Chevalier de Rumigny of the Regiment of La Sarre; *

M. Duglas, of Languedoc, and

M. de Verger, of the Colony.

The English took advantage of this security, landed between two of our posts, and clambering up the precipice they had to ascend, succeeded, by dint of toil, in gaining its crest, where they did not find a soul.

This combination of misfortune and disorder in our service, prepared the fatal catastrophe which, by a succession of new blunders, in making us lose the fruit of so much fatigue and expense, capped the climax of our humiliation.

So badly established was the communication between each of M. de Bougainville's posts and between the latter and M. de Montcalm's camp, that the English had turned and dispersed about five o'clock in the morning, the detachments which M. de Vergor commanded at l'ance du foulon, and were already in order of battle on the heights of Quebec where they even had some field pieces of small calibre, ere any one in our camps was as yet aware that the enemy wished to attack us in that quarter. M. de Bougainville, who was only two leagues off, did not learn the fact, as he says, until eight o'clock in the morning, and M. de Vaudreuil, who was at much less than half that distance, was not exactly informed of it until about half-past six. The army, which had passed the night in bivouac in consequence of a movement perceptible among the enemy's barges at Point Levy, had returned into its tents.

The generale was beat; all the troops resumed their arms and followed, in succession, M. de Montcalm, who repaired to the heights of Quebec where the battalion of Guyenne, which had two days before returned to our extreme right, was already in position between the town and the enemy whom its presence checked.

In consequence of the corps that had been detached from our army at Beauport, the latter found itself since some days reduced to about 6,000 men. The two Montreal battalions composed of about fifteen hundred men were left to guard the camp; they advanced, however, as far as the River St. Charles when M. de Vaudreuil repaired to the army. M. de Montcalm could, therefore, according to this calculation, muster only four thousand five hundred men.

'Twas with such a feeble force, without affording breathing time to the last detachments which had reached him from our left, and which had run nearly two leagues in one single race, that this General resolved, about ten o'clock in the morning, on attacking the enemy, (whose light infantry was since some time engaged with ours,) on a report he had received, which had not a shadow of a foundation, that the English were busy intrenching themselves.

The rash haste with which M. de Montcalm had made his attack originated in jealousy. M. de Vaudreuil had, in a note requesting him to postpone the attack until he had reunited all his forces, previously advised him that he was marching in person with the Montreal battalions. Nothing more was required to determine a General who would have readily been jealous of the part the simple soldier would have taken in his successes. His ambition was that no person but himself should ever be named, and this turn of mind contributed not a little to make him thwart the different enterprises in which he could not appear.

The two armies, separated by a rise of ground, were cannonading one another for about an hour, (our artillery consisted only of three small field pieces).

The eminence on which our army was ranged in the order of battle commanded, at some points, that occupied by the English where they were defended either by shallow ravines or by the rail fences of the fields; our troops, composed almost entirely of Canadians impetuously rushed on the enemy, but their ill-formed ranks soon broke either in consequence of the precipitancy with which they had been made to march, or by the inequality of the ground. The English received our first fire in good order, without giving way. They afterwards very briskly returned our fire, and the advance movement made from their centre by a detachment of about 200 men with fixed bayonets, sufficed to put to flight almost the whole of our army. The rout was total only among the Regulars; the Canadians accustomed to fall back Indian fashion (and like the ancient Parthians) and to turn afterwards on the enemy with more confidence than before, rallied in some places, and under cover of the brushwood, by which they were surrounded, forced divers corps to give way, but at last were obliged to yield to the superiority of numbers. The Indians took scarcely any part in this affair. They kept themselves, for the most part at a distance, until the success of the battle should decide what part they should take. 'Tis well known that they never face the enemy in open field.

These particulars, with the aid of a map, will enable the reader to appreciate the blunders committed by M. de Montcalm on this day. The following are the principal ones with which impartial judges unanimously reproach him:

1st He ought, on learning that the enemy had landed, dispatched orders to M. Bougainville, who had, as already stated, the élite of the troops of the army; by combining his movements with those of that Colonel, it had been easy for him to make it quasi impossible for the enemy to avoid finding himself between two fires.

2nd The fate of Quebec depending on the success of the battle about to be fought, he ought to bring all his forces together. 'Twas useless, therefore, to leave a corps of 1,500 men at our camp, the more especially as being intrenched only on the side of the river, and commanded by ground in the rear covered with timber, it would never become a tenable post for the enemy; besides the batteries which lined it were manned by gunners.

3<sup>d</sup> For the same reason, as the army was only 200 toises from the glaciis of the town, he ought to draw off the pickets on duty there; this would have been an addition of 7 @ 800 men. He could in like manner, have ordered up the artillery; there was no lack of field pieces.

4th His army being, in great part, composed only of Canadians, who 'tis known, are not adapted for fighting in a pitched battle, instead of losing the advantage of the post by going to attack an enemy too well arranged, he ought to wait and profit by the nature of the ground to place those Canadians by platoons in the clumps of brush wood by which he was surrounded; arranged in that way, they certainly excel all the troops of the universe by the precision with which they fire.

5th Being determined on attacking, he ought at least, have altered his arrangements. I have already stated in the commencement of this Extract, that the Militia had been incorporated among the Regulars: Could any harmony be expected in the movements of a body, the different parts of which must of necessity, by their constitution, mutually embarrass each other.

6th Finally, he did not dream of forming a corps de reserve.

As for M. de Bougainville, he has been blamed for having made it impossible for him to concentrate his troops promptly, by spreading them too much, and for not attending more particularly to Quebec than to any other parts; at noon he was scarcely in the presence of the enemy with half his men. Yet, in these last moments of the fine season, guarding in preference the points included between the River St. Charles and that of Cap Rouge, ought to be regarded as essential; the one and the other, and particularly the latter, forming for the town barriers which the enemy could never pass, except by employing a great deal of time in the work.

But if the errors committed by M. de Montcalm have been fatal to our arms, I will say that these appear to me to have been dishonored by the conduct observed by those who succeeded him in the command.

After the battle, the army mustered in the Horn-work which had been constructed at the head of the bridge thrown over the River St. Charles. Divers officers of the Regular troops hesitated not to say openly, in presence of the soldier, that no other course remained for us than to capitulate promptly for the entire Colony.

All the troops were ordered to go back each to its own camp, and M. de Vaudreuil summoned to a Council of War all the commanders of corps; 'twas there that these gentlemen, exaggerating somewhat the loss we had just suffered, all voted unanimously that the army should retreat to Jacques Cartier (9 leagues). 'Twas decided that advantage should be taken of the darkness of the following night to carry that resolution into effect, and that the troops should leave the tents standing in order to deceive the enemy, who, nevertheless, had killed, taken or wounded only 7 @ 800 of our men, and it has just been shown that by concentrating M. de Bougainville's corps, the Montreal battalions and the garrison of the town, we should still have remaining about nearly 5 thousand fresh troops, whom we might regard as the élite of the army. M. Bigot was again the only one in the council who voted that we should make a second attack with our entire force. M. de Vaudreuil had indeed been of his opinion, but the plurality of votes carried it.

'Tis to be observed that M. de Bougainville found himself, by his rank, in command of the army under M. de Vaudreuil; the good fortune of this young Colonel and his talents even, had excited jealousies against him.

M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm who had, after receiving his wound, returned to Quebec, was applied to for his opinion. That General merely answered that there were three plans to pursue: the first, to make a second attack on the enemy; the second, to retire to Jacques Cartier, and the third, to capitulate for the Colony.

I shall not make any comments on the fright which was manifested lest we should be attacked on the retreat. After our defeat, I admit that we could not, for various reasons, preserve our camp at Beauport, but I will say, that it never appeared to me probable that the enemy would run the risk of crossing rivers and traversing woods for the purpose of coming to disturb us, whilst, by abandoning the country to them, we should allow them quietly to take Quebec, the object of their wishes.

Neither do I ever admit the necessity of the retreat to Jacques Cartier. By renouncing a second general battle, opportunities might still be made good use of, in harassing the enemy during the siege of Quebec; that would be the more easily done, as we should, by proceeding to St. Foy, always have found an assured retreat in the woods in our rear, and, as for subsistence, 'twould reach us there with still less difficulty than at Beauport, since the reverse we had just suffered did not augment the obstacles our transports experienced, and, on the other hand, we approached nearer our stores. Besides, we would thereby be in a position to throw all sorts of supplies at every moment into the town, which the enemy, daring not to spread himself too much abroad, never invested; 'twas not, indeed, until he became certain of our retreat, that he sent, three days afterwards, some detachments to our camp at Beauport; hence, 'tis plain that we might have plenty of time to remove our baggage, and over 8 days' provisions for the entire army, which we left there.

14th The army having marched all night, halted in the vicinity of St. Augustin. M. de Montcalm died at 4 o'clock in the morning.

15th The van-guard of the army arrived about noon at Jacques Cartier. There we received news from Quebec, by which we learned that General Wolf had been killed in the beginning of the engagement; that General Moncton, his second, had been dangerously wounded, and that the command of the army had devolved on M. Toushend, whose manners were already greatly praised. He had sent a guard of fifteen men to the General Hospital, which continued to be managed as usual.

16th We learned that the enemy continued intrenching themselves before Quebec, whence M. de Ramezay sent word that he had only 6 days' provisions; he notified M. de Vaudreuil, at the same time, that he should soon see himself under the necessity of capitulating, should he not receive prompt supplies. Efforts were made to send him some the following night, by land and water, but the bad weather interposed obstacles to our transports.

17th Chev<sup>r</sup> de Levy, to whom M. de Vaudreuil had dispatched a courier retiring from Beauport, arrived at the army; 'twas immediately resolved to march towards Quebec, and M. de Vaudreuil notified M. Ramezay thereof, whom he exhorted to hold out to the last extremity; he announced to him, at the same time, the departure of supplies of provisions.

18th The army went to sleep at Point aux trembles; M. de Vaudreuil received there a courier dispatched to him by M. de Ramezay, to inform him that, fearful of a want of provisions, he had sent Adjutant Joannes, of the regiment of Languedoc, to propose to the English General the articles of capitulation drawn up before the opening of the campaign, by the late Marquis de Montcalm, but held out the hope, at the same time, that he would break off the negotiation, should the supply of provisions arrive before its conclusion.

19th The army went to sleep at St. Augustin, where we found Captain Daubrespie, of the regiment of Bearn, who delivered to M. de Vaudreuil the capitulation accepted by M. de Ramezay. This King's Lieutenant had duly received the supplies of provisions before M. de Joannes' return, but things appeared to him too far advanced to allow him to withdraw. It must be acknowledged that there existed very little good will on the part of any of his garrison, which was exceedingly weak in proportion to the enceinte of the place; to this 'twill be objected, that he had been advised beforehand that the army was marching to his relief.

As the surrender of Quebec did not permit us to undertake anything more thereabouts, the army returned to Jacques Cartier, where 'twas decided to build a fort capable of containing 500 men, to be stationed there during the winter.

According to intelligence received daily from Quebec, the enemy were employed most actively both in strengthening the defences of the place and in forming magazines for the subsistence of the garrison which was to winter there.

The objections of the English to receive the money of the country, subjected the people who remained there to a very great scarcity, which extended even to the General Hospital, and assistance was finally obtained for it only after having given the English Generals to understand that, rendering themselves, by the capture of the town, masters of the hospitals, which were dependent on it, they were naturally bound to provide for their support. In other respects, the deplorable state to which the rest of the houses of the town had been reduced by shot and shell, rendered accommodations there very scarce. English and French, all experienced the same inconvenience, but the greatest share of it necessarily fell on the latter; people found themselves pell-mell in the houses where this disorder has occasioned considerable pillage.

Towards the fore part of October a detachment of about 200 men of Mr. Amherst's army, headed by Captain Rogers, having had the boldness to traverse a pretty extensive tract of country, covered with timber, succeeded, under cover of the surprise, in burning the Indian village of St. Francis; M. de Bourlamaque was fully advised of his march; he had caused the removal of the canoes which Rogers had been obliged to abandon beyond Isle aux Noix, and expecting him to return by the same route, had him watched, at the passage, by a strong detachment of Canadians and Indians; but Rogers had anticipated all that, and had, in consequence, resolved to reach Orange by another way; he could not, however, escape the pursuit of a party of 200 Indians who rushed to vengeance. Want of provisions rendered it necessary for him to divide his force in small platoons, in order more easily to find subsistence; the Indians massacred some forty and carried off 10 prisoners to their village, where some of them fell a victim to the fury of the Indian women, notwithstanding the efforts the Canadians could make to save them.

A few days after, we had a very serious alarm in the vicinity of Isle aux Noix. M. de Bourlamaque had dispatched the small fleet we kept on Lake Champlain, towards St. Frederic, to observe the enemy's movements; he was not aware, however, that the one which the enemy had constructed on their side, was very superior to his; what was to happen, happened: whilst Sieur Dolabarats, a man no longer to be employed in any command, who had charge of our Xebecs and other small vessels, was riding at anchor in one of the lake harbors, the English frigates got ready to come in quest of him, but it happened that, having passed him in the night, they found themselves in the morning 5 leagues at this side; whereupon Sieur Dolabarats seeing his retreat in some wise cut off, thought it his duty to call a council, (he had with him a detachment of land troops) which decided that nothing remained for him to do but to sink the vessels and return to Montreal by land. This was accordingly done.

We learn, on closing these despatches, that the English have already raised one of them.

This adventure, the sight of the English vessels and of some barges which approached Isle aux Noix, caused M. Bourlamaque to suppose that the enemy's army was advancing to attack him. The alarm was great; the farmers, on all sides, who had returned from the army, were assembled; these poor people, fatigued by the campaign which they had just made and being desirous to give the remainder of the late season to their domestic avocations, marched only with reluctance; our uneasiness unfortunately ceased before all those Militiamen had come in.

Such has been the result of events which, if they have not caused to France the entire loss of a Colony, the preservation whereof costs it so dear, have at least reduced it to the point of no longer being able to find safety except in an early peace, unless it receive in time immense reinforcements from Europe. Those who will peruse these details only superficially, will not fail to place our calamities among the number of those which are attributable only to fortune. Such will not be the case with those, who, animated by an enlightened zeal for the good of the State, will not neglect to probe them, in order to discover their true causes; and as, in making these extracts, my sole object has been to respond on my part to the patriotic views of the latter, and to the confidence they repose in me, in dragging from obscurity facts which it may interest them to know, I shall endeavor, avoiding prolixity however, as much as will be in my power, to make them appreciate their causes.

Instead of seeking them in a fatality which superstition always perceives in whatever calamities overtake men, I think I can, without incurring any risk, flatter myself with finding them in the passions to which we have had the misfortune to be too subject, or rather, in the disorders which are necessarily their consequences.

When the King ordered Regular troops to America, he considered them only in the light of the services they might render there, and it may be said, that his Majesty, instead of exacting such services as a Master, appeared unwilling to look for them except from the gratitude which his favors ought to excite, but these same favors, wherewith the Regular troops were loaded on their arrival in Canada, contributed not a little to disgust those whose lot it was to serve there perpetually, and on whom it cannot be denied, notwithstanding the laxity of their discipline, that more dependence ought to be placed, than on the former. Every country has its own mode of waging war, and that which must be followed in Canada, has, 'tis known, but little in common with the method practised in Europe.

From this sort of jealousy a misunderstanding soon sprung up between the different corps, for which the division of authority in the command, prepared the way to reascend from grade to grade even to the chiefs, where it produced those ravages, the consequences whereof were to be so fatal.

M. de Montcalm felt it and was the first to allow its fits to be perceptible; full of talent, but ambitious beyond measure; more brilliant in consequence of the advantages of a cultivated memory, than profound in the sciences appertaining to the art of war, the first elements of which he did not possess, that General was ill adapted to the command of armies; he was, besides, subject to transports of passion which had produced a coolness towards him even among those whom he had obliged, and who, by circumstances, ought to have the same interests as he. I will add, that though brave, he was in nowise enterprising; he would, for example, never have attacked Chouaguen, had he not been, as it were, forced thereto by the reproaches of the sort of timidity he exhibited, made by M. de Rigaud, a man, it is true, of limited mind, but full of bravery and boldness, and accustomed to range the woods; and he would have abandoned the siege of Fort George, at the very moment he undertook it, had he not been reassured by the firmness of Chevalier de Levis. To this mediocrity, in the talents necessary to a military man of his rank, he united a very grave defect in a General; that is, indiscretion. More occupied in the care of giving brilliancy to his eloquence than with the duties his position exacted, he could not prevent himself making his plans public long before they were to be put in execution; and that he had a grudge against any one, was sufficient to make him unceasingly mangle the reputation of such a person in unseemly terms, even in the presence of his domestics, and consequently of the troops. 'Tis by such remarks as these, which at bottom he did not intentionally circulate, that he made M. de Vaudreuil lose the confidence of the soldier, the farmer and even the Indian, to whom that governor would certainly have been dear, had those people been able to penetrate his sentiments in their regard. Good sense, no science (lumières), too facile, a confidence in events which renders circumspection often slow, nobleness and generosity of sentiment, great affability, such are the principal traits that have appeared to me to characterize the Marquis de Vaudreuil; whose goodness carried to excess would, in Europe, certainly have been subject to an infinitude of inconveniences; in Canada, the opposite vice would have assuredly precipitated the ruin of the Colony. Without having lived there, no exact idea can be formed of the patience with which one must be particularly endued in order to support the importunities of the Indians, to which a governor is continually exposed, especially in time of war. Equally ignorant of the maxims of civil or military government, M. de Vaudreuil could, on the other hand, not comprehend how inconvenient it was to push too far the indulgence with which it was proper, notwithstanding, to treat with measure the Militia. That produced two effects equally disastrous: The Canadians, from whose valor, address and docility, properly modified, everything might be expected, fell insensibly into remissness, and M. de Montcalm on his side was sufficiently ignorant of the world (assez peu citoyen) to draw therefrom a sort of right to suffer his regular troops to lose all sort of discipline; the soldier ceased to acknowledge the officer, who, himself, became insubordinate; disorders of every description ensued; there existed no longer, either regularity or exactness in the service; nothing equalled the devastation committed by the troops throughout the rural districts where the army was encamped; complaints thereof were made; the General answered, that everything belonged to the soldier, who informed of these dispositions, roved throughout the settlements, two or three leagues round about. 'Twas on this occasion that a woman, on a day of alarm, reproaching M. de Montcalm the profligacy with which he allowed his soldiers to pillage cattle, fowls, gardens, tobacco plantations and even wheat, told him at M. de Vaudreuil's quarters in presence of twenty officers, that he would have 500 soldiers less to oppose the efforts of the enemy, whose attack was expected every moment, if he did not hasten to send and have the générale beat at Charlesbourg (about 2 leagues in the interior) where they were busy pillaging even the interior of the houses.

The officers of the Regular troops, in justification of the disorders which the soldiers were committing, made answer to whatever complaints were made them: that the soldiers were dying of hunger. The ration consisted of one pound of very fine bread and one pound of meat.

From the conduct of these two Generals I must pass to that of the Intendant, whose duty it was to concur with them in the arrangements relative to the general operations.

I shall not enter here into an examination of the reproaches cast on M. Bigot by the public; I shall merely say that the advantages, immense indeed, which accrued to him from the funds he had risked in trade, whilst creating for him a great deal of envy, have exposed his reputation to the shafts of the blackest calumny. The resources of a fortunate trade are known in all countries of the world. The most signal good fortune has always constantly accompanied the transactions on this Intendant's account. Starting from these two facts, which, I believe no one can dispute, we shall easily divest ourselves of any astonishment created by his wealth, however extraordinary that may be, when we consider that, owing to the prodigious variation prices of provisions and all sorts of merchandise have experienced in Canada (which is pretty usual in all the Colonies), it has happened that the man who has realized, two years ago, two thousand écus only, may to-day find himself worth 400 thousand francs.

The keg (velie) of brandy which costs, in France, 50<sup>li</sup>, now sells here for as much as 110<sup>li</sup>, &c., &c., &c. I will add, that he certainly would not have called forth so many remarks, had his generosity not made a great number of ingrates. 'Tis not that I pretend to approve of an Intendant becoming merchant; I am even of opinion, notwithstanding the custom of preceding Ministers tolerating it pretty openly, that infinite inconveniences always will accrue therefrom; but also, when prohibiting it, the King must allow a man of that rank a salary that would enable him to live decently, &c. This twofold observation must naturally apply, mutatis mutandis, to officers of every grade from whom, private interest, 'tis known, does not now, unfortunately, any longer permit the State to expect any distinguished services.

Neither can I speak, but in very vague terms, of M. Bigot's administration. All the world knows that he has a cunning mind, but no one is ignorant that, to understand exactly the amount of good and the evil an official of that character is capable of doing, one must be a long time in a position to follow the course of his operations, to be able to observe their results. I shall remark, generally, that were he a Colbert, he could not prevent certain abuses arising from the constitution of the service of this Colony. Is it not, for example, grossly irregular for the Comptroller to find himself, from time immemorial, charged with several details of which he is the innate censor? In the infancy of the Colony that might be compatible with the exactitude the service requires, because the Intendant could see to everything; but, for several years that the expenses have become so considerable, is it likely that the man of the most scrupulous probity, the most enlightened and, altogether, the most laborious, could have the capacity to satisfy so many different objects, when his position required from him only the maintenance of regularity, a duty which demands certainly a man's exclusive attention?

He who now fills that office, a man above reproach, has been obliged to admit this to me; he has even of his own accord, made me perceive many consequences of it.

But I will admit, that had the King had at the head of each of these details intelligent persons, who might be induced by a liberal salary to take the good of his service to heart, it would not have been the less impossible for them to satisfy the views of their zeal in consequence of the turn things have taken; I explain.

When the King by his ordinances, has vested a certain authority in the officers to whom the economical department of his government is confided, he has wisely foreseen that such authority was necessary to persons who were to serve as a dam against the pretensions, often unjust, of the military.

Such, I believe, is the system of the Monarchical government.

The laws pronounce penalties on those who will have impeded the humblest constable in the duties of his office; the King's service it seems to me, ought to be the same everywhere; uniformity in all its parts constitutes its solidity.

But in consequence of a deplorable confusion, it has happened that, instead of maintaining these same persons in a respect commensurate with the object of their functions, and which, perhaps, it would have been of advantage further to increase under certain conditions, all the rules both of the service and of decency, have been permitted even in France, to be violated with impunity, in their regard; they have not been able to avoid falling into a contempt, if I dare make use of that expression, which has reduced them to the necessity of becoming lax, on occasions when it would have been important that they should dare exhibit firmness; but if disorder so deplorable has been seen to prevail in France, under the eyes of the Court, could it be expected that 'twould not reach even to the Colonies, and especially this one, where the long duration of wars and the constitution of things have not only carried the Military to the top-rung of despotism, but moreover where the Intendant's credit has been entirely ruined by the annoyances with which he has been of late publicly overwhelmed? This disorder has, without doubt, penetrated far into it, to produce its most direful effects therein; hence have, necessarily, followed the enormous expenditure occasioned, on the one hand, by the facility afforded detached officers to realize, whilst appearing to turn up a little land, &c., fortunes as considerable as they were rapid, and on the other, by the fraudulent consumptions of all sorts, and particularly of provisions, whereunto that Intendant has been no longer permitted to attempt merely to place a check; he has proofs of the extravagancies M. de Montcalm has been guilty of towards him this year; that General forgot on those occasions, what was due by him to the service and to that Intendant, and what he owed to himself, and as those pieces related only to unimportant and even contemptible matters, they can serve to explain all the extent of the unjust passion which tormented Mr. de Montcalm.

'Twould be superfluous for me to make any new reflections on what must necessarily result from a government so convulsive. Notwithstanding the precipitancy with which I have been obliged to sketch this picture, I have endeavored to place things in a sufficiently clear order, so that in approximating them to all that has been said and written, during the past, on these subjects, the persons to whom I take the liberty to address them, may be able to pronounce their judgment.

General Wolfe's Proclamations to the Canadians.

By his Excellency, James Wolfe, Esq., Colonel of a Regiment of Infantry, Major-General and Commander-in-Chief of his Britannic Majesty's Forces in the River St. Lawrence, &c., &c.

The King, my master, justly irritated against France and resolved to lower her insolence and to revenge the insults offered to the English Colonies, has at length determined to send to Canada the formidable sea and land armament, which the people of Canada now behold in the heart of their country. Its object is totally to deprive the French Crown of its most valuable settlement in North America. For these purposes, he has been pleased to send me here, at the head of the formidable army under my command. The King of Great Britain wages no war against industrious Colonists and peasants, nor against women and children, nor the sacred ministers of religion; he foresees their distressful circumstances, pities their lot and extends to them offers of protection. The people may return with their families to their lands; I promise them my protection; I assure them that they can, without fearing the least molestation, there enjoy their property, attend to their religious worship; in a word, enjoy, in the midst of war, all the sweets of peace, provided they will take no part directly or indirectly in the contest between the two Crowns. But if, on the contrary, a vain obstinacy and misguided valor lead them to appear in arms, they must expect to suffer all the cruelty that war inflicts. Therefore, 'tis for them to imagine to what excesses the fury of an exasperated soldiery can lead; my orders aloue can stay their course. 'Tis for the Canadians, by their conduct, to procure for themselves this advantage. They cannot be ignorant of their present situation. A formidable fleet stops the passage of any succors they might expect from Europe; a numerous army presses on them on the side of the Continent; the choice they have to take does not appear doubtful; what can they expect from a vain and blind opposition? Let themselves judge.

The unparalleled barbarities perpetrated by the French against our settlements in America, might justify the severest reprisals. But Britons disdain this barbarous method; their religion preaches humanity, and their hearts follow with pleasure its precepts. Should the Canadians be led, by the foolish hope of a successful resistance, to refuse the neutrality I propose to them, and presumptuously appear with arms in their hands, they will only have themselves to blame, when they will groan under the weight of misery to which they will be exposed by this, their own choice. 'Twill be too late to regret the useless efforts of their indiscreet valor, when they behold all they hold most dear, perishing of hunger in the winter. As for me, I shall have nothing to reproach myself with. The laws of war are known; the obstinacy of an enemy justifies the means used to bring him to reason.

The people of Canada may choose: they behold, on the one hand, Britain stretching out to them a powerful and protecting hand; her fidelity to her engagements is known; she is ready to maintain the inhabitants in their rights and possessions: France on the other hand, unable to support these people, deserts their cause at this important crisis, and if during the war she has sent them troops, what have they been good for? only to make the people feel more bitterly the weight of a hand which oppresses, instead of protecting them.

Let the Canadians consult their prudence; their fate depends on their choice.

JAM. WOLF.

Given at our Head Quarters, in the Parish of St. Laurence, on the Island of Orleans, 27th June, 1759.<sup>1</sup>

By his Ex. . . Wolf.

His Excellency, indignant at the little regard paid by the inhabitants of Canada to his proclamation of the 29th of last month, is determined no longer to listen to the sentiments of humanity which prompted him to solace people blind to their own interests.

The Canadians have, by their conduct, proved themselves unworthy the advantageous offers he held out to them. Wherefore he has issued orders to the Commanders of his Light Infantry and other officers, to proceed into the country and to seize and bring in the farmers and their cattle, and to destroy and lay waste what they shall judge proper. As for the rest, as it is disagreeable to have recourse to the barbarous extremities whereof the Canadians and Indians, their allies, have given the example, he proposes to postpone until the 10th of August next, the decision on the fate of the prisoners on whom he will use reprisals unless the Canadians, in the meantime come and submit to the terms of the first proclamation, and thereby excite his clemency and induce him to mildness.

M. Bigot to M. Berryer.

Montreal, 10th October, 1759.

My Lord.

I answer the letter you have done me the honor to write me on the 26th January last.

I perceive with pleasure that you are disposed to establish a corps of clerks in the Colony; 'tis the means to render the service certain and to form useful subjects. Your predecessors, my Lord, did not think like you, and whatever pains I took in favor of several clerks, 'tis with difficulty I have obtained the commissioning a small number of them. These reiterated refusals have disgusted the greater portion; and Suggestions respecting the officers to be established in the Colony.

and although certain offices be tolerably well provided, 'tis impossible for me to accomplish all the details as I wished. The most part of those clerks remain in the service only whilst waiting situations from merchants, where, indeed, they have considerable advantages; I can not retain them by authority, as they are not commissioned. A man who knows how to write tolerably, finds no difficulty in obtaining a situation of from 3 @ 400<sup>li</sup> a year, and he requires that to support himself in existing circumstances. My hands are tied as regards pecuniary compensation and still more so as to extras, and it is not natural to suppose that a good man will attach himself to the service if he cannot hope for some eventual advantage.

It would be highly necessary that there should be in the Colony a certain number of commissioned servants; they would be all properly employed; the Intendant would be master of that; and he would not be exposed to witness the offices as it were, stripped from day to day.

'Twould be proper for example, that there should be two chief clerks attached to the stores at Quebec and Montreal. Although I have no reason to doubt the honesty of the storekeepers, it would be well that the issues should pass under their eyes; the receipts of merchandise, as regards the qualities, would perhaps be accompanied with more exactitude, besides, 'tis not possible in these operations, for one storekeeper to be able alone to attend to, and carefully examine the receipts and issues.

A third chief clerk would be required also at Detroit, especially should the Court, at the peace, desire to send new settlers thither. The land there is very good; those located there in 1750 and 1751 are selling wheat for 5 years past, and are no longer a public burthen since that time.

A Commissary of the Marine would, likewise, be highly necessary at Quebec, to take charge of the General Military office, if it be desirable to preserve regularity in that department; 'tis in frightful disorder: the Major-General's office would not be sufficient, for the same inconvenience would arise in another way, if he alone had the detail of the troops and was the person to refer to. This commissary would besides visit annually, after the review of the month of May, all the posts; examine the issues there, the storekeepers' accounts, and would himself check the contractors' accounts of articles furnished on the requisitions of the commanding officers. I am persuaded the King would gain considerably thereby. I have sent last summer, a clerk expressly to check these returns; he could do it only at Fort Niagara and at the posts lower down, because the fort was attacked. Umbrage was taken at it, and notwithstanding the orders with which he was provided, he experienced some annoyance on the part of the Commandants. I think that the person destined for such duty should be a Commissary, in order to make a greater impression, and that you ought to write to the Marquis de Vaudreuil to issue strict commands so that such officer may be able to execute his orders without opposition. Otherwise I shall never be able to root out frauds, for I am too well convinced that such exist in the rations and other expenditures at the forts. This Commissary would also make out the review of the troops there; soldiers, though dead, often pass in those places for being alive.

But, in order thoroughly to regulate the detail of the forts and posts, 'twould be necessary that the Intendant and Commissary of Montreal should themselves visit them in 1761, in order to be well acquainted with them and able not to sign the expenses blind; and the Military Commissary would not commence his visit until 1762.

Annexed is a list of the persons attached to the service, which will enable you to understand their detail. I have noted, in the margin, those who deserve promotion.

You do me the honor, my Lord, to inform me that I shall see, by another despatch, the arrangements you have adopted for the place of Ordonnateur<sup>1</sup> at Montreal, I have not received any in which you mention them.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), BIGOT.

Messrs. de Vaudreuil and Bigot to M. Berryer.

Montreal, 22nd 8<sup>ber</sup>, 1759.

My Lord,

Superiority of the English pilots over ours, in knowledge of the River St.
Lawrence.

We have received the letter you have done us the honor to write us on the 9th of February respecting Sieur Pellegrin, Captain en second of the port of Quebec; he has gone to France, being included in the capitulation of Quebec; 'tis, in fact, impossible for him to support himself on the salary of a thousand livres that he receives. He will be able, my Lord, to have the honor to submit his remonstrances to you, and we await your orders as to what you will be pleased to procure for him, should he return to Canada.

The manœuvres of the English during their sojourn before Quebec, made us clearly perceive that the pilots, maintained in Canada for a long time past, did not possess a perfect knowledge of the river; the enemy passed 60 gun-ships, where we hardly dared risk a vessel of 100 tons.

The North Traverse was, according to seamen who piqued themselves on their experience, astonishingly difficult—full of dangers; every year, on the approach of the King's ships, the towers which were expressly erected on the Island of Orleans, had to be whitewashed anew; the new growth of trees in the opening, made in the Ile aux réaux, had to be cut down, in order to facilitate the traverse; every precaution was taken for a frigate of 30 guns as for one of 60; so that, as the first intelligence of the arrival of the enemy in the river, M. Bigot immediately sent to throw down the towers and fell the trees on Ile aux réaux, so as to derange the opening in such a manner as not to leave any mark that might facilitate that traverse; notwithstanding all these precautions, the English, without any accident by night as well as by day, passed through it their ships of 70 and 80 guns, and even many together by wearing. They did the same at the Pilgrims, which had the reputation of being a very dangerous passage.

We have the honor to be with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. Bigot to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, October 25th, 1759.

My Lord,

You will have been informed, ere you receive this, of the loss we have experienced at Quebec at a moment when we were accounting ourselves safe. The Marquis de Vaudreuil and the Marquis de Montcalm had adopted, at the opening of the campaign, all possible measures to render the enemy's projects against that place abortive, and they ought to have flattered themselves with success, our army being stronger than that of the English. We had 13 thousand men and a thousand to 1,200 Indians, exclusive of a garrison of two thousand in the town; besides, our army was intrenched from the mouth of the River St. Charles to the Falls of the Montmorency. You will, doubtless, receive, my Lord, the plan of our encampment.

Pursuant to the decision of the Council of War, I caused to be constructed, with extraordinary diligence, 6 boats carrying one 24-pounder; 12 flat bateaux, having, one 8, and a floating battery of 12 twenty-fours, 18's and 12's to defend the landing.

The English, having landed on the 30th of June at Point Levy, erected batteries for mortars and 32-pounders on the other side of the river opposite Quebec. These, joined to the carcasses and fire-pots which they threw in, have demolished and set fire to three-fourths of the houses in the town.

On the 17th of July they sent eight ships above Quebec, during the night, with a landing party of 1,000 men. They attempted a descent 8, 10 and 14 leagues above the town, but were everywhere repulsed. M. de Bougainville had been sent thither with a strong force.

Mr. Wolf, who had landed with three thousand men in the beginning of July, on the other side of the Falls of Montmorency, attacked, on the 31st of that month, with the remainder of his army, the intrenchments which lined the Falls on our side and which Chevalier de Levis commanded; the enemy were quickly repulsed. Some days after, the English General abandoned his position at the Falls, which, for more than a month, had greatly incommoded Chevalier de Levis' camp.

In the beginning of September, the enemy again sent above Quebec, 12 vessels to join those already there; this made 20, and defiled along the South shore 3 thousand men who embarked above. M. de Bougainville's detachment was then reinforced, and he was ordered to follow the movements of those ships. They were usually anchored at Cap Rouge, 3 leagues above Quebec. M. de Bourgainville was encamped there, with a very strong portion of his men. That officer followed the ships, according as they moved up or down.

At length, during the night of the 12th and 13th, the enemy embarked in barges alongside their ships and passed in front of the posts we had between M. de Bougainville and the tow; four different sentinels contented themselves with calling out, Qui vive? They answered, France! They were allowed to pass unrecognized.

The officers who were in command of those posts, did so under the persuasion that they were flat bateaux loaded with our provisions, which the Commandant of the place had ordered that very night to be allowed to pass, and which did not come; they were to leave Cap Rouge. The English being arrived in front of a steep hill, three quarters of a league from the town, and which they, no doubt, discovered, was unguarded, ascended it, and attacked one of our rear posts that guarded a slope leading to the water's edge. The officer of that post received several wounds, but was taken prisoner with his detachment. The enemy, thereupon, cleared the slope (rampe) and landed their army which was waiting in the barges the succes of their van-guard. The ships were dropping down, meanwhile, to support their barges. M. de Bougainville did not follow them, expecting they would return on the flow of the tide, as they usually did.

At day-break, we were informed at the camp that some of our posts, above Quebec, had been attacked. The Marquis de Montcalm, who did not look on the matter as so serious, sent at first only a few pickets to their assistance, ordering a large portion of our army to follow him; this had diminished, in efficiency and numbers, three thousand men or thereabouts, who were under the command of M. de Bougainville. They were all picked men, being composed of the grenadiers and volunteers of the army, both troops and Canadians.

The Marquis de Montcalm was much surprised, when he had ascended the height in the rear of the city, to see the English army, which was forming on the plain. He gave orders to hasten the march of the body which was coming to join him, and scarcely had it reached the ground on which he stood, when he marched against the enemy and commenced the attack. These different corps, among which were the battalions of La Sarre, Royal Roussillon, Languedoc Guienne and Bearn, amounted only to 3,500 men, or thereabouts. Some of them came a league and a half; they had not time to recover their breath. This little army fired two volleys at that of the English, which amounted, in like manner, to only 3 @ 4 thousand men, but ours, unfortunately, took to flight at the first fire from the enemy, and would have been utterly destroyed, had not 8 @ 900 Canadians thrown themselves into a little wood near St. John's gate, whence they kept up so constant a fire on the enemy, that the latter were obliged to halt in order to return it. This firing lasted a full half hour, which gave the flying troops and Canadians time to reach the bridge we had on the River St. Charles, to communicate with our troops.

'Twas in that retreat that the Marquis de Montcalm received a ball in the loins, as he was on the point of entering the town by the St. Louis gate. I know all the particulars of that landing from English officers of my acquaintance who have communicated them to me; adding, that Mr. Wolf did not expect to succeed; that he had not attempted to land above Quebec, and that he was to sacrifice only his van-guard which consisted of 200 men; that were these fired on, they were all to reëmbark; that the large guns and mortars posted opposite the town had been put again on board, and the troops were to return and leave on the 20th September.

We experienced on the same morning, two misfortunes which we should never have foreseen: 1st The surprisal of one of our posts that considered itself in security, being guarded by several that were nearer the enemy. 2nd The loss of a battle.

It is alleged that had M. de Montcalm been willing to wait for M. Bougainville, or to reinforce his army either from the town or the camp at Beauport, the English were lost, because they could not retreat; but his ardor, and other reasons perhaps, of which we are ignorant, got the better of him and led him to attack regular, well disciplined and equally numerous troops. I am well persuaded that he had had sufficient reasons for not waiting any longer.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, after that battle was lost, called together the Council of War, to see what course it was proper to adopt. It was his opinion that the attack might be recommenced the next morning at daybreak, by again collecting all our forces, as well those of

M. de Bougainville, which were the best and had not yet been engaged, as a portion of those of the town and of those of our camp. I was also of that opinion, but all the officers of the Council insisted on retreating to Jacques Cartier. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, seeing these gentlemen persist in their sentiments, feared to compromise the Colony, and ordered the retreat at 10 o'clock. We abandoned, nevertheless, a great portion of the tents and baggage of the army, and ten days' provisions, which I had great difficulty in getting brought in carts, because they could not reach us by water, except at great risk. Of all those provisions, I could get only some fifty barrels of flour conveyed to Quebec, for want of carriages, and the provisions of that town, which, in consequence of the conflagrations, were in a suburb near the ovens, had been plundered in the morning by the enemy; besides the army was going to a quarter where there were few houses, and the season beginning to be late, it was exposed to suffer greatly from cold and want. I represented this in vain to the Council.

The morning after our arrival at Jacques Cartier, Chevalier de Levis arrived there. He openly censured our retreat; asked me if there were any means to procure provisions for Quebec. I promised that none would be wanting, provided the necessary escorts were forthcoming. He agreed that moment with the Marquis de Vaudreuil to march to the relief of the town, and to inform M. de Ramezay, its Commandant, of the fact. M. de Vaudreuil, in consequence, sent him an order not to surrender; that he should not want for provisions, and that the army was marching to his relief. Indeed, M. de la Roche Beaucourt introduced next night into the town 120 quintals of biscuit and announced to M. de Ramezay for the following night two trains that I had ordered, one of 80 carts loaded with flour, and the other which I had risked in bateaux by water.

M. de Ramezay had sent word to M. de Vaudreuil that he would not surrender, yet he capitulated on the morning of the entry of the biscuit, and that very night the convoys which M. la Roche Beaucourt had announced, arrived. They were, fortunately, notified when on the point of entering the town, and were not lost to us. M. Laroche Beaucourt has served with distinction in this campaign, and is one of the officers who has rendered most service to the King. He was in command of the cavalry, two companies of which M. de Vaudreuil had organized. They have been very useful and have often seen fire.

The army had, meanwhile, set out from Jacques Cartier to go to the relief of Quebec. We were at St. Augustin, 4 leagues from that town, when we learned that it was surrendered. Our Generals were more affected at the circumstance, as that place was not invested, and people went in and out at will. The English army was not sufficiently numerous to prevent this, as it amounted to only 6 or 7 thousand men. I do not enter, my Lord, into M. de Ramezay's reasons; they are, no doubt, valid.

After having received this news, the Marquis de Vaudreuil brought the army back to Jacques Cartier, where it still remains under Chev. de Levis' orders until the first of November, and is constructing a fort which will accommodate during the winter, a garrison of one thousand men.

It has not been without infinite difficulty, my Lord, that I had succeeded in providing for the subsistence of our Quebec army, which, including the Indian families, consumed daily at least 20 thousand rations. I supplied, in addition, a quarter of a pound of bread to 4 or 5 thousand women and children belonging to the people of the town. I had, besides, to support our Lake Champlain army and that of the Rapids. These three armies numbered more than 30 thousand mouths and we had received provisions from France for only 20 thousand rations a day for three months, by reducing them one-fourth. I foresaw that the Colony would be exhausted of all sorts of eatables, and especially of wheat, by the end of July. I bethought me of getting all the gold and silver coin in the country collected for the King's bills of exchange; these were refused, but mine were accepted, and thus I succeeded. The farmer, craving after specie, sold me his subsistence and lived only on herbs for two months until harvest. By these means, I have supported our three armies, and I know not what would have become of us, had that not succeeded.

I have not the honor to mention to you, my Lord, our loss of the Beautiful river, Niagara, Carillon and St. Frederic. You must have learned it long since from England. You will, besides, be more fully and better informed by the Military of what has occurred.

Had our posts above Quebec not been surprised, that town was safe. The King would have preserved Canada, so to say, entire. Its condition was described as too wretched; its resources were, doubtless, not perfectly understood; they are now much exhausted, but with a little aid from France and an increase of the battalions, Quebec and the forts of Lake Champlain and Niagara would have been saved.

I had confided to M. Bernier, Commissary of War, the Military hospital at Quebec, both for the troops and for the Canadians. He performed, in the best manner, that duty during the entire campaign, and, as he was Commissary of that hospital on the surrender of the place, he has remained, agreeably to the Cartel, without being a prisoner. He serves there very usefully and to our satisfaction. Our Generals and I address him on all business we have with the English General. The Commissary continues to attend to the preservation and subsistence of our wounded and sick in that hospital.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

BIGOT.

I cannot, my Lord, have the honor to inform you of our situation, not having any cipher. You will learn it from Chevalier de Levis.

M. de Bourlamaque to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Camp at Isle aux Noix, 1st November, 1759.

Sir,

I have had the honor to report to you at the opening of the campaign, that I was entrusted with the defence of the frontier of Lake St. Sacrament. I am ignorant whether my letters have reached you.

The division of the army employed in that service was composed of the battalion of the regiment of La Reine, of the two battalions of Berry, of one hundred and fifty soldiers detached from the other five battalions, of a like number of soldiers of the Marine and of eight hundred Militia, making a total of two thousand three hundred men.

When the despatches from Court arrived, I received positive orders from M. de Vaudreuil not to think of defending Forts Carillon and St. Frederic, but to abandon them one after the other, as soon as the English army made its approach, and to fall back on this side of Lake Champlain to an island in the River St. John, which was judged to be the post best adapted to protect the Colony on this side. Chev. de Levis came himself to establish this post before proceeding to Quebec, and stationed some workmen in it, who began intrenching it.

As the enemy might attempt to cut off my retreat, I occupied myself until their arrival in strengthening the fortifications of Carillon, in every way that might lead them to believe that I intended to defend that post to the last.

The English army, eleven or twelve thousand strong, six or seven thousand of whom were Regulars, moved slowly, but with all the preparations necessary for a grand expedition. It landed on this end of Lake St. Sacrament on the 22nd July. I wished to take advantage of that moment to make an attack on the troops in advance, with three hundred domiciliated Indians and the grenadiers and volunteers of my little army. I led them in person to meet the enemy on vantage ground, but 'twas impossible for me to induce the Indians to march against the enemy. This unwillingness, which has prevailed throughout the entire campaign, afforded time to the English to form their line, and I was obliged, after having got the other light troops to fire for some time, to make them fall back within the intrenchments of Carillon, and to turn attention to the arrangements of the retreat which I effected on the following night in the greatest order.

I left four hundred men in the fort, under the command of Captain d'Hebecourt, of La Reine, an officer of courage and distinction, with orders to blow up the fort and to retire as soon as the enemy would have erected their first batteries.

I encamped with the remainder of the troops, two leagues and a half from Carillon, to preserve the communication by the river with the fort, and to be able to get the garrison from it.

M. d'Hebecourt, after having kept up, during four days, the most active fire from the artillery, retired during the night of the 26th @ 27th, having had the guns burst and the fort blown up.

28th I fell back on Fort St. Frederic, and that place, not being tenable against an army so superior, nor capable of being placed in a state of defence as promptly as was necessary, I left it on the 31st, after having had the fort blown up, and crossed Lake Champlain with all the artillery, provisions and effects accruing from the evacuation of the two posts. I repaired to Isle aux Noix to attend only to placing that post in the best state of defence.

I left on the lake a schooner armed with ten four-pounders and three small craft called Schébecs, each carrying eight guns of the same calibre, and a crew of fifty men. The commander of that little squadron had orders to cruise continually at the outlet of the lake to block its passages against the English army, which could cross it only in small bateaux.

This army set out on its approach to St. Frederic on the same day the King's troops had evacuated it, and the English General, having had knowledge of the vessels which had been left to cruise, did not think to follow me any farther. He employed his army in erecting at St. Frederic a fort much larger and stronger than that I had destroyed, until he should have a navy built superior to that we had on the lake, and in sending scouts to reconnoitre my position and the intrenchments I was having constructed at Isle aux Noix.

The knowledge I possessed of the building of that navy did not prevent me keeping the four vessels cruising a long time, persuaded that the moment I would have withdrawn them, the English General, who had express instructions to attack Canada with vigor by Lake Champlain, would not fail to execute them. I wished for time to render Isle aux Noix proof against an attack, and in this I have succeeded. I did hope, besides, that the Schébecks, which were sailing pretty well, might escape under cover of the night, notwithstanding the superiority of the English vessels.

12th October. The English army defiled on Lake Champlain. The van-guard was composed of an armed brigantine carrying 16 eighteen-pounders, of 3 snows and 160 flat bateaux or barges. These vessels gave chase to our schooner, but could not take her as she had become separated from the other three and run aground. The Schébecks were, during that time, engaged with 150 barges, which they dispersed and drove ashore. The wind, having changed quite suddenly, the English vessels, notified by the fire from the guns of the Schébecks [bore down on the Commander of the Schebecks, who<sup>1</sup>] considering it impossible for him to escape the English fleet, determined to sink the vessels at nightfall and to escape with the crews through the woods. The prisoners he had taken assure us that the English army, which he had himself perceived on the lake, was ten thousand strong, and had several flat bateaux armed with heavy guns, and one bomb-ketch.

The van-guard of the English army having formed a junction, came to anchor in the River St. John, two leagues from Isle aux Noix.

20th Fifteen or twenty barges drove in our scouts and came to reconnoitre our intrenchments.

23rd The entire van-guard retired up the lake, after having led me, for several days, to hope that I should terminate the campaign in a manner glorious to the King's arms.

It is probable that the knowledge the English General possessed of our position and the little time that he had remaining for operations, have determined him to abandon the project of attacking this frontier.

The season is now so far advanced that there is no appearance of the English undertaking any serious enterprise.

You have learned, from other sources, Sir, the events which have occurred on the other frontiers. If it be allowable to feel any satisfaction after such misfortunes, 'tis that of not sharing them and of having, on my part, successfully carried out the plan of defence confided to me.

'Tis only by unheard of labor, in which the troops coöperated with the utmost good will, that I have been able to render the post of Isle aux Noix sufficiently imposing to stay the progress of an army so superior and which did not want for any of the means to operate.

Chevalier de Levis has the honor to transmit to you a list of the favors of which, in his opinion, the officers of the eight battalions he commands, are deserving, and no doubt includes therein those who have made the campaign with me. I shall, nevertheless, take the liberty specially, to report to you Lieutenant-Colonel Roquemaure, Commandant of the battalion of La Reine, Captain d'Hebecourt of the same regiment, and adjudant d'Hert, Lieutenants Bartouille and Failly of the regiment of Berry, Captain Louvicou, of artillery, commanding that of this frontier, and Lieutenant Volff, of the Infantry, a partizan and excelling in that sort of warfare.

I should consider myself highly favored, were his Majesty to please to be satisfied with the services I have rendered during this campaign, and were yourself, Sir, so good as to approve my conduct.

I have the honor to be, with respect,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

BOURLAMAQUE.

Montreal, 9th November, 1759.

Sir,

Your letter full of kindness fills me with gratitude so profound that I find it impossible to express it. I feel confidence that the present situation, far from diminishing, will augment that goodness.

The few opportunities there are of writing, Sir, prevent me entering into any detail. You will assuredly be informed of the misery experienced by all conditions in this Colony. The annexed description may afford an idea thereof. Were it distributed, it would perhaps call forth some alms.

The events which have occurred are much discussed here. People condemn easily. I have watched them closely, having never been more than a league from the Marquis de Vaudreuil; I cannot help saying that those are greatly in error who attribute our misfortunes to him. Although this subject is not within my province, I flatter myself, Sir, that you will not disapprove a testimony which truth alone leads me to give.

I have the honor to be, with the most profound respect,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), + H. M., Bishop of Quebec.<sup>1</sup>

The delay of the sailing of our ships, has afforded me the leisure to collect under one single point of view the criticism of the public on the operations of the campaign.

An Imperfect Description of the Misery of Canada. By Bishop de Pontbriand.

In order to excite the charity of persons imbued with the slightest compassion, 'tis sufficient to expose the condition of Canada.

Quebec has been bombarded and cannonaded for the space of over 2 months. 180 houses have been burnt by fire-pots, all the others riddled by shot and shell. Walls 6 feet thick have not resisted; vaults in which private persons had placed their effects have been burnt, shattered and pillaged during and after the siege. The Cathedral has been entirely consumed. No part of the Seminary is habitable except the kitchen, where the Parish priest of Quebec, with his coadjutor, has retired. That community has suffered still greater losses outside the town, where the enemy have burnt 4 farms and 3 extensive mills belonging to it, and which constituted all its revenue. The church of the Lower town is wholly destroyed; those of the Récollets, of the Jesuits, and of the Seminary are unserviceable except by extensive repairs. Mass can only be celebrated with any sort of decency in that of the Ursulines, although the English use it for some extraordinary ceremonies. This convent and that of the Hospitalières<sup>1</sup> have been also much damaged; they are without provisions, all their lands having been laid waste. Meanwhile the nuns have found means to lodge there, however indifferently, after having resided during the entire siege at the General Hospital. The Hotel-Dieu is greatly straitened because the English sick are there. 4 years ago this convent was entirely burnt. The Episcopal palace is almost destroyed and supplies only one habitable apartment; the vaults have been pillaged. The Récollet convent and Jesuit college are nearly in the same condition. The English however, have somewhat repaired them for quarters for the troops; they have taken possession of such houses in the town as are the least damaged, and even daily drive citizens from their houses, who, by means of money, having had some apartment fitted up; or confine them to such narrow compass, by the number of soldiers whom they billet on them, that almost all are forced to abandon that unfortunate town; this they do the more readily as the English will not sell anything except for cash, and the money of the country, 'tis known, consists only of paper. The priests of the Seminary, the canons and the Jesuits are dispersed throughout the small space of country that is still exempt from English domination. The private citizens of the town are without wood for their winter fuel, without bread, without flour, without meat, and live only on the little biscuit and pork the English soldier sells them from his ration. Such is the extremity to which our best citizens are reduced; hence the misery of the people and of the poor can be easily inferred.

The rural districts furnish no resources, and are perhaps as much to be pitied as the town. Côte de Beaupré and the Island of Orleans have been wholly destroyed before the end of the siege; the barns, farmers' houses and priests' residences, (Presbytères) have been burned, and the cattle that remained, carried off; those removed above Quebec have almost all been taken for the subsistence of our army; so that the poor farmer who returned to his land with his wife and children, will be obliged to hut himself, Indian fashion; his crops, which could not be saved, except on halves, will be exposed, as well as the cattle, to the inclemency of the weather. The secret deposits (caches) made in the woods, have been discovered by the enemy, and consequently the farmer is without clothing, furniture, plough and without any implements to cultivate the soil and to cut wood. The churches have been preserved to the number of ten; but the windows, doors, altars, statues and tabernacles have been broken; the mission of the Abénaquis Indians of St. Francis has been utterly destroyed by a party of English and Indians, who have stolen all the vestments and sacred vessels, have thrown the consecrated Hosts on the ground, have killed some thirty persons, more than 20 of whom were women and children.

On the other, or South, side of the river about 36 leagues of settled country have been almost equally devastated; it contained 19 parishes, the greater number of which have been destroyed.

All those places, just mentioned, will suffer seriously, and are incapable of assisting any person; have no provisions to sell, and will not be restored to their ancient state for more than 20 years. A great many of these farmers, as well as those of Quebec, are coming to the district of Montreal and of Three Rivers, but find it very difficult to obtain relief.

Rents in both the towns are exorbitant and so are the prices of all commodities; for example, butter 6<sup>11</sup> the pound; eggs the same per dozen; sheep 70 @ 80<sup>11</sup> and the farmer objects, strongly, to taking the paper money (les ordonnances); paper 24<sup>11</sup> the ream; shoes 30<sup>11</sup>, soap the same per pound, and clothing in proportion. Next year, 'twill be difficult to sow the land, because there has been none ploughed.

There are plenty of objects of charity, and every one can select, from the list, according to his taste and inclination. The Superiors of St. Sulpice, of the Foreign Missions of the Jesuits, and Abbé de L'Ile-Dieu will, readily receive any alms that may be offered, and find means to have them forwarded. Silk gowns may be sent; they can be converted here into vestments. In the seaports—at Brest, M. Hocquart; at Bordeaux, M. Estèbe; at Rochelle, M. Goguet, will undertake to forward the linens, stuffs, pork, flour, brandy, wine and generally whatever people will be willing to send.

I attest that in this description of our misfortunes nothing is exaggerated, and I beg their Lordships the Bishops, and the charitable to make some efforts in our behalf.

+ H. M. Bishop of Quebec.

An Impartial Opinion on the Military Operations of the Campaign in Canada, 1759.

By Bishop de PONTRELAND.

What appears to have been the subject of criticism, is the only subject treated of here.

'Tis asked, 1st Why was the enemy allowed to land on the Island of Orleans? 2nd Why were they permitted to land and erect batteries at Point Levi? 3rd Why were they suffered to occupy the heights of the Falls of Montmorenci? 4th Why were the heights near Quebec not better protected? 5th Why was not our whole force brought together at the battle of the 13th? 6th Why precipitately abandon the Beauport intrenchments to take refuge at Jacques Cartier? 7th Finally, why did the town surrender, before the enemy had effected a breach?

These questions will be examined without any prejudice, without any human motive. He who undertakes to do so is not a military man, has no relative either in the troops or in the Colony, has not penetrated into the secrets of the Cabinet and was in a position to see every thing himself, to confer with the heads of the army, to hear all and drew up his journal with exactness.

1st QUESTION.

Why was the enemy allowed to land on the Island of Orleans?

It has been always the conviction, that it was not possible to prevent that landing, and that it was much more important to preserve our intrenchments at Beauport which, 'twas feared, the enemy would have attacked, had people amused themselves on the Island of Orleans. Nevertheless the Marquis de Vaudreuil did send thither some Indian and French detachments and even cannon, and the enemy was annoyed. Had the Island been defended, the enemy would have encamped at Point Levi, or without encamping, would have attacked Beauport. Besides, 'tis an Island without fortifications and over 14 leagues in circumference.

2nd QUESTION.

Why was the enemy permitted to land and erect batteries at Point Levi?

A small detachment which we had was surprised and offered no resistance, but some farmers exhibited a great deal of courage. M. de Vaudreuil spent over six hours in persuading the Indians to go and strike a sudden blow. In the meantime that General had adopted measures with the Marquis de Montcalm to go and make an attack in the night on the enemy's camp at the same place, more especially as a great number of the enemy were visible at Point Levi.

Unfortunately, some prisoners were taken at Point Levi on the same day, the 30th June; one of them, an Irish Catholic, who appeared to be sincere and perhaps was so, assured that the English were only 400 in number there, that the entire army was that night to attack the Beauport camp. He was believed the more readily as the English General was an active and impetuous man. This was what made the design against Point Levi fail. Our troops stood to their arms the whole night. The enemy landed a strong force at Point Levi, from which 'twas as easy for them to come and attack our camp as from the Island of Orleans; and it was thought to be a feint to draw us out, to divide us and to take the Beauport intrenchments which we always considered impregnable. The enemy profited by the interval, was soon intrenched and erected batteries at Point Levi, where there were, according to the prisoners, 3,000 men. Quebec was aware that it was to be bombarded, and on the 2nd July the notables demanded that the enemy should be attacked. They thought that there was only 600 men, which was not correct; and how attack an enemy behind intrenchments? Was it not to be feared that he would have abandoned Point Levi to pounce, with those of the Island of Orleans, on our intrenchments? Besides, there were no bateaux to cross in. Several years ago the Court had been informed that it was not possible to oppose a landing on the Point Levi side and to prevent the bombardment of the town. Nevertheless, by force of solicitations on the part of the town, M. Demars<sup>1</sup> was commanded with 1,000 men; but he was discovered and some of our men fired at each other and returned on the thirteenth of July.

I am assured, however, that M. de Vaudreuil and some officers would have wished that an attempt had been made at Point Levi with a considerable party. But M. de Montcalm and the principal officers of the army were afraid of weakening the Beauport intrenchment, especially as the frigates went towards the Falls on the 9th.

Why was the enemy allowed to occupy the heights at the Falls of Montmorency?

'Twas on the 9th of July that the English barges, supported by some frigates, went to land near the Falls. It had been always the impression that no large ship could enter the North Channel. Some Canadians and Indians fired at the enemy; killed about 140 of their men, and we lost 8; the others recrossed the Falls to join a corps of 7 @ 500 men. There was no knowing the numbers of the enemy, who kept daily increasing. It might have been supposed a feint to induce us to go on the heights, in order that the enemy would suddenly fall in return on our Beauport intrenchments. People looked quite unconcernedly at the enemy ascending the heights of the Falls. I am assured that M. de Vaudreuil, in concert with the Intendant, wished to make an attack that night, but a Council of War was called, and 'twas decided that such an undertaking was impracticable. This is an assured fact. M. de Montcalm had reasons, no doubt, and, indeed, the opposition of the enemy was very successful, who took up a position in the night and even erected a battery and eventually formed a very extensive camp there. Whereupon disappeared all inclination to attack, and people contented themselves with sending out small parties, which at one time threatened to bring on a general engagement.

4th QUESTION.

Why were not the heights near Quebec better protected?

They were considered inaccessible; posts had been established at a short distance one from the other. In case of the enemy attempting anything, a sortie from the town was relied on. M. de Bougainville had 2,000 men, who could defend that quarter and reach it, although his men were dispersed within 6 or 7 leagues. The night of the 13th was that on which, it seemed, greater vigilance was used; but unfortunately word had been sent that some of our bateaux were to pass, and the English barges did, indeed, answer as if they were loaded with provisions for Quebec. I know for certain that M. de Vaudreuil had recommended the stationing at that quarter about 400 men more, and the erection of a few redoubts. Those who superintended the military operations and the artillery thought it all useless. Yet, it must be acknowledged that the officer of the post, or rather, that the sentinels had not been sufficiently vigilant.

5th QUESTION.

Why were not all our people brought out together at the battle of the 13th September?

'Twas some time after the enemy had climbed up, that M. de Montcalm got word; he issued his orders to the regiments and to a certain number of Militia. He considered it his duty to leave the Montreal battalion in charge of the Beauport intrenchments, and neither informed nor sent word to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who, nevertheless, set out shortly afterwards, which fact was communicated to the M<sup>rs</sup> de Montcalm. We were not 3,000 men; he resolved to attack a little too soon, as he himself admitted; but he feared the enemy intended to intrench themselves; he wished to take advantage of the first impulse of the soldier. It has since been ascertained, that had he delayed one hour, the enemy would have been reinforced by 3,000 men, and have had 8 pieces of artillery. M. de Vaudreuil could not prevent the flight; in the hour of need, he even employed a priest to rally the men.

6th QUESTION.

Why abandon so precipitately the Beauport intrenchments to take refuge at Jacques Cartier? I went to the camp on the 13th, after the defeat, and learned from the Intendant that the question was, whether to turn back on the enemy or to go to Jacques Cartier; that M. de Montcalm, although mortally wounded, had stated this alternative. I took the liberty to speak of the first to M. de Vaudreuil, who told me that all the heads of the army were opposed to it. The death of the English General was not known; our troops were very much fatigued; no superior officers. I had the honor to tell him that, after all, he was Master; he could order, but that he would be forced to capitulate for the entire Colony, if beaten. My sincerity added, that if that happened, he might indeed appear inexcusable, and that, in fact, there was some risk. I then left, and a Council of War was assembled, which decided on falling back on Jacques Cartier, about 11 leagues from the town—a post which it was important to preserve; for, had the enemy seized it, they could cut off the provisions both from the army and town, none having been received for three days. The enemy, being master of the river, could have sent out barges, taken all the bateaux which would come down with provisions. There was no appearance of these being brought in over land from Jacques Cartier, as the roads were extremely bad, and there were very few vehicles, and the army and town could never have been supplied. The enemy would have also cut off the communication with the entire country above Quebec, and forced a general capitulation for the whole Colony. 'Twas therefore necessary not to postpone, for a single moment, securing that post, and a portion of our army could not be allowed to be sent without exposing those who would have remained at Beauport, to be carried off.

7th QUESTION.

Why did the town surrender before the enemy had made any breach?

I could answer this question only in a vague manner, as I am not informed respecting the provisions, the arrangements of the garrison or the orders the Commandant might have. It is a long time since sensible persons have come to the conclusion that 'twas difficult for two Generals to be of the same opinion; that, nevertheless, the Court could not help forbidding anything being undertaken, except jointly. When Councils of War become necessary, many inconveniences have to be surmounted.<sup>1</sup> have been pleased to allow me to approach you in order to have the honor to communicate a plan which may contribute to the defence of that part of Canada yet remaining in our possession; a part which we will be able to preserve with tolerable ease and without exposing the State to immense expense.

'Tis in obedience to your Excellency's orders, my Lord, that I have come from Port Louis here, and am going to remain until your Excellency will be pleased to grant me an audience. I require to communicate the expedients my plan consists of, and which are to enable you, my Lord, to preserve to France the part of Canada from Quebec to Lakes Ontario and Champlain; a part, the preservation whereof cannot but be very precious and of infinite importance to the State, and which can be preserved with as much success as honor without any immense expense, if your Excellency will be pleased to approve the plan I have presumed to come to submit to you.

CANADA.

Memoir of Mr Massé de St. Maurice, on the defence of that part of Canada which still remains to France.

What is proposed here aims only at preserving us the few settlements which remain to us in Canada. Our inferiority in numbers, the scarcity of provisions and ammunition, are motives sufficiently powerful to discourage the making of conquests there. Will it not be glorious for the Nation, after having lost the Capital, to preserve the portion which still remains to us in that Colony? On some succor being furnished to the Generals, their valor, intelligence and the union which prevails among them, must guarantee us success in the operations of the next campaign; those Generals can actually do nothing if prompt assistance be not rendered them. All the difficulty consists in conveying it to them safely, without any danger; 'tis on this point I am about to treat with precision, combining the respective interests of our enemies the English.

The English being in possession of Ile Royale or Louisbourg, and of Quebec, are no longer liable to have privateers nor armed ships abroad; our only fear from them, then, is in leaving the French ports.

The enemy's forces will indubitably march by way of the Upper country; they are aware of the indispensable necessity of becoming masters of Montreal, which nothing can prevent save prompt assistance. The actual state of our navy saves them the trouble of making a considerable armament to sustain themselves in Quebec. They are morally certain that the garrison which they have left there is more than sufficient to hold it. Assuredly, they will not send any considerable force thither; if they will forward troops, 'twill only be to replace those they will have lost during the course of the winter. Chiboutout and Louisburg offered them the means of transporting provisions to it, whenever they please.

The garrison they have left in Quebec is composed of 5,000 men. General Muray, who commands there, will be able easily to detach a small division of 3,000 men direct to Montreal, and in concert with General Hamers, have a junction formed there with what they design sending down the Rapids to make a diversion. This it is proper to remedy in order to save the rest of the Colony, which cannot be effected without sending the necessary assistance thither; 'twill be well to have these reinforcements sent in two divisions.

The first would be composed of 500 men, viz. 400 Regulars, 100 Colonials which constituted part of the garrison of Quebec, there being a great many of these same soldiers who are perfectly acquainted with the locality where it is indispensable for us to land. In order to succeed perfectly the landing must be made at Mekaskoo point,<sup>1</sup> (between Menagoniche Island<sup>2</sup> and Birds' Island,<sup>3</sup>) five leagues west of the River St. John, at the mouth of that of Mechicoo<sup>4</sup> and of the Bay of Fundy, in order to cross the forest as far as St. Anne between Lake Kousaky<sup>5</sup> and Madocteg<sup>6</sup> and strike again the River St. John so as to reach the portage to Quebec, and to arrive at Villiers, and to cross the River Saint Lawrence there, between Pointe au tremble and Sillery.

The mouth of the River St. John lies opposite that of the Bay of Fundy; Fort la Tour, or St. John, is situate on the left bank of that river; it has an English garrison of 150 men since its reduction. This post can be carried by assault, without much difficulty; it is passed to the right, without having any knowledge of the arrival of this detachment.

The Bay of Fundy separates the Peninsula of Acadia from the main land. Halifax or Chiboutout lies in the south part of that Peninsula, and can be avoided by making land only at forty-four degrees of latitude.

This is the most convenient place to land the first detachment in safety, so as not to be annoyed by the English.

The objection will be made: how will it be possible for a body of 500 men to march 160 and some odd leagues, in the woods, on the banks of lakes and rivers, without any practicable roads to permit the transportation of provisions.

The nutritive powder which was to serve for the subsistence of the troops designed for the descent on England, is still in existence, and can be of as much service in North America as it would have been in the British islands.

One considerable advantage would result from this first armament; the troops once landed in safety at their destination, orders would be given to the officer in charge of the expedition to collect the Colonists on his route; the number would amount to more than a thousand, and joined to the 500 soldiers, would form a corps of 1,500 men, capable by well combined movements of holding in check the enemy under the cannon of Quebec without daring to attempt going out of that place.

The 2nd embarkation would consist of an equal number of 500 men with the provisions, munitions of war and artillery.

The officer in charge of this second division would proceed by the River St. Lawrence, to land the troops above Quebec, in order to form a junction with the 1st, and form with it a small corps d'armée to oppose those which General Muray might send out of the town to advance and ruin our settlements.

The ships which would have transported the troops, provisions, ammunition and artillery would serve with advantage, after they had been carried up the river to be moored between Batiscan and Champlain and erect batteries on them to oppose the enemy, should the latter undertake to pass there in order to form a junction with the army which would descend from Niagara by the Rapids.

This armament though of little importance, would place Chev. de Levis at his ease, not having anything to fear from below, wherefore he would be able to proceed with the greater part of his army to Hévreuil along Lake Champlain to observe General Hamers and hold him in check during the campaign.

M. de Bourlamaque could repair below Niagara to stop the enemy's army that might attempt to descend the Rapids with a view to reach Montreal.

This campaign, without presuming to flatter ourselves with making any conquests, would be attended with advantage. The result of it would be to strengthen the confidence of the Indians which is weakened, and that of the Colonists, three-fourths of which is lost. The farmers of the Colony now feel how important it is for them to be delivered from the tyranny of the English, although they have been but a short time under it.

Memoir of Chev. Le Mercier on Canada.

Memoir on the Situation of Canada, confining ourselves to what is indispensable to preserve that Colony to the King, until the spring of 1762.

ARTICLE 1.

France cannot retain her possessions in North America, except by having reinforcements of men, munitions of war and provisions conveyed thither, under a convoy of five or six men-of-war.

2.

The success of this expedition will depend on the activity of the armament which must be completed by the end of February, in order to reach the river before the enemy.

3.

Quebec must necessarily be besieged and taken in the course of May, a time when the enemy cannot turn Isle aux Noix, on account of the spring freshets.

4.

The objects of the ships of war and frigates will be, not only to escort the fleet, but also to stop the enemy's squadron should it press us too closely.

5.

Intrenched batteries would be erected on Isle aux Coudres, and on the North shore, to oblige the English to attack them.

6.

The men-of-war would remain anchored at La Petite Rivière<sup>1</sup> so as to be able to batter any of the enemy's ships or frigates which would have passed the Gulf.

7.

Should the English enter the Gulf with a naval force of too great superiority, then our fleet would go and lie above the traverse so as to stop the enemy there, and send to sink one or two frigates along St. Joachim, to prevent the enemy's frigates or transports passing North of the Island of Orleans.

8.

20 thirty-six-pounders might be sent as ballast in the men-of-war, and to furnish batteries at Point Levis and at the end of the Island of Orleans, which could cover the retreat of our men-of-war and prevent those of the English anchoring under the cannon of Quebec.

9.

Supposing it necessary, at last, to yield to force, the men-of-war and frigates would go and anchor above the Falls of the Chaudière, where the besieging army would construct a redoubt and another on the opposite bank for the reception of cannon and mortars; it is the narrowest part of the River (St. Lawrence.)

10.

The number of men must be fixed, at least, at 4,000, including troops from Isle Royale, Colonials and volunteers from the regiments, which would make, in Canada, only 8,000 soldiers to guard the frontiers and to lay siege to Quebec, whose garrison consists of from 4 @ 5,000 men.

It will be observed that those soldiers will not be any expense. Their passage must be less inasmuch as they will act in place of a crew in the transports and be employed in the simple manœuvres.

11.

There cannot be sent less than 50 thousand quintals of flour, estimating only 20 thousand rations a day, at the rate of one pound and a half of bread, although it ought to be two pounds. It will require 36 pounds of flour per month, for each ration, which will make, per month, 7,200 quintals, and for the seven months of the campaign, 50,400 quintals. It will be necessary to obtain from the harvests wherewith to provision, during the winter, 8,000 soldiers, the laborers at the posts and Indians of the different nations; although only 20 thousand rations are estimated, nearly 30 have been consumed last summer.

12.

There would be required 20 thousand or at least 15 thousand barrels of pork; 20 thousand during the seven campaign months at the rate of half a pound, make 21 thousand quintals for 10 thousand rations; during the five winter months 7,500 quintals; which amount to 28,500 quintals net, at 200 pounds the barrel, 14,250 barrels. In the distribution, there is a waste in the weight of 10 per cent. Some pork taints; 'twould be very advantageous, were there any over, that the King should order some to be sold to the people, who will not be able to get any more beef from the butchers, the species being destroyed.

13.

24 twenty-four-pounders for the siege; twelve mortars, ammunition in proportion, according to the statement prepared with M<sup>r</sup> Acaron.

14.

The goods for the Indian trade, the linen for the camps and other necessities for the service, as well as the material for clothing the troops and Colonists, according to the requisition of M<sup>r</sup> Bigot, the Intendant.

15.

To make an arrangement which may restore confidence to the people and give them some encouragement respecting the paper money in which their fortune consists; otherwise there is no knowing whether 'twill be possible to expect to find the same zeal and willingness among the Canadians.

16.

Dry goods and liquors being at an excessive rate in Canada, on account of their scarcity, the King might send thither what the people require, under the name of some merchants to whom the King would pay commission. For one million, he would obtain in return more than ten, in bills of exchange or notes, and this would be a certain means to reëstablish confidence and liquidate the public debts.

17.

To fix the sum for which the Intendant will draw bills of exchange, in order that they be punctually paid and drawn pro rata for the remittance each would make. To order the registration of those of the year so that they may carry interest for the private person.

18.

Should this relief arrive in Canada after the naval forces of the enemy, they could not free the Colony, they would be a pure loss to the King. A double plan might be made, not to be unsealed except in such case.

19.

Precise orders must be given to enter the ice immediately on arriving. Nothing is more rare than to see a vessel wrecked in it, and it would be preferable that such a misfortune should happen to one or two, than to enter the river too late.

20.

If France does not send sufficient reinforcements to lay siege to Quebec, 'tis useless to send any, and the Colony will necessarily be lost.

21.

If the King determine to send to Canada the aid required, the recovery of Quebec is considered certain, if it arrive before the English; nothing further being to be apprehended by way of the river, the entire Colony will be able to proceed either to the Rapids or to Ile aux Noix, and the enemy will not penetrate any further. We ought, besides, anticipate the fullest success from the union which exists between M. de Vaudreuil and Chevalier de Levis, who have only at heart the safety of the Colony and the King's Glory.

22.

After his Majesty shall have decided on the course he will pursue respecting Canada, 'twould be essential that a frigate be sent to the Bay of Fundy, about a dozen leagues from the mouth of the river St. John, to land Sieur St. Simon or some other Colonial officer there, to convey, with three Acadians, the despatches in cipher overland to the General. This frigate might afterwards cruise between Boston and Halifax, send to some port in Newfoundland the prizes and provisions she might take, and make them enter the river as soon as the ice would permit.

23.

As the last article, 'tis requested that attention be paid to the fact that time is passing, and that success can be looked for only from great activity.

(Signed) Chev. LEMERCIER.

Versailles, 7th January, 1760.

Marshal de Belle Isle to Chevalier de Levis.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Versailles, 9th February, 1760.

Sir,

I have to acknowledge the receipt of the letters you have done me the honor to write me on the 22nd 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1758, 15th April, 17th May, 21st and 22nd 7<sup>ber</sup>, and 11th 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1759. These last have been delivered to me by Mess<sup>rs</sup> Joumas and Lemerrier, with whom I have conferred as well as with Chevalier de Bernetz, ancient commandant of battalion, on the late events in Canada, and the present state of the Colony, and I have judged, from the different details they have reported to me, that they thoroughly understood the commission you had confided to them.

The King has been deeply affected by the loss of M. de Montcalm and the other officers who have fallen before Quebec. His Majesty is perfectly persuaded that the command could not, after him, be in better hands than yours, and that you will maintain to the end, the honor of his arms, to whatever extremity affairs may be reduced. For the rest, M. Berrier orders to be dispatched to you relief of every description in provisions, munitions of war and recruits, by means whereof, despite the advantages the English possess in the occupation of the town of Quebec, which has been too hastily surrendered, you will be able to dispute the ground with them, inch by inch, and perhaps to gain some advantages over them, sufficient to arrest their progress. His Majesty cannot but rely on the wisdom of the measures you will adopt, with M. de Vaudreuil, to that end; not doubting but that there exists between you every desirable concert in a conjuncture so critical as this in which you find yourselves.

You will see, by the annexed list, that the King has granted the greater part of the favors you have demanded for the officers of the troops of the Line, serving under your orders. As they are the reward of the courage and constancy of those who have obtained them, his Majesty expects that they will serve to excite a general emulation in well doing, and that in announcing them, you will not omit anything in your power to contribute to their producing that effect. I also enclose in this packet the crosses of St. Louis which his Majesty has granted; M. de Roquemaure's commission of Brigadier with letters of service to be employed in such quality, and the order of Deputy Quartermaster-General you have solicited for M. de la Paure in the place of M. de Bougainville, together with the lists of appointments to the vacancies.

I request you to continue to transmit me your news by every opportunity which will offer, and to be persuaded that I shall most readily improve, near his Majesty, the new proofs he expects you will give him of your zeal for his service.

I have the honor to be most perfectly, Sir, &c.

M. de Vaudreuil's Instructions to Chevalier de Levis.

Memoir to serve as Instructions to Chevalier de Levis, Maréchal des Camps et Armées of the King.

The winding up of the last campaign, reduced the Colony to the most critical circumstances and most melancholy condition.

1st By the strong garrison the enemy left in Quebec, and their proximity to our frontiers on Lakes Champlain and Ontario.

2nd By the exhaustion of our resources, of our other means, and particularly by the extreme scarcity of provisions.

We conceived, nevertheless, the desire of recapturing Quebec during the winter; we arranged, conjointly, with Chevalier de Levis, the most urgent preparations for such an expedition, the good will of the Canadians seconding perfectly our measures; we had every reason to hope that the first instant would not be lost when the garrison of Quebec would find itself enfeebled by sickness or discouraged by some unfortunate event, such as the firing of its powder magazines, &c.

The knowledge we have had of the enemy's forces, and military arrangements, the obstacles we could not surmount for such a campaign, especially in regard to provisions, the greatest portion of the mills being stopped by the ice; all that being maturely considered and duly reflected on by Chevalier de Levis and myself induced us, secretly, to postpone the execution of our project until the opening of the navigation ; we have, however, made the demonstrations which depended on us to create alarms and prompt annoyances capable of fatiguing the garrison of Quebec, which have not failed to produce the effect we expected.

The moment is now one of the most urgent. We have, after much care, collected together all the resources of the Colony in provisions and munitions of war ; the one and the other are very slender, not to say insufficient. Therefore, let us use all the expedients our zeal can suggest to make up for any deficiencies.

We have concerted and concluded with Chevalier de Levis the plan of the siege of Quebec, and everything relating thereunto ; he is convinced, as well as ourselves, that it is the only attempt we have to make to save the Colony.

Our forces consist of about 3,500 Regulars.

3,000 Militia of the districts of Montreal and Three Rivers.

And about 400 Indians of different Nations.

Independent of the Acadians, we expect that the farmers of the district of Quebec, or at least the greater portion of them, will join this army when the place will be invested. We address a circular letter for that purpose to the Parish priests and Captains of Militia in all the parishes of this government.

As the zeal of the Canadians might be susceptible of some abatement, as they are intimidated by General Murray's menaces, Chevalier de Levis will accompany our circular with a rigid Manifesto, whereby he will relieve these Canadians of their apprehension and compel them to join him on pain of death.

Chevalier de Levis knows that we cannot furnish a larger army, as the Militia that will remain in the governments of Three Rivers and Montreal, are indispensably necessary to put seed into the ground ; he also knows that we must, at the same time, provide for the safety of the frontiers on Lakes Champlain and Ontario.

Our presence in this town being required by those two points and to watch the enemy's movements, and to provide for everything in the interior of the Colony,

We hand over to Chevalier de Levis, with the confidence we repose in his zeal and experience, the command of the army, which we have, jointly with him, destined for the Quebec expedition, and in consequence of our distance and of cases which we cannot now actually foresee, we deposit with him the same powers we would ourselves have were we to command this army in person, authorizing him to act as he shall judge best for the good of the service, the interest of the Colony and State.

Although the success of the siege of Quebec appears doubtful, both in consequence of the small means we possess in ammunition, artillery and provisions, and by reason of our force compared with that of the enemy, which we prudently estimate at about 4,000 fighting men, who will possibly be increased in number by the reinforcements the English are expecting, from one moment to the other, we have, nevertheless, maturely reflected and determined with Chevalier de Levis, that all these obstacles should not stop us ; that the Quebec expedition is the only step to be taken, both for the further preservation of the Colony for the King and to enable us to receive, unimpeded, the reinforcements his Majesty will please to order to be dispatched to us, more especially as the enemy, having taken up a position on the South shore, opposite Quebec, and being erecting batteries there, these reinforcements cannot pass without imminent danger.

According to these powerful motives, it is important that Chevalier de Levis apply the greatest activity to his operations ; whereupon we have nothing to prescribe to him, relying entirely on his zeal, experience and the particular attachment we have always known him to feel towards this Colony.

As there are among the troops that compose the garrison of Quebec, a number of French and Germans who have left the King's service or that of their lawful Sovereigns, his Majesty's allies, to enter that of the King of Great Britain, after mature reflection and seeing that, under existing circumstances, we ought to try all lawful means to increase our forces and weaken those of our enemies, we have considered it, for the good of the King's service, to call on those same soldiers to enjoy the amnesty granted by his Majesty's ordinance of the 29th of December, 1757, and in consequence we have enacted ours, whereof Chevalier de Levis will make use, agreeably to the conditions inserted therein.

Should Chevalier de Levis be so fortunate as to succeed in obliging the garrison of Quebec to sue for a capitulation, he will take advantage, as much as he possibly can, of the circumstances and situation in which the enemy may be placed, so as to grant them only the articles mentioned in the draft we have furnished him of an advantageous capitulation for ourselves; far from intending to restrict him on this point, we observe to him that the situation of the Colony, the uncertainty of success and the apprehension of the forces the English may receive by way of the river, do not permit us to be particular. Therefore, we inform Chevalier de Levis beforehand that we approve, in advance of all the conditions he will consider it his duty to grant that garrison, our principal object being to accelerate the relief of the Colony by the surrender of Quebec, and the placing of ourselves in a condition to oppose the efforts the English will possibly make to penetrate into the interior of the Colony, by Lakes Champlain and Ontario.

Chevalier de Levis will employ all the means and negotiations imaginable to accelerate the surrender of Quebec; he will grant to that end such sums as he shall judge necessary, to such persons as will contribute thereunto, were he even obliged to give a free and entire course to the expense we are authorized to incur by the Minister's letter, in cipher, of the 10th February, 1759, addressed conjointly to the late M<sup>re</sup> de Montcalm and us, a copy whereof is in Chevalier de Levis' possession.

Chevalier de Levis is instructed that we have established lookouts at St. Barnabé, Bic, and Ile aux Coudres to hail the French ships and to furnish them with practical pilots. We communicate to Chevalier de Levis copies of the orders we have given on that point, the signals those vessels and the one that has wintered at Gaspé, are to make.

Supposing a French fleet to arrive, Chevalier de Levis will transmit to the Commander thereof the letter we write requesting him to communicate to Chevalier de Levis his orders and instructions, he will correspond and coöperate with him in the execution of the King's views towards this Colony, according as circumstances may require, until we regulate his operations.

Chevalier de Levis will be careful to cause all our despatches to be delivered to him, he will give, or cause to be given, a receipt for those of the Court, if necessary. He will have those despatches diligently transmitted to us by a reliable person.

For the rest, Chevalier de Levis will send us couriers every day, or as often as possible, to inform us of his progress. We shall have no greater desire, on our part, than to communicate to him whatever of interest will occur on our frontiers.

M. de Vaudreuil to the Clergy.

Copy of the Circular letter the Marquis de Vaudreuil wrote to Priests of the Parishes of the District of Quebec, North and South.

Montreal, 16th April, 1760.

Sir,

I doubt not that the Captains of Militia of your parish will communicate to you the letter I write them.

You will observe in it, Sir, a lively sensibility for the melancholy situation of the Canadians, the vexations and tyranny the English exercise towards them, and particularly the severe and cruel treatment which General Murray has but too frequently made the Canadians suffer, without any legitimate right or reason.

You will there observe, also, Sir, that urged by those motives and by my love for my country, I am dispatching a very powerful army and a very considerable train of artillery to besiege Quebec and thereby cause our brave Canadians to triumph over an enemy who has only too strongly developed his aversion for them, and who, certainly would reduce them to the most deplorable condition, were he in possession of the entire of this Colony.

I am fully convinced that these poor unfortunate people will have found in you, Sir, some consolations in the bitterness of their sorrows.

I also know that they will manifest their joy to you at the powerful effort I am making to release and deliver them from an enemy who has despised and violated the laws and even the rights of nations.

It is in this confidence, Sir, that I request you to be so good as to employ the credit, the ascendancy your character gives you over your parishioners, to make them understand that they are bound by their religion, their honor and their very interest to join the army in mass, with arms and baggage, and to surpass even in zeal and ardor the troops, Canadians and different Indian Nations that compose it.

My presence being essentially necessary here in every respect, I have placed the command of that army in the hands of Chevalier de Levis, Maréchal des camps et armées de Roi. He loves the Canadians, possesses their confidence, that of the troops and of all the Indian Nations.

Finally, Sir, you will see that General's Manifesto. I have authorized him to order all the Canadians of your parish to join him on pain of death.

I assure the Canadians who will signalize themselves by brilliant actions, of distinguished rewards from the King, but I warn them beforehand that those who will have been, or will be traitors to their country, shall be punished with the severest rigor of the King's ordinances.

Now is the moment, Sir, when you can, as far as you are concerned, furnish conclusive proofs in favor of the King's service and of your love of country.

I shall seize with pleasure this occasion to procure for you his Majesty's favors.

I am, with respect,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

M. de Vaudreuil to the Captains of Militia.

Copy of the Circular letter written by the Marquis de Vaudreuil to the Captains of Militia of the parishes, North and South, within the government of Quebec.

Montreal, 16th April, 1760.

Sir,

Since the close of the last campaign, I have been seriously occupied by the situation to which the misfortunes of the war have reduced the Canadians of the government of Quebec.

I have been particularly alive to the threats General Murray has uttered in all his Manifestoes, the vexations he has exercised towards them and the harsh and cruel treatment he has made the greater portion of the Canadians undergo without any legitimate right or reason.

The sad state of these Canadians, the sentiments of zeal, which I know they entertain for the King's service, and their attachment to the country, all that has not a little contributed to increase the desire I have always felt to retake Quebec, and thereby to deliver the Canadians from the tyranny they have only too severely experienced.

'Tis with this view, Sir, that I have reassembled a very powerful army with a considerable train of artillery to besiege Quebec; nothing equals the ardor of the troops, Canadians and different Indian Nations I have destined for that expedition.

My presence being essentially necessary in this town, either to watch over the safety of our frontiers on Lakes Champlain and Ontario, or to reinforce the army, which is going to lay siege to Quebec, should the garrison of that town receive, contrary to my expectation, succors from Europe, I have placed the command of that army in the hands of Chevalier de Levis, Marshal of the camps and armies of the King, both on account of his love for everything Canadian, and of the confidence the latter, the troops and the Indian Nations equally repose in him.

This army is about to march and the town of Quebec will be soon invested.

'Tis my intention, Sir, that you, your officers, and all the Canadians of your company, march, with arms and baggage, on the receipt of this letter and of Chevalier de Levis' Manifesto, to join that General and his army. I have authorized him to give you that order on pain of death. I am fully convinced of your zeal to execute it, and that your courage will yield in nothing to that of the troops and Canadians of the army.

You have therein, Sir, as well as your Militia, a very particular interest; you have only too truly experienced the aversion of the English for everything Canadian; you have also had the saddest proofs of the severity of their government; whence you must conclude what will be your lot, should they have entire possession of Canada.

You approach the moment of triumph over that enemy; he cannot but succumb before the efforts of our army.

We, too, approach the moment of receiving powerful succors from France.

At length, brave Canadians, 'tis yours to signalize yourselves; you ought to undertake everything, risk everything for the preservation of your religion and the salvation of your country. The Canadians of this government and of that of Three Rivers are marching with zeal, and out of attachment and love for you. You ought to imitate them in every point; unite your efforts to theirs and even surpass them.

I guarantee to those among you who will furnish brilliant proofs of their zeal, signal rewards on the part of his Majesty. But, likewise, I cannot conceal from you that those who will have been or shall be traitors to the country, will be punished with the greatest rigor of his Majesty's ordinances.

I am, Sir, your affectionate servant,

Ordinance of the Governor-General of Canada, granting an Amnesty to Military Deserters.

PIERRE RIGAUD, Marquis de Vaudreuil, Grand Cross of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King in all New France, the territories and country of Louisiana.

After having maturely reflected on the circumstances of the Colony, the urgent necessity of augmenting our forces and weakening those of the enemy;

We have considered it for the good of the King's service, to make use of the authority granted by his Majesty in his ordinance of the 29th December, 1757, in favor not only of the soldiers of the troops of the Line and Marine, who have gone over to the service of the English, but also of the French, Germans and other Nations, subjects of the Kings or Sovereign Princes his Majesty's allies, who are actually in garrison at Quebec, in the confidence we feel that they have allowed themselves to be drawn in that bad course only by inconsiderateness and inexperience; that they are so much the more repentant, as they are suffering extreme destitution, and are fearful of being punished for their crimes after the surrender of the town of Quebec;

Convinced by these considerations, we design to make all those feel the effects of the King's clemency, and, in order to afford them the means, although the crime whereof they have fendered themselves guilty, is of the nature of those that ought to be the last pardoned;

We, in the name and at the pleasure of his Majesty, have quitted, remitted and pardoned, do quit, remit and pardon the crime of desertion, committed as well by the French and German soldiers, who have left the King's service or that of their Sovereigns, to enter into that of his Britannic Majesty, as by soldiers, whether French or belonging to other Nations, of the troops of the Line or Marine, who have passed also to the same service, notwithstanding that they actually are among the number of the troops composing the garrison of Quebec;

We do forbid all officers and other the King's subjects to molest them on account of the said crime of desertion;

On condition, always, that, on learning our present ordinance by notes, which will be introduced into the town of Quebec, they will join the army commanded by Chevalier de Levis, and will present themselves to him whilst he will be laying siege to that place, to be incorporated in his Majesty's troops, and continue to serve therein in their quality of soldiers, on pain, against those who will not present themselves within the said time, of being deprived of the present amnesty, and of being punished for their crime, according to his Majesty's ordinances;

We command Chevalier de Levis, Marshal of the King's camps and armies, Commander-in-Chief of the army destined to besiege Quebec, and all other officers whom it may concern, to see to the execution of the present ordinance, which shall be read, published and affixed in every place where necessary.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

Montreal, 3rd May, 1760.

My Lord,

Chevalier de Levis' army arrived on the 24th of last month at Point aux trembles with the Kings frigates and gabarrs, the ships and other vessels having on board the provisions, artillery, munitions of war, implements and field furniture.

Chevalier de Levis employed the entire of the day of the 25th to collect and regulate the order of march of his army in order to put it in motion on the 26th.

On the news he received at the Calvary that the enemy were fortifying themselves on the heights of Cap Rouge and on the bank of the river at the head of the three slopes (rampes) he determined to march by land, to ascend the River of Cap Rouge so as to deploy by la Suède.

'Twas 6 o'clock in the evening when the army commenced defiling, preceded by our Indians.

From the position of the English, there was reason to suppose that they were ignorant of Chevalier de Levis' taking that route, and that General Murray,<sup>1</sup> who, with 2,500 men, had repaired to the heights of St. Foi, was waiting for them there, but as soon as he had perceived the head of our army, composed of the Grenadiers and Indians, he made his retreat; abandoned two spiked 18-pounders at St. Foi, burned the church of that place in which was stored some powder, 1,500 muskets and a great quantity of provisions. We were able to overtake only the rear guard of the English which we pressed as far as Dumont's house, a short distance from the town. The English had several wounded; we had, on our side, one Indian killed, one Cavalry officer, one cavalier and three grenadiers wounded.

Were it not for a frightful storm which lasted 24 hours, Chevalier de Levis would have surprised the enemy, who were expecting us only by the river and Cap Rouge; he allowed our army very little rest; directed his main efforts to hem in the enemy in order not to lose a moment in opening the trench.

<sup>1</sup> General JAMES MURRAY was fifth son of the 4th Lord Elibank, in the peerage of Scotland. He was commissioned Lieutenant-Colonel of the 16th foot, 5th January, 1751. In 1757 he served with Wolfe in the expedition against Rochefort, and on the 5th January, 1758, was promoted to the rank of Colonel in America, on being ordered on the expedition against Louisbourg where he became Brigadier, being in command of the 2nd Brigade. He was junior Brigadier under Wolfe at Quebec in 1759, and commanded the 3d brigade; was in the battle of Abraham's Plains; was appointed Governor of Quebec on 23d October, 1759, and on the following day commissioned Colonel-Commandant of the 1st battalion of the 60th Royal American Regiment; Major-General 10th July, 1762, and Governor of the Province of Quebec 21st November, 1763. He administered that government until 1766, and showed himself a man of keen enquiry and observation, impartial, though of rather a hasty temper, and in December, 1767, was appointed Colonel of the 13th foot; Lieutenant-General 25th May, 1772; Lieutenant-Governor in 1774, of Minorca, of which Island he became Governor in 1778. He was advanced to the rank of General in 1783; appointed Governor of Hull in 1785; Colonel of the 21st Fusiliers 5th June, 1789, and died in June, 1794. — Ed.

28th M<sup>r</sup> Murray marched forth from Quebec with about 4,000 men, and placed himself in the order of battle at Dumont's house; our grenadiers occupied it and a height on the left, at the opening of the wood above the Foulon cove; our army was cantoned from La Fontaine's house to the St. Foi church. Chevalier de Levis mounted his horse at day-break with M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamaque, to go and reconnoitre the enemy. Seeing them in full march, he directed the générale to be beaten and gave orders for our army to march with the greatest diligence to support our grenadiers. He left M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamaque to command the van-guard and arrange the troops as they came up; he proceeded, in person, to La Fontaine's house to bring the army up in several columns; notwithstanding all his efforts, it could not be formed on the ground designated by M<sup>r</sup> de Levis for the field of battle, before the enemy took up a favorable position, and on the spot we proposed to occupy, our right only had time to form; M<sup>r</sup> de Levis, seeing that the left was still at a great distance and could not arrive before the enemy would have charged us, determined to make the right of our army fall back and enter the wood. The enemy advanced to fight us, in full battle array, with 22 pieces of artillery in front. Our grenadiers, who were at Dumont's house, were obliged to fall back on the brigade of La Sarre, which had just finished getting out (déboucher). M<sup>r</sup> de Levis ordered that brigade to march along the high road; to join the grenadiers and attack Dumont's house, which was in possession of the enemy. The grenadiers and that brigade advanced with the greatest courage. M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamaque went thither also, and our troops carried that house; Chevalier de Levis followed along the line to move it and get it out of the wood, to attack the enemy in front and on their right; they were then so near that they were firing grape at us and had the advantage of the height, which did not prevent the centre and right of our army defiling from the wood with three pieces of cannon, which composed our whole artillery, and to charge the enemy; the right and centre brigades marched with the greatest ardor and commenced to force the enemy. The Canadians of the brigade of La Reine; that of Royal Rousillon, and that of the Marine, took the enemy in flank and upset their left, which threw their right into confusion, forced them to retreat and to leave us 19 guns and 3 howitzers.

M<sup>r</sup> de Repentigny, who was at the head of the centre battalion and of the reserve from the town of Montreal, held and occupied with his sole brigade in open field, the centre of the army; he had the advantage of arresting the enemy's centre which was advancing with rapid strides, and to oblige it to resume its original position. This brigade had also the advantage of twice driving back two bodies of troops which detached themselves from the right to dislodge it, to stay, by its fire and bold bearing, the pursuit of the enemy, who were closely pressing on our left, which had almost entirely fallen back, and finally to procure for it an opportunity of rallying and recovering. In fine, this brigade was the only one on which the enemy did not gain an inch of ground.

Captain de Melois, adjutant of our troops attached to the brigade of the Marine, performed prodigies of valor; he would have carried off two standards from the enemy which they had left behind, had not false information persuaded him that those colors were already in the hands of the regiment of Guyenne.

Our army pursued the enemy up to the walls of Quebec, but was so fatigued that it could not profit by all its advantage, nor even make use of the bayonet.

The battle lasted three hours, and victory was long uncertain, but Chevalier de Levis, superior on account of his quick-sightedness, determined in the nick of time, to turn the enemy at the head of a column, and decided by that movement the victory in our favor; therefore, I can say, my Lord, that 'twas he alone who has won the battle. M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamaque also performed wonders; he was wounded in the calf of the leg and his horse was killed by the same discharge of grape.

The enemy left on the field of battle 3 @ 400 dead, 20 officers prisoners, Colonel Yonk is among the latter, and 50 @ 60 soldiers. M. de Levis estimates their loss at about 12 @ 1,500 men, killed or wounded. They admit this themselves, and that there are a great many officers.

Ours may consist nearly of an equal number, including 114 officers killed or wounded. I shall annex an exact return of them to the report I shall have the honor of rendering of the opening of the siege.

This day confers infinite honor on our troops and every corps of the army which equally distinguished themselves.

Chevalier de Levis took advantage of the ground the enemy had abandoned, to open the trenches that night.

The right of our army rested on the Butte à Neveu, and the left 40 or 50 toises beyond the Saint Louis road; this section in the progress of things will extend itself farther.

The enemy have lined their entire front with cannon, and are keeping up a great fire of artillery which carries off many of our men.

The Canadians from below Quebec were beginning to arrive. Chevalier de Levis has handed over the detail of these Militia to M<sup>r</sup> de Repentigny.

I greatly long, my Lord to have the honor to inform you of the fall of Quebec. The victory which Chevalier de Levis has just gained is a very good omen, provided always that the obstinate defence of the English do not give time to their reinforcements to arrive.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Journal of the Battle of Sillery and Siege of Quebec.

CANADA.

Narrative of the Expedition against Quebec, under the orders of Chevalier de Levis, Maréchal des Camps et Armées of the King.

[Annexed to the letter of Mr. de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of Canada, of the 3rd of May, 1760. General Memoirs.]

The want of provisions at the close of the last campaign had prevented the cantonment of troops in the neighborhood of Quebec, to blockade the English garrison during the winter, and deprive it of the means of drawing firewood and the necessary supplies from the neighboring parishes. The troops had to be put in quarters at the end of November in order to provide for their subsistence, and Chevalier de Levis in quitting the frontier of the district of Quebec, had confined himself to stationing a corps of about 400 men in the parish of Point aux trembles, 7 leagues from Quebec, under the command of Captain de Repentini of the Colonial troops. This officer threw out advanced posts as far as Saint Augustin, one league above the River Cap Rouge on which he sent frequent scouts. Our lines opposite the English garrison have been during the winter at this river which is three leagues from Quebec. The high road from Point aux trembles to Quebec crosses it at its mouth. A league farther, up it has bridges connecting with a road back from the river.

A fort constructed at the close of the campaign, at the mouth of the River Jacques Cartier, ten leagues above Quebec, served as a retreat and a point d'appui to the troops of Point aux trembles and protected the Colony against any efforts the English garrison might make. The command of this fort and of the entire frontier during the winter, was conferred by the Marquis de Vaudreuil on Sieur Dumas, Major-General<sup>1</sup> and Inspector of the troops of the country.

Brigadier-General Murray, Governor of Quebec, posted on his part, 150 men in the church of St. Foix, a league and a half from Quebec on the high road to Point aux trembles. He placed a similar detachment in the church of Antient Lorette, one league from the St. Foix, back from the River (St. Lawrence) and on the road which goes up the River Cap Rouge. These two churches were intrenched and palisaded.

The English army on Lake Champlain commanded by Major-General Hamherst on falling back the 20th November, left a considerable garrison at Saint Frederic, where it had built, since August, a much more extensive fort than the one we had previously there. Garrisons had been left also at Carillon, Fort George, Fort Lidius and in those on the River of Orange. On our side, Brigadier de Bourlamaque in withdrawing the troops on that frontier on the 28th of November, had orders to leave 300 men under the command of Captain de Lusignan of the troops of the Marine, in garrison in a stockaded fort constructed at the close of the campaign in the centre of the intrenchments of Isle aux Noix. Fort Saint John, five leagues in the rear, was guarded by 200 men under the orders of Captain Valette of the Royal Rousillon. Lieutenant-Colonel Roquemaure, commanding the battalion of La Reine, who was quartered at Fort Chambly, had the chief command of that frontier during the winter.

Towards Lake Ontario, Sieur Desandrouins was left with 200 men in a fort which Chevalier de Levis had caused to be built in the month of September, on one of the Islands of the Clapides,<sup>2</sup> and which had been called after him.

The English army, commanded by Brigadier Gage, since the capture of Niagara, had quitted the camp of Chouïguen early, and had left a garrison in a fort it had just constructed there, and another in that of Niagara.

Such was the situation of the Colony on the first of December; all the provisions exhausted by a very long campaign, scarcely left means for a daily supply of food to the small garrisons which protected the country; and no new supplies could be expected before the farmers had threshed the grain of the last harvest.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil adopted, in concert with Chevalier de Levis, the resolution to lay siege to Quebec in the spring because he judged there was no other means of preserving Canada, this year, to his Majesty; he calculated, besides, should circumstances prevent his taking Quebec for want of ammunition, that the two ships which the contractor had demanded, and the despatch whereof M. de Vaudreuil had solicited, would furnish him some supplies in case relief on the part of the King should fail. With this view, he considered it his duty to harass the English garrison during the winter by false alarms, and to that end made all the preparations for a winter campaign. Ladders were constructed at Jacques Cartier; orders issued to the troops to be prepared to march; Colonel de Bougainville and Brigadier Bourlamaque were sent in succession to the frontier, to annoy the English governor who, in fact, made his troops perform the most rigorous service, and kept them excessively alert.

Towards the end of January the Marquis de Vaudreuil, knowing that some grain and cattle were remaining in the lower parishes on the South shore, detached Captain de Saint Martin, of the Colonials, with 200 men, to take up a position at Point Levis, opposite Quebec, and secure the passage of the trains which were to travel by land along the bank of the river until opposite Point aux trembles. But the river becoming frozen over at the moment of his arrival, formed a very solid bridge between the town and Point Levis, over which the English Governor dispatched a very superior detachment whereby Sieur de Saint Martin was obliged to retire. The English immediately sent to remove from the parishes the provisions intended for us, and took post in the church of Point Levis.

Sieur Saint Martin's detachment having been augmented to the number of 700 men, that officer was ordered to take up a position again at Point Levis, but three thousand English having crossed the river with cannon, he was once more obliged to fall back with the loss of 30 men. Sieur de Bourlamaque, arriving the day after that event at Point aux trembles, considered the project of getting the provisions past impossible of execution, and confined himself to sending into the parishes which the English had not exhausted, 150 men under the orders of Sieur Hertel, an officer of the Colonials, to prevent the English pushing their levies farther, and to secure the provisions until the troops would arrive before Quebec.

The remainder of the winter was spent in different alerts, which the report of an expedition on the ice had given to the English garrison, and in some sorties made by the latter against our advanced posts, in one of which we lost 60 men; the other frontiers were quiet.

'Twas only with incredible difficulty that the troops were finally put in a condition to make the campaign. The Colony, utterly exhausted, was in want not only of provisions, but likewise of every necessary for the equipment and encampment of the troops. Nothing less than the activity and resources of Sieur Bigot, the Intendant of New France, was required to find means to meet such essential wants.

Men were set to work in the very first days of March at Point aux trembles and the adjoining parishes, to make the gabions, fascines and boards necessary for the siege.

In the beginning of April, the Marquis de Vaudreuil detached Sieur de Bougainville to Ile aux Noix to take the command of that frontier, where the enemy, 'twas apprehended, would make some movements, were he to learn what we were projecting. This officer reunited the garrison of Saint John to that of Isle aux Noix, and the necessary orders were issued to furnish him a considerable reinforcement of Militia as soon as he should receive intelligence of the enemy's approach. Sieur Desandrouins, Engineer, was recalled from Fort Levis and replaced with some reinforcements by Captain Pouchot, of the Béarn regiment.

Chevalier de Levis had the command of the troops destined to besiege Quebec. The Marquis de Vaudreuil confided that expedition to him, being obliged to remain at Montreal, where his presence was necessary to the dispatching to the various frontiers the succors they might require.

On the 20th of April these troops left their quarters; they consisted of 8 battalions of troops of the Line, 2 battalions of Colonials, amounting in all to 5 brigades and about 3,000 Canadians, both from the town of Montreal and the country. The former composed a separate battalion, destined to be in reserve, and the others were attached to the brigades of the regular troops. The King's frigates la Tulante and la Pomone, commanded by Mess<sup>rs</sup> Vaucelain and Sauvage, had orders to drop down the river in a line with the army; they had under their escort two flyboats and several schooners, loaded with artillery, provisions and fascines.

The most of the streams having not yet broken up, 'twas the 24th before the troops were able to arrive at Point aux trembles, which was the rendezvous of the little army; they were even obliged to disembark on the ice, which had as yet left only the middle of the river free.

Chevalier de Levis learned there that the English continued to occupy the churches of Ancient Lorette and Saint Foix; that they were intrenching themselves at the River Cap Rouge, the banks of which, being very steep on the enemy's side, afforded the means of defending with advantage the high road from Point aux trembles to Quebec, which crosses that river at its mouth.

He learned, also, that the inhabitants of Quebec had within two days been driven out of that place; that those of St. Foix, adjoining Cap Rouge, had also been driven from their houses, which the English were crenating and transporting artillery into.

This intelligence led him to understand that the English had been informed of the departure of the troops, and induced him to abandon the project he entertained up to that time, of landing in the night at Sillery, which is only a league and a half from Quebec. This manœuvre would have afforded him the means of cutting off the posts at Lorette and St. Foix, but it became impracticable as soon as the enemy had cognizance of our movement. It was impossible also to land in the River Cap Rouge, as the English were occupying the heights commanding its mouth.

He therefore determined to disembark all the troops at St. Augustin, one league above Cap Rouge, and then to march to the left to reach the upper bridges of the Cap Rouge river, and to turn the enemy by following the road leading to the church of Ancient Lorette, and thence to that of St. Foix across some almost impassable woods and marshes.

The 25th was employed in concentrating the troops and putting the Canadians in order.

26th Ten companies of grenadiers, some volunteers and 300 Indians, commanded by Captain Saint Luc, of the Colonials, were detached to form the van-guard under the orders of Sieur de Bourlamaque. That officer was instructed to reconnoitre the bridges on the River Cap Rouge; the enemy having destroyed the two principal ones, he had had two others higher up repaired and crossed the river with the van-guard.

Chevalier de Levis immediately arrived with the head of the army, and learned that the English had abandoned the church of Lorette and neglected to tear up a corduroy road across part of a very deep marsh, between that church and the one of St. Foix, and had postponed that operation until next night.

He immediately dispatched the Indians to occupy the head of that road, and having given orders to the van-guard to support them, commenced crossing the army over the two bridges.

Sieur de Bourlamaque arrived in the beginning of the night at the entrance of the marsh, which the Indians had already crossed, and having traversed it despite a severe storm, placed the entire van-guard in some houses beyond, being separated from the enemy only by a wood of about half a league in depth. Chevalier de Levis having pushed the van-guard at day-break as far as the edge of this wood, within sight of the enemy, set about reconnoitering their position, with Sieur de Bourlamaque. He had given orders at the same time to the remainder of the troops, who had marched the whole night, to cross the marsh and to form in the rear of the wood.

At about 200 toises from, and almost parallel with the river<sup>1</sup> of this wood is a ridge bordered by settlements; it terminates on one side at the height over the mouth of the River Cap Rouge, and extends on the other, to Quebec, where it takes the name of Côte d'Abraham.<sup>2</sup>

At six o'clock in the morning, the English appeared in order of battle, to the number of about 300 men, on the top of this hill, facing the road on which we were marching, the right on the church of St. Foix, several houses on their left and some in front of their lines; they had lodged some troops in the one and the other and some pieces of cannon in their front.

The wood that covered us, being swampy and impassable, we could defile only by the main road, and not having room enough to form between the wood and the English, 'twas not possible to march against them in front, without being exposed to a disadvantageous fight.

Chevalier de Levis thereupon adopted the resolution to wait until night to defile and gain the enemy's left flank, by marching to his own right and following the edge of the wood until past his front. This manœuvre enabled him to attack the English with advantage at daybreak and to cut off the Light Infantry that were thrown into the houses towards Cap Rouge; he calculated on taking with him three field pieces, which had accompanied the troops with incredible difficulty.

The morning passed in some firing and volleys of artillery discharged by the enemy at the van-guard.

At one o'clock in the afternoon, the English having collected in the church of St. Foix, all the provisions, ammunition, arms and tools they had brought with them for the defence of that quarter, set fire to the church, and retired towards Quebec, having, however, left a corps in the order of battle on the height to mask their movements; they abandoned some guns which they could not carry off.

The storm that had prevailed through the whole of the preceding night, had retarded, some hours, the march of the troops and rendered it impossible for Chevalier de Levis to defile on the church of St. Foix at daylight, as he intended. This mischance gave the English time to come in force to mask the high road and saved their detachments towards Cap Rouge.

Another accident had furnished them complete knowledge of our movement. A part of the ice that lined the river having broken loose on the morning of the 26th, carried away some bateaux loaded with artillery, a few of which were submerged; some of the gunners perished and one of them floated on a cake of ice as far as Quebec; the English Governor having learned from him our movements at the marsh, made his arrangements against being surprised.

As soon as the retreat of the English had been ascertained, the troops advanced; the van-guard was in close pursuit of the fugitives; Sieur de la Roche Beaucourt at the head of one hundred mounted volunteers, having overtaken their rear, skirmished with them until night fall, and one officer and several volunteers were wounded.

<sup>2</sup> This hill and the celebrated Plains of the same name, outside Quebec, are called after one Abraham Martin, a pilot, who was proprietor of a farm in the immediate vicinity. Ferland's Notes sur les Registres de Notre Dame de Quebec, pp. 12, 13; Boston Historical Magazine, 1., 118. — Ed.

The enemy made a stand at Dumont's house and on the adjoining heights about half a league from Quebec, where they left a strong detachment; the remainder of the garrison returned to town, our van-guard occupied the houses on this side, and the brigades placed themselves in the succeeding houses as far as the church of Saint Foix, Chevalier de Levis having judged it indispensable to give some repose to the troops after two days' very fatiguing march, the ground, moreover, being covered with snow and overflown.

In Canada, the houses in most of the country parishes, do not stand together as in Europe; they are built along rivers or high roads, at a distance of one hundred to three hundred toises, one from the other; unenclosed, without hedges or groves. Each house is isolated, having near it only the barn, equally isolated; thus, from the Church of Saint Foix to the houses occupied by the van-guard, the little army covered a space of a league and a quarter.

The English detachment abandoned, during the night, Dumont's house and the heights where it had halted on the preceding evening, and fell back on the Butte à Neveu, about 250 toises from the walls of Quebec, which that Butte entirely covers, and set about intrenching themselves there. The van-guard was posted in Dumont's house, and on the heights in front of the Butte à Neveu. These heights incline somewhat towards the right and communicate with some open woods bordering on the River Saint Lawrence at that place. A redoubt touching the wood, supported our right and covered Foulon cove, where we were to have brought the vessels, loaded with provisions and artillery, as well as the baggage of the troops.

Chevalier de Levis had determined on employing the day of the 25th in landing the provisions which were due, some field pieces which could not come by land and in resting the troops, having resolved to attack the heights next morning and to drive the English into the town.

But, at 8 o'clock in the morning, they were seen issuing from Quebec; they appeared disposed to march against us, and formed in front of the heights which they occupied.

Chevalier de Levis, who was occupied with Sieur de Bourlamaque since the break of day, in reconnoitering their position, immediately gave orders to Chevalier de Montreuil, Adjutant-General, to make all the troops advance; the van-guard continued, meanwhile, to occupy the redoubt on the right, the heights in the centre and Dumont's house, which is on the slope of Côte d'Abraham and supported the left of the line that, the troops were to form. The open woods on our right happened to be in the rear of the centre, a short distance from our line, whence they extended, retiring very precipitously nearly to La Fontaine's house, where the troops were to defile. This house, situate near the declivity of Côte d'Abraham, was separated from Dumont's by a plain, 250 toises<sup>1</sup> in length.

The brigades formed into line according as they came up, and the three on the right were already formed, when Chevalier de Levis, seeing that the right of the English was moving, and that their artillery was beginning a heavy cannonade, concluded he would not have time to put his left in order to receive them; he resolved on throwing the troops who were in line a little in the rear, so as to place them under cover of the wood, and to have Dumont's house abandoned; he calculated on putting the left in La Fontaine's, and in that position allow the troops time to breathe, and to dispose them for marching afterwards against the enemy. But the courage of the troops did not allow him time to do so; he had stationed Sieur de Bourlamaque on the left to execute that movement, who, on countermarching the grenadier companies that were occupying Dumont's house, was wounded, and obliged to retire. The brigades of the left, having been a few moments without receiving any orders, took upon themselves to go and join the grenadiers, and to carry the house they had abandoned; they moved under the most murderous fire of artillery and musketry, and without being formed. Chevalier de Levis who, from the heights of the centre, perceived their movements, judged it necessary to take advantage of this ardor, and hastened to order the brigadier<sup>1</sup> on the right to march against the enemy with fixed bayonets. He returned then to give the same order to the left. The manœuvre on the right turned the enemy's left, and perfectly seconded the effect of ours, who, notwithstanding the fire of twenty pieces of cannon and two howitzers directed almost exclusively on that quarter, maintained themselves first at Dumont's house and afterwards by favor of the movements on the right, pressed the enemy in front of them, who were driven inside the walls of Quebec, and lost the ground they occupied in the morning and the entire of their artillery.

The bravery of the troops and the movements of the right, which Chevalier de Levis ordered at the proper time, have repaired the prodigious disadvantages of having arrived too late, and of being obliged to form under a very superior fire of artillery.

Lieutenant-Colonel d'Alquier, commanding the brigade of La Sarre, composed of that and the Bearn battalions, and Lieutenant-Colonel Poularies, commanding the Royal Rousillon brigade, which was composed of that and the Guienne battalions, have greatly contributed to this success, the former by taking the resolution to march on Dumont's house, although in great disorder and wounded in that movement, and the second, by charging the enemy's left with signal bravery and intelligence.

The brigade of Berry and that of the Colonials, which joined that of La Sarre, seconded with the greatest courage the decisive movement of that brigade. The former was under the orders of Lieutenant-Colonel Trivio, who was slightly wounded on that occasion; the second, under Sieur Dumas' orders. Lieutenant-Colonel Trecesson, commanding the second battalion of the regiment of Berri, was mortally wounded there. Chevalier de la Corne and Sieur de Vassan, each commanding a battalion of Colonials, have distinguished themselves, and were both slightly wounded.

An order incorrectly delivered by an officer who has been afterwards killed, was the cause of the Brigade of La Reine, composed of that and of the Languedoc battalions, not having had as great a share in that movement as it ought.

The battalion of the Town of Montreal, under the orders of Sieur de Repentini displayed equal courage with the Regulars. The same eulogium is due to the greater part of the Canadians, particularly those attached to the brigade of La Reine. Sieur de Roquemaure had thrown Sieur Delâs, who commanded them, into the redoubt and wood on the right; the superior fire of the enemy dislodged him after awhile, but he soon recovered his ground and afterwards successfully charged the enemy's left flank, being seconded in that manœuvre by Sieur de Saint Luc who could induce only a small number of Indians to follow him.

The three little field pieces which had accompanied the army, under the orders of Captain de Lovicourt and Lieutenant Duverny of the Royal corps of artillery, did not cease firing on the English troops during the action, and have been a great assistance. Our loss has been considerable, especially in officers. The battalions of La Sarre and Bearn, who were on the left, as well as those of Berri and of the Marine, have suffered considerably. The grenadiers have been reduced to a very small number, chiefly the five companies of the left, commanded by Captain d'Aiguebelle of those of Languedoc, as they remained exposed to the hottest fire, whilst waiting the arrival of the troops.

Chevalier de Levis has been sufficiently fortunate to escape without a wound, although on horseback throughout the entire of the action, between the fire of the enemy and that of our troops. He has been very well aided in the movements he ordered the latter to make, by Chevalier de Montreuil, Adjutant-General, and by Adjutant Delapause of the regiment of Guienne, acting assistant Quartermaster-General of the army.

The loss of the enemy, notwithstanding the advantage of their position and that of their artillery, has been more considerable than ours; we took twenty pieces of cannon from them, 2 howitzers and a great number of tools. It appears that in coming to form in front of the heights which they were occupying, their intention was only to work under cover of their lines and guns, in intrenching themselves on the heights before Quebec, in order to keep us at a distance from the heart of the place; but when they saw the grenadiers and the first brigades fall back some steps, they looked on the movement which was ordered as involuntary and believed they ought to advance so as to profit by the disorder in which they supposed we had fallen.

The siege of Quebec, which appeared almost impossible before the battle, owing to our situation and resources, commenced to appear probable when the enemy was pent up in the place.

Quebec forms a species of triangle, which occupies a very high point of land on the left bank of the river Saint Lawrence. The river defends one of its two sides which run inland; that following the escarpment of the Côte d'Abraham commands with great superiority a low flat, through which the River St. Charles winds. This Côte d'Abraham runs almost parallel with the River St. Lawrence and rejoins it at the mouth of the River Cap Rouge. The Quebec side which is bounded by that Côte and by the escarpment of the river, is alone accessible; it is defended by an enceinte of six bastions, faced (revêtus) and almost on a straight line. A shallow ditch, the depth of which in some places is only 5 or 6 feet, some earth collected on the counterscarp, and 6 or 7 wooden redoubts constructed by the English, protected that enceinte, the extent of which, from the River (St. Lawrence) to the Côte d'Abraham, is only about 6 or 700 toises. The ground is solid rock, which becomes almost bare in approaching the body of the place.

The ramparts of Quebec are visible from the heights which the English abandoned. Chevalier de Lévis hastened to occupy them, and Sieur de Pontleroy, engineer in chief of New France, having reconnoitered the place with Captain de Montbeillard, of the Royal Artillery and commanding that of Canada, 'twas decided to begin by a parallel [from] the heights which are in front of the bastions of Saint Louis, of the Glacière and of Cape Diamond, and to erect batteries there, which, 'twas hoped, were capable of making a breach, although the distance was 250 toises. The revêtement was badly constructed at that point.

Up to the 11th of May, day and night were employed in perfecting the parallel and building 3 batteries. One of six guns battered somewhat slantingly the face and right flank of the bastion of the Glacière, another of 4 guns placed to the left, battered directly that same spot and crossed with the first: the 3rd of three guns was directed against the flank of the Saint Louis bastion, opposite the Glacière bastion; to these were added a battery of 2 mortars.

A battery of 4 guns was erected also on the left bank of the Little River Saint Charles, whence the fronts attacked would be seen in reverse; 'twas expected to annoy the besieged on their ramparts from that point, although the distance was very considerable.

The parallels and batteries could not be finished except after incredible difficulties; the work was all rock. The earth had to be brought a very great distance in sacks. The enemy soon had 60 cannon unmasked on the attacked fronts. This artillery, served with the greatest activity, not only retarded the construction of the batteries, but also prevented the workmen transporting material; the balls plunging behind the heights, left no spot protected. The troops were even obliged several times to decamp.

Finally, on the 11th of May, the batteries opened, and notwithstanding the great superiority of those of the English, would have been successful in their fire had our little artillery been of a better quality. 'Twas composed of 6 iron 15 and 12-pounders, only one 24, and although the best in the Colony had been selected, the most of the guns were, on the second day unfit for service, and the remainder soon threatened to be in the same state.

Chevalier de Lévis, under these circumstances and in order not to find himself uselessly deprived of ammunition, resolved to reduce the fire of the batteries to 20 shots each in 24 hours, and to remain in that situation until the arrival of the ships, hoping that the Court would, before long, send by the river some succors in artillery and provisions, which would enable him to terminate the siege of Quebec in a few days, as their passage, besides, was rendered quite easy in consequence of the position assumed in front of that place.

An English frigate arrived on the 9th before Quebec and brought the Governor some London newspapers which he took occasion to communicate to Chevalier de Lévis, who found only vague and uninteresting news in them.

Of the two frigates which had wintered at Quebec, one had got ready to sail on the first of May, and dropped down the river without her destination being ascertained; 'twas conjectured however, that she had left for Europe; the second had her guns on board and appeared soon ready to join the one that had just arrived.

15th At ten o'clock at night, Chevalier de Lévis learned that two men-of-war, suspected to be English, had just anchored at the end of the Island of Orleans. He did not hesitate to bethink him of retreating, being well assured that Pattalante and la pomone illy equipped, without guns and men, were not in a condition to resist the enemy's vessels and protect our transports having our provisions on board.

He immediately sent orders to these vessels to reascend the river to a place of safety. This order was conveyed and executed too late in consequence of bad weather, the river having been agitated in an extraordinary manner the whole night; he also ordered the removal of all the guns from the batteries and their transportation to the Côte du Foulon, where they arrived at 7 o'clock in the morning.

At day-break an English ship of the line and two frigates got under weigh and fell in the twinkling of an eye on our frigates, which were obliged to retreat. La Pomone ran aground in front of Sillery. Sieur Vauclain, commanding L'atalante, seeing that the transports were going to be overhauled, signaled to them to run ashore at the mouth of the River Cap Rouge. He was himself obliged to do the same 4 leagues higher up, opposite Point aux trembles, where he was exposed, during two hours, to the fire of the two English frigates, and having expended all his ammunition and seriously damaged the enemy's ships, was taken prisoner without having removed the King's flag; almost all his officers were killed or wounded, as well as a great number of his men.

The vessel that sailed from Quebec with the two frigates anchored before the Foulon cove, and cannonaded our bateaux so vigorously, that 'twas impossible to put our siege train on board; only our ammunition could be saved; some officers were obliged to abandon their baggage.

16th The troops remained in the same position the whole day; at 9 o'clock at night, Chevalier de Lévis ordered the trenches to be evacuated, and fell back in good order with the light artillery as far as the River Cap Rouge, which he crossed on the morning of the 17th. He employed that and the following days in discharging the fly-boats and vessels that were stranded, and getting the provisions and ammunition out of them. The fly-boat la Marie, commanded by Sieur Cornille, being found serviceable, went up the river, having passed under the English frigates in the night; all the other craft were burned.

19th News received of the arrival of 8 or 10 vessels in the port of Quebec, determined him to retire behind the River Jacques Cartier, which the troops crossed on the morning of the 20th, a corps of 400 men being left at Point aux trembles.

The wind from the northeast, which prevailed since the 10th of May, became so violent during the 4 days employed in getting back the provisions and ammunition, that a great number of bateaux were lost; several of those which were conveying the baggage of the troops shared the same fate. One of the frigates that fought l'Attalante, having dragged her anchors the day after the engagement, was also lost in an instant.

'Twas never expected, when leaving Montreal, that we could take Quebec with the mere resources the country was able to furnish, as that town was provided with an immense artillery and guarded by a numerous garrison, composed of good troops, under an active and experienced chief. The plan was to confine that garrison within the walls of the town sufficiently early, to deprive it of the power of constructing external works before the fronts which have been attacked, and to wait under cover of the first approaches until the arrival of the reinforcements demanded from France should enable us to continue the siege. One single French flag would have been sufficient to produce that effect.

The victory of the 28th might have afforded hopes of more prompt success, had the artillery been in a condition to produce the effect expected; the bad quality of the guns has prevented us profiting by the good dispositions of the troops, which were impatiently waiting the opening of the breach; and the want of all reinforcements from Europe has at length forced Chevalier de Levis to retire, as it was impossible for him, in a country where transportation was impracticable, except by water, to remain in the position he occupied, without the aid of the river, even though the enemy would not have had any troops by land to oppose him.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

Montreal, 24th June, 1760.

My Lord,

The enemy's movements along the lakes were yet very unquieted, and M. de Vaudreuil had adopted all the precautions which depended on him.

I have paid particular attention to the Lake Ontario quarter.

M. Desandrouins, to whom I had entrusted the command of Fort Levis, has perfectly acquitted himself thereof up to the beginning of the month of April, when I recalled him to make the campaign of Quebec.

I destined M. Pouchot, Captain in the regiment of Béarn, to replace him, as this officer combined within himself the qualities of a good Engineer, and had acquired experience in managing the Indian Nations.

Although reduced to a very feeble garrison, he nevertheless performed all the work I could expect from his zeal.

He has constantly parties of Indians of La Présentation or of Mississagués.

He has also Indians who, under divers pretexts, go to Chouguin to obtain intelligence for him.

Here is what these Indians have reported to him of interest :

The Commandant of Chouguin represented his garrison to consist of 2,000 men ; yet, our Indians saw that it had not augmented since the fall.

They perceived that refreshments were very scarce, especially rice and sugar, but goods were not very dear ; two beavers procured a French blanket, or two dollars.

The shrewdest Indians perceived that there were only 3 @ 400 men in the fort ; they could never count more than ten officers.

In the forepart of May a 20 gun-brig, built at Niagara, arrived at Chouguin.

One of M. Pouchot's parties took on the 12th of May three Englishmen in the neighborhood of Chouguin.<sup>1</sup>

The previous and subsequent parties could not have the same success ; the former gave up in consequence of the great quantity of brandy they fell in with on the route ; the others were unable to get any prisoners as the English did not send men abroad (à la grande terre), except rarely and with great precaution.

Those prisoners have reported that the vessel from Niagara was loaded with artillery, warlike stores, and was to cruise on the lake.

That there was no army in the direction of Carillon ; that all the forces were to come by Lake Ontario ;

That they have heard that an army of 20,000 men were to arrive at Chouguin at the end of May, commanded by General Amherst, that it was to pass by fort Levis ; nevertheless, an Indian assures that the Commandant of Chouguin had told him that there was question only of 9,000 men, 3,000 of whom were to come from Orange, 3,000 from Niagara, and 3,000 who were at Chouguin.

These prisoners have added that there was cannon at the Little Fall,<sup>2</sup> but that the bateaux were too large to pass in the river ;

That they were obliged to build others ;

That there was no army in the direction of Carillon ; that all the forces were to come by Lake Ontario ;

That 700 bateaux were built at Corlac, capable of carrying 22 men on the lake.

20th May. Some Indians have stated that there were one thousand men and 200 bateaux at Chouguin.

Other Indians who left that post on the 27th of May, have learned from the 5 Nations, that the army were beginning to muster at Fort Steniz ;<sup>3</sup> that there were to be three columns of equal force under three chiefs ;

That each column would be as strong as that which was last year at Niagara; that one was to land above the Galops, the other come to Fort Levis, and the third to La Présentation.

Another Indian reports that 300 English had arrived the evening before his departure from Chouaguin.

That another party had arrived next day, some of whom entered the fort and others encamped;

That there were some Militia, a battalion of Regulars and some Morargans.<sup>1</sup>

The provisions were in course of conveyance across Oneida Lake.

According to certain Indians, the plan of the English is to come and encamp around Fort Levis and to send all the Indians along the river to cut off the communication with that post. These same Indians say, that it is Colonel Johnson and Colonel Broastrekk<sup>2</sup> who are to command the army.

Our two corvettes are armed in the best manner possible; they are cruising in the environs of Chouaguin and present a bold front.

They will fight until sunk, if necessary. Should they find an opportunity they will attack the English craft; though superior in artillery, it may be weaker in the timbers than ours.

M. Pouchot's forces, including the crews of our corvettes, consist of only 316 men.

There are some Jacobites whereof he will make use especially after the second vessel will have joined the first.

You see, my Lord, how greatly the Indians and prisoners contradict each other in their reports. I conclude, from this, that the movements of the English on Lake Ontario have been, up to the present time, as undecided as those on Lake Champlain. Nevertheless, they cannot fail to come to light. I have adopted every means possible to be informed of them more particularly than I have yet been. I have made, beforehand, the best arrangements to stop the enemy's progress. I have lost no time in communicating to M. Pouchot the plan of attack by the upper part of the river, drawn up by M. Montrezord, Chief Engineer of the department of New-York, which you transmitted to me in your letter of the 14th April, 1759, in order that he may ascertain if the plan for this campaign be the same.

I beg you, my Lord, to have the goodness to assure his Majesty that I will exhaust the very last resources of the Colony, and that, in this quarter as in all others, there is no effort I will not make to prevent the English penetrating as far as Montreal.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Obedient servant,
(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

Montreal, 24th June, 1760.

My Lord,

Condition of the French towards the Beautiful river and the Illinois.

I have the honor to render you an account of the news I have received from M. de MacCarty, Commandant of Fort Chartres.

He observes to me that his garrison is weaker than it ever has been. In fact, the check at Niagara has cost him the élite of his men.

He informs me that the English were noting down the islands and the rivers which disembogue into that of the Cherakis.

In the last days of the month of June of the last year, five Chaouinons of Charretier's band, came to him and told him there were forty of their cabins in the river coming to ask him for a piece of ground, as their's was not good. M. de MacCarty sent some provisions to those Indians whom he placed near Fort Massiac; they were more useful and less dangerous there, than when collected together at Souyote.<sup>1</sup>

They have taken, at different times, four prisoners, ten scalps, but being menaced by a strong party of the enemy, they have abandoned Fort Massiac in the beginning of October, and retired towards the Illinois and previously to settling there, were waiting for news from the Chaouinons, who are at Souyote, and of what was going on at the Beautiful river.

An English prisoner reported to M. de MacCarty, that they were fortifying Carleston, which is at the confluence of two rivers; that a canal was in the course of cutting, to surround the town with water, that barracks were building there through fear of a war with Spain.

The Cherakis persevered, at least for the most part, in the desire of joining the French, it would not be difficult to attract them among the Chaouinons, if we could supply their wants.

The English being vigilant, profit by our scarcity of goods. They have invited the Illinois Nations to go to trade at The Rock.

M. de MacCarty having no traders, fears that those Nations, notwithstanding their good dispositions, will repair to the English and introduce messages into all their villages.

M. de MacCarty writes me on the 12th of April last, that the English having had wagon loads of tar and tow conveyed to Pittsburgh, where they were building bateaux, he has caused Fort Massiac to be terraced, fraized and fortified, piece upon piece, with a good ditch.

That the fort he has built at Kaskakiés is up to the parapet; that he has made all the arrangements he has considered necessary, according to his strength, to receive the enemy.

I have strongly recommended him to be on his guard. M. de Noyan de Villers, who has been to relieve him, will be very vigilant. I would not be surprised if the English made some movements in that quarter, for, according to the English gazettes, there is a rumor of a powerful armament against Louisiana, and according to the intercepted letters, General Monkton<sup>2</sup> has proceeded against the Beautiful river.

I am, with most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

I have neglected nothing to sound the interior of the 5 Yrokoise Nations, to penetrate their dispositions, to endeavor to divide them and to induce them to remain neutral.

At the close of last fall, I secretly formed an embassy from 20 different Indian Nations, which went to the 5 Yrokoise Nations to remind them of their ancient union, their close attachment to the French, their firm resolution to die before them, to reunite and wage a perpetual war against any nation that may join their enemies.

Those Nations did not dissemble how much they felt at the affair of Niagara, that they have would already taken revenge for it, had I not persuaded them that the 5 Nations had been constrained thereto, but that if such a thing should recur, nothing would be capable of stopping them.

They repeated to the Yroquois that the design of the English was to destroy them all, that at least, in a short time, the English would sue for peace from the French, and then the 5 Nations would fall a prey to the resentment and fury of all the Nations.

These ambassadors acquitted themselves of their mission, but the 5 Nations asked to confer thereupon with Colonel Johnson, who advised them to report; that all the Nations were to assemble in council at the village of the Montagués,<sup>1</sup> the place of their ancient council fire.

This Colonel, feeling uneasy regarding this negotiation, demanded of the 5 Nations all the English blood they might have in their power, otherwise they would be sorry for it.

The Cayugas sent word to their warriors to hide their axe until the middle of summer, in order to be able to speak of good business; they were to invite the other villages to do the same.

'Twould appear that the 5 Nations are devoted to the English, inasmuch as they are unwilling to do anything without the consent of Colonel Johnson. Meanwhile, if certain reports be true, they are resolved to let the English fight alone this campaign, but I have taken care not to trust them.

I have still other negotiations in progress; am getting the Indians of La Présentation particularly to act; they are relatives and allies of the 5 Yrokoise Nations.

I am on the eve of ascertaining what course they will pursue. I am far, my Lord, from daring to flatter myself that it will answer my desires.

I will do my best, and shall be agreeably surprised if they remain as quiet this campaign as they have last winter.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

Montreal, 24th June, 1760.

My Lord,

All the garrisons belonging to our posts on the Beautiful river are retiring to Detroit with as much provisions, artillery, ammunition and merchandise as they can stow away in the bateaux; the surplus was given to the Indians.

The domiciliated Mississagués of Presqu'isle followed the French to Detroit.

All the Nations of the Beautiful river witnessed with sorrow the departure of the French. Chevalier de Portneuf sent them a message, especially to the Chaouoinons, to engage them to persevere in their good dispositions.

M<sup>r</sup> Hertel, whom I had stationed at Sonyoto, has kept his ground. He learned from prisoners who had been brought to him from Carolina, that the English had no other Nations than the Catabas and Taskarorins; that the [Flat] heads were at war with them; that, insensibly, all the Southern Nations, except that of the Dog (du chien), had declared against them, and had already laid waste Virginia and Carolina to an astonishing degree; that the English papers are giving the most touching account thereof, and announce the departure of considerable forces for the relief of those two provinces.

All those Tribes have adopted the messages I have transmitted to all our Nations, South and North, which have had a good effect. None are in favor of the French;<sup>1</sup> nevertheless, an immense number of English Belts have been distributed this winter among those Nations, and I cannot guarantee that our misfortunes, the threats and promises of the English, have not made an impression on them.

The Nations of Detroit, with a very good grace, have taken charge of a certain number of Frenchmen whom they have supported in their winter camp by hunting.

Sieur de Richarville, whom M. de Belèvre had sent with some Sauteux to the neighborhood of Niagara, killed an Englishman close to the fort, not being able to get near enough to catch him.

Another party, commanded by Sieur de Quindre, killed three Englishmen at the mouth of the Chenandas.<sup>2</sup>

A party of Hurons was surprised at the mouth of the Niagara river; one man was killed and six wounded.

The English have not rebuilt the little fort at Niagara; they have only repaired the large fort; more than three-quarters of the garrison have died this winter; it has been reinforced this spring.

The English were busy building a terrace fort at Old Fort Duquesne, and cutting a ditch 50 feet wide through Mallangueulée Point; they will not furnish any more powder to the Chaouoinons, whose squaws hitherto had pretty easily obtained whatever they wanted, whilst waging war against them.

M. de Belèvre is preparing to receive the English who, I think, are not going to Detroit; it may cost them very dear, because all the Nations are disposed to join the French. M. de Macarty has dispatched provisions to M. de Belèvre.

A Mohawk and an Englishman having come among the Hurons, that Nation delivered them over to M. de Belèvre.

He had the Englishman imprisoned and left the Mohawk in the hands of the Hurons who went bail for him.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Montreal, 26th June, 1760.

My Lord,

I have to address you, hereunto annexed, copy,

1st Of the letter General Murray wrote on the 29th April to Chevalier de Levis, wherein he assures that he has no knowledge of the firing on those conveying the wounded; that such must have occurred through mistake; he thanks him for his civilities to the English prisoners.

2nd Of Chevalier de Levis' answer. He communicates to General Murray the resentment of his army at the fate of our prisoners who had been blown up in a house in which the English had placed powder.

3rd Of General Murray's letter, stating that this misfortune was purely accidental.

4th Of that General's letter of the 10th of May, announcing the departure of a Lieutenant for the purpose of making the soldiers who are convalescent at the General Hospital rejoin their regiments. He sends M<sup>r</sup> de Levis the newspapers he has received from Europe; they contain nothing satisfactory to us.

5th Of Chevalier de Levis' answer, who observes that the Cartel does not prescribe anything in respect to a besieged place, into which it does not seem natural to allow the entrance of any reinforcements; that he cannot permit those soldiers to be sent him, although he does not consider them prisoners.

6th Of General Murray's letter of the 11th May, wherein he insists on these same soldiers being sent back.

7th Of Chevalier de Levis' answer; who informs him that he dispatches a courier to me for my orders, as he does not take anything on himself.

8th Of Chevalier de Levis' letter of the 21st May, wherein he asks General Murray for provisions for our wounded, founded on the Cartel, which states, very positively, that such shall be furnished to the hospitals in the hands of one of the two belligerent parties, on paying therefor the current prices at the places where they happen to be. He notifies him that if he will not adhere to the Cartel, M<sup>r</sup> de Malartic has orders to demand his passport and to retire with his guard.

M<sup>r</sup> Murray, far from paying attention to that letter, ordered the arrest not only of our soldiers who are convalescent at the General Hospital, but even of our police guard, and had them all confined as prisoners of war.

I am, with most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

General Murray to Chevalier de Levis. 29th April, 1760.

Sir,

I am this moment informed by Colonel Yonk<sup>1</sup> that those carrying the wounded have been fired on. I can assure you, Sir, that I have no knowledge thereof, and that it must have been by mistake. I am very grateful for the politeness you have exhibited towards the prisoners. I propose sending the provisions of our sick and our officers' baggage in a bateau as far as the General Hospital, if you have no objection to it. I request you to send me a word in answer to this point. I have the honor to be, with perfect esteem,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), JA. MURRAY.

Chevalier de Levis' Answer.

Sir,

I have not doubted that the firing on those removing the wounded was contrary to your orders. We lost, on that occasion, only one man of the party that was conveying yours to the General Hospital. That trifling accident was well nigh causing a more serious one, having revived among our troops their resentment at the bad treatment 'tis pretended our prisoners have experienced this winter, who have been shut up in a house in which was some powder that exploded. I render you, Sir, and your nation, too much justice, to have given credit, for an instant, to so inhuman a proceeding, whereof I have already destroyed the opinion my army entertained respecting it. The strict discipline I enforce therein, and the attention I pay to restraining the Indians, leave me no doubt that all the prisoners who will fall into our hands receive all the treatment and care customary among civilized nations.

I should have wished it was in my power to procure M. Yonk and the officers and soldiers of your troops greater succors than they have had; but they have been treated the same as ours.

You will be at liberty, Sir, whenever you please, to have conveyed by water to the General Hospital, whatever provisions you will think proper to send your sick; also the officers baggage. I request you to give orders that they be accompanied by a drum to be beat, so that my guard may receive and deliver them to yours.

I have the honor to be, with perfect esteem,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), Ch<sup>er</sup> DE LEVIS.

General Murray's Reply.

Sir,

I have the honor to assure you that what occurred this winter to the French prisoners has been the result of a pure accident. I am well persuaded that you have too much good sense to imagine that it arose from premeditated design. I am obliged to you for all your attentions towards the prisoners who have fallen into your hands. A drum will accompany the canoe that is to convey the provisions to the General Hospital.

I have the honor to be, with most perfect esteem,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), JA. MURRAY.

General Murray to Chevalier de Levis.

10th May, 1760.

Sir,

Lieutenant Brown,<sup>1</sup> of my Regiment, is going to the General Hospital to ascertain the number of our convalescent soldiers there and to make them rejoin their regiments, as provided for by the cartel. As the opportunity offers to return you the compliment which you have had the politeness to pay last winter; I have the honor to send you the newspapers that I have lately received. Have the goodness to return them to me when you will have read them.

I have the honor to be, with perfect esteem,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), J<sup>A</sup>. MURRAY.

Chevalier de Levis' Answer.

Sir,

The cartel prescribes nothing in respect to a place besieged, into which 'tis not natural to allow the entrance of reinforcements, but it applies only to the campaign. Therefore I cannot allow myself to send you back your soldiers who are in the General Hospital fit for service, although I do not consider them prisoners.

I am obliged to you for the newspapers you have been pleased to send me. You have been surprised as well as myself, at no mention having been made of this country. I hope to have it soon in my power to send you more interesting news.

I have the honor to be with perfect esteem,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), Ch<sup>er</sup> DE LEVIS.

General Murray's Reply.

11th May, 1760.

Sir,

I based the requisition I have had the honor to make you in regard to our convalescents, on the 27th article of the cartel which states expressly, "that the sick will not be taken prisoners, that they will be privileged to remain in security in the hospitals, where each of the belligerents and auxiliaries will be at liberty to leave them a guard, which, as well as the sick, will be sent back under the respective passports of the Generals, by the shortest road and without molestation or arrest."

These expressions, Sir, appear to me very general, and seem to my sense to embrace all the cases of war; at least there is no exception.

You may believe that such was my idea, since I should have had the necessary time to have them brought in, as I have had sufficient to call back all the outposts.

JOHN BROWN was commissioned a Lieutenant in the 60th Royal Americans, 9th February, 1756, and promoted to be Captain 15th September, 1760. He went on half-pay in 1763, and returned to the regiment in January, 1764; became Major of the 3rd battalion 22nd September, 1775, and died in 1777. Army Lists. — Eo.

I am as much surprised as you are at the little attention the public appears to feel about this continent; 'tis true, however, that you have seen all the newspapers I have lately received.

I have the honor to be, with perfect esteem,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Chevalier de Levis' Rejoinder.

12th May, 1760.

Sir,

On the new application you make to me by the letter with which you have this day honored me, to recall to their regiments the English who lie sick in the General Hospital, I this moment dispatch a courier to the Marquis de Vaudreuil to communicate the same to him and to receive his orders on this point, it not being in my power, in any wise, to take upon me to allow them to enter Quebec. I wish, for your satisfaction, that he may not think, like me, on the article of the cartel you quote, which, as I have already had the honor to inform you has, I think, nothing to do with the case of a besieged place.

I have the honor to be, with perfect esteem,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), Che<sup>r</sup> DE LEVIS.

Chevalier de Levis to General Murray.

Jacques Cartier, 21st May, 1760.

Sir,

On the report of M. de Malartic, it appears to me that you do not intend furnishing provisions to our sick left in the hospitals near Quebec, on the faith of the cartel which states, most positively, that such will be furnished to the hospitals remaining in the possession of one of the two belligerent parties, on paying the prices of the places where they are situated. If you intend to follow it, you cannot, Sir, avoid furnishing provisions, and if, on the contrary, you will not abide by it, our hospitals are in the case of being made prisoners of war, and in such circumstances you will find yourself obliged, always, to furnish subsistence to them and then remain responsible to the two crowns for the non-execution of the cartel. Whichever course you take, Sir, I am quite at ease as to the fate of our hospitals, being very sure that you will not allow them to want for anything. Your humanity and generosity are a sure guarantee to me on that point.

If you resolve not to abide by the cartel, I order M. de Malartic to demand a passport from you and to withdraw with his guard.

I have the honor to be, with perfect esteem,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Copy.

*General Murray to the Captains of Militia.*Quebec, 27th June, 1760.

Sir,

We have seen the circular dated Montreal the 15th June and signed, Vaudreuil et Bigot. As they have been pleased to address some to the Canadians, his Britannic Majesty's subjects, we think fit to submit to you the explanations they have been willing to omit.

By the arrêt rendered by the King of France on the 15th of October, 1759, he promises to pay the registered bills of exchange of 1757 and 1758, commencing three months after the peace, at the rate of 500,000 <sup>l</sup> a month, with interest; the whole payable according to the order of their maturity. As this includes the paper of all the other Colonies as well as that of Canada, it needs no great arithmetician to calculate in how many years 100 or 120 millions will be paid at the rate of six millions a year.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> Vaudreuil and Bigot's circular conveys that the bills of exchange drawn in 1759, will be paid 18 months after the peace; but the King's edict says expressly, that as regards those of 1757 and 1758 which are not registered, as well as those of 1759, they will not be examined until 18 months after the peace, his Majesty reserving to himself to order then whatever he shall see fit.

It is to be presumed that the circular letter speaks more truly when it says, that the treasury notes on ordinances (ordinancés) will be retired and duly paid as soon as circumstances will permit, because circumstances will never permit.

His Majesty, as it appears to us, seems to believe that the malversations of his servants have fully contributed to the bankruptcy he is obliged to submit to.

You will read this letter at the door of the church, at the issue of the mass on a holiday, and you will explain it thoroughly to the farmers; after which you will cause it to be affixed to the said door, and take care that it be not removed on any pretext whatsoever.

We are, Sir, your most humble and most obedient servant,

(Signed), JA. MURRAY

M. de Vaudreuil to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 29 June, 1760.

My Lord,

I have received the letter you have done me the honor to write me on the 9th of February last.

I can, my Lord, only refer to the exactness of the accounts Chev. de Levis has the honor to render you of all that has occurred of interest in this country since the last campaign. The brilliant affair of the 25th of April is entirely his work; our victory is due to his courage, his intrepidity and his military coup d'œil. The troops, the Canadians and even the Indians have done wonders. What ought I not hope for, under the eyes of a General whom they cherish and in whom they have always reposed a decided confidence?

How unfortunate it is, my Lord, that M. Berryer's just measures have been subject to delay; the succors he had destined for us, however trifling they might be, joined to the measures we had adopted, would have placed the Colony beyond danger, the sight of a single French flag, en prime, would have effected the surrender of Quebec.

Chevalier de Levis has acquired as much glory as if he had reconquered that place. 'Twas neither his fault nor mine if it did not return into the King's possession; we both have surmounted even impossibilities, and I doubt if there be an instance of such an expedition at so severe a season, and in such great distress for everything.

I am induced—I am obliged, my Lord, by every circumstance, to have the honor to pray you to be pleased to procure Chevalier de Levis a commission of Lieutenant-General; the importance of his services, his experience and military knowledge, entitle him to it.

I have nothing to add to what that General has the honor to inform you in regard to our situation generally. We are determined, the one and the other of us, to have recourse to the greatest extremities to preserve this Colony. I beg you, my Lord, to be pleased to assure the King thereof; nothing can mar our intimate union; it springs from our natural inclination, and essentially from our zeal for his Majesty's service.

I am, with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

Chevalier de Levis to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 30th June, 1760.

My Lord,

I have the honor to transmit you the relation of what has occurred since the last campaign.

The part embraced within brackets was in cipher in the original. [I hope the King will be satisfied with all the efforts which have been made for the preservation of New France. The arrival of one single frigate in advance of the English fleet would have decided the surrender of Quebec and secured

New France this year. The English squadron arrived on the first and succeeding days of May; that which was coming from France and sailed on the third, arrived the first. Our succors sailed from France only on the tenth *

New France as blockaded. The King's armies have three vessels. Some prizes, taken by these at the mouth of the River St. Lawrence, which arrived too late, went into the Bay des Chaleurs and Ouristigouche, where we have a post with some remnant of Acadians. M. de Vaudreuil sent orders to have them unloaded and to have their cargoes secured as well as possible, which was guarded by two hundred of the troops of Canada, who are on board these three vessels, and have orders to cruise along the New England coast, it being impossible for the smallest succors to reach us unless peace be very promptly concluded.

* It has not been possible to find the termination of this sentence. Note in Paris Document XVII., 102.

Now they are only injurious to us in consequence of the non-payment of the bills of exchange; the paper that remains with us is entirely discredited, all the farmers in despair; they have sacrificed everything for the preservation of Canada; they now find themselves ruined beyond recovery; we leave nothing untried to restore confidence, giving assurances that the paper will be paid, but 'tis to be feared that we shall no longer find the same willingness among the people, when we shall be obliged to reassemble them for our defence. On raising the siege of Quebec, we have quartered the troops throughout the rural districts, in order to be subsisted. Fifteen hundred at Point aux trembles and Jacques Cartier, under M. Dumas' orders, to observe the garrison of Quebec, which appeared struck with consternation at the defeat of the 20th of April; five hundred men, under M. de Bougainville's orders, on the frontier of Lake Champlain; five hundred and forty in Fort Levis, at the head of the Rapids, under M. Pouchot's orders; such is our actual position. We are menaced by way of the River St. Lawrence and by a considerable reinforcement that is to attack the quarters by Lake Ontario, and to penetrate as far as Montreal, whilst the Quebec garrison is to proceed up the River St. Lawrence. 'Tis reported that they will be joined by the garrison of Louisbourg, as that place is to be razed. If such be the case, and they operate simultaneously, we are irreparably lost; it will not be possible for us to resist everywhere. The river is the part most to be feared; we have no stand-point there, and nothing to prevent the frigates and their barges going up as far as Montreal. In this deplorable position, our strongest forces being in this district, we shall endeavor to concentrate them. If the enemy are not cautious in their movements, we shall profit thereby, in order to attack the body of their troops, which will be the first to advance. This is the only resource remaining. We are utterly unable to keep the field; provisions, warlike stores, everything is lacking. 'Tis a wonder that we yet exist; the troops are well disposed and courageous.

The battalions, which are in want of officers and old soldiers, do not number more than about two thousand two hundred fighting men, exclusive of nine hundred troops of the Marine.

I have not departed from the principle of acting, in regard to all matters relating to the public good, in concert with M. de Vaudreuil and also with M. Bigot, with whom I cannot but be satisfied. I am very much assisted in all matters by M. de Bourlamaque. Any testimony I may render his talents and merit cannot be sufficiently favorable.]

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Chev. DE LEVIS.

---

Chevalier de Levis to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 14th July, 1760.

My Lord,

I have the honor to transmit you duplicates of my letters by a small vessel that is to sail from Acadia. Since then I have been at Isle aux Noix, on the Lake Champlain frontier, to encourage the farmers in that quarter, whom a party of the enemy had alarmed by coming to burn the dépôt at St. Therèse, within two leagues of Chambly, several houses and carrying off 24 country people. I have issued orders relative to the sort of war, for the defence of this frontier and of Isle aux Noix, whither I have sent a battalion to join the corps commanded by M. de Bougainville. In that tour, and in all those I have made, I have not neglected to take advantage of the confidence the Canadians show me in order to reanimate their zeal and courage, calm their alarms respecting the bills of exchange and paper money, and induce them to furnish provisions. We are obliged to fight them when preventing us completing the removal by force of the few animals they have remaining to support life, as they are in that regard in the greatest distress. The crops have a fine appearance, but if we shall be able to cut them, it remains to be seen whether we shall enjoy them, and who will eat them. We have powder only for one battle; we have no news, as yet, of the enemy; we are on the eve of events which will decide the fate of the country. Judge, my Lord, of our situation, of that of the Canadians. Whatever it be, I beg you to assure the King that I will do all in my power for the glory of his arms and the preservation this Colony to him. The battle of the month of April has secured us the Indians who appear favorably disposed towards us.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

CHEV. DE LEVIS.

M. de Levis to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 7th August, 1760.

My Lord,

The courier being unable to leave since my last letter of the 14th ult<sup>o</sup>, I have the honor to report to you hereby, that the enemy are on the march from Quebec since the 14th of last month, with forty sail and a landing force of two thousand five hundred men; they have since received a reinforcement from Quebec, of about one thousand troops. They are at this moment at Three Rivers. The detachment which was at Des Chambeau, follows them along the north shore, their plan is, apparently, to come to Montreal or Sorel in order to facilitate their junction with M. Amherst. We possess no means of stopping them; we are making a mere defensive demonstration to retard their march.

The principal point with us is to defend Montreal and the North shore as long as we shall be able; the Canadians are frightened by the fleet; they are afraid their houses will be burned. We are on the eve of a crisis. M. Amherst has reassembled fifteen thousand at Fort Frederick; there is another considerable force collected at Fort Chouaguen to penetrate by the Rapids; there is no doubt that they are about to move with a view to simultaneous action. If they have delayed until this moment, 'tis probably with the design to wait until the season of harvest, to deprive us of the farmers, in the expectation that we shall find it difficult to collect them together at that time.

We shall act as I have had the honor to inform you in my preceding letter. We shall try every means to save the Colony, but that will require miracles our situation is so deplorable. Our armies will have nothing but bread to subsist on.

Being in want of flour, as the discredit of the contractor's notes and bills of exchange prevents his being able to procure any, I have been induced to make strong representations on that subject to the Marquis de Vaudreuil and the Intendant, offering to pledge myself personally to persuade the troops to give the little cash they might possess, and to employ in that levy, officers capable of acquitting themselves perfectly of that duty. This has produced the effect I anticipated, and has supplied us with means to procure bread for this month. The Marquis de Vaudreuil and the Intendant have also pledged themselves for this purchase.

I do not cease moving so as to be everywhere to introduce order and prepare all possible means of defence. I start this moment for Lake St. Peter.

I am with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Chev. DE LEVIS.

I have returned from the Islands of Lake St. Peter, where there is an English fleet which has been augmented by twenty sail. There are no means of stopping them at the Islands nor between that and Montreal. There is reason to believe that they are about trying to establish themselves at the mouth of the River Sorrel or that they will come to Montreal. We have just learned that a reinforcement of three of the enemy's battalions has arrived from Quebec; a fourth is expected from the garrison of Isle Royale. They are blowing up that place. The armies of Lake Ontario and Lake Champlain are in motion; the Quebec fleet coming up to Montreal will force us to abandon the frontiers. The armies will then form a junction without any obstacle; all united, they will then have at least forty thousand men in the heart of the Colony; you are aware of our strength and abilities. From that judge of what may be expected. If we do not save the Colony, we will sustain the honor of the King's arms.

---

M. Bigot to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 29th August, 1760.

My Lord,

Since the letter I had the honor to write you on the 12th of this month, the English fleet has arrived within three leagues of this place, where it lies at anchor waiting for a favorable wind to come higher up; it gives occupation to 2 or 3 thousand of our men on the north and south, to protect Montreal and to oppose the enemy's landing force.

Their army on Lake Champlain landed the 16th on the south shore, a league or two from Isle aux Noix, and encamped opposite the fort of that island. The enemy immediately set to work to erect batteries to cannonade that fort, which they unmasked on the 23rd, when they opened a heavy fire.

29th <sup>1</sup> They brought cannon opposite one of our Tartanes which M. de Bougainville, who commanded on the island, had caused to be anchored within pistol shot of the South shore, below that island. On the first volley from the cannon, the Captain cut his cable to get at a distance, and reach the North shore; but having been killed with a part of the crew, the remainder escaped by swimming, some to the enemy, others to the island. The English, thereupon rushed on board and seized that Tartane, with which they went and took the remainder of our little navy, consisting of a similar Tartane, a schooner, a gabarre armed with 4 guns, and 4 boats carrying an 8-pounder. The enemy's Tartane was supported by the fire of some field pieces on shore.

The English, by that means, were at liberty to convey their artillery and barges down into the River St. John, by the little South river<sup>2</sup> on which their right rested, after having had them transported a short distance by land. Were it not for the capture of our navy, the English could not, without infinite difficulty, get in the rear of Isle aux Noix, because there were two stockadoes at that island, which extended to the North and South shores and were defended by the cannon and musketry of the fort.

M. de Bougainville evacuated it on the 27th at 10 o'clock at night. He crossed to the North shore, and arrived to-day at St. Johns.

The loss of that fort, 'tis to be feared will entail that of St. John and Chambly, and the early junction of the enemy with M. Murray's fleet.

Isle aux Noix was supplied with provisions up to the 20th September, for the 1,650 men posted there, including the navy, but in consequence of the loss of the 25th, these provisions would have gone some days farther. I had made arrangements for the conveyance of some more there; they were even on the way.

Fort Levis, situated on Lake Ontario, is invested, cannonaded and bombarded by the army from Chouaguen, according to the report of Indians sent on a scout. 'Tis expected that Captain Pouchot, of the regiment of Bearn, who commands there, will not be distressed. He has provisions to the end of October.

Had M. de Bougainville been able to hold out the time that was hoped, Canada might have perhaps been saved for this year; such were the appearances, whilst at present it is in great danger. I had fully foreseen this, as I have had the honor frequently to state to you; we are all penetrated with grief in consequence. A little good fortune with good will is required, and we experience only one misfortune after another.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil and Chev. de Levis have resolved to give battle to the enemy if they can find an opportunity. This is our last resource. As for myself, I leave nothing untried to provide for the wants and subsistence of our armies. This last point is so much the more difficult, as there is no one left in the country to thresh (the grain), and for the past fifteen days it is raining continually; the harvest is going to ruin, as there is no way of getting it under cover.

I am, with profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

BIGOT.

P. S. 2nd September.

On the night of the 29th of last month, after the garrison of Isle aux Noix had joined our army at Fort St. John, M. de Roquemaure, the Commandant, set fire to that fort, and retired 2 leagues on this side. He came and encamped yesterday at La prairie, a parish situate on the south shore of the River St. Lawrence, three leagues from Montreal and 5 from Fort St. John. This army consisted of 2 thousand men, before the junction of that garrison, exclusive of 4 or 500 Indians, who were not stable.

M. de Bourlamaque is still at Longueuil, 2 leagues below Montreal, observing the movements of the fleet.

Two prisoners, taken on the 31st ult<sup>o</sup> from a detachment which M. Murray had sent to occupy a position on the south shore, 8 leagues below Montreal, have assured that that General had in his fleet a landing force of upwards of three thousand men, and that he had received 1,200 men from Louisbourg. That detachment has ravished (violé) pillaged and burned houses and barns, and committed other disorders. The English have acted in like manner everywhere they landed.

We learned on the day before yesterday that the enemy had taken Fort Levis on the 27th ult<sup>o</sup>, and that the garrison had been carried to Chouaguen. As this news has reached us only by Indians, who, however, give it as certain, it may not be true.

Major-General Amherst to M. de Vaudreuil.

Camp before Montreal, 7th September, 1760.

Sir,

Major Abercombie has just communicated to me the letter with which your Excellency has honored me in answer to that I have addressed you, with the conditions on which I expect the surrender of Canada. I have already had the honor to advise you that I shall not make any alteration. I cannot depart from this resolution. You will then be pleased to decide at once, and inform me in answer whether you will accept them—Yes or No.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration,

Sir,

Your Excellency's

Most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Protest of Chevalier de Levis against obliging the Troops to lay down their Arms.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

This day, the 8th of September, 1760, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of New France, having communicated to us the Articles of capitulation he has proposed to the English General for the surrender of Canada, and the answers to those articles; and having seen by said answers that that General requires, as his final resolution, that the troops will lay down their arms and not serve during the present war, we have considered it our duty to represent to him, in our own name and in that of the principal officers and others of the Regular troops we command, that such Article of the capitulation could not conflict more with the King's service and the honor of his arms, and must be accepted only at the last extremity, since it deprives the State, during this entire war, of whatever services eight battalions of land forces and two of the Marine, who have acted with courage and distinction, might render it; services the State would not be deprived of were the troops prisoners of war or even taken at discretion.

In consequence, we demand of M. de Vaudreuil to break off at once all negotiation with the English General and to determine on the most vigorous defence our actual position is capable of.

We occupy the town of Montreal, which, however very bad and incapable of sustaining a siege, is safe against all surprise, and cannot be taken without cannon. 'Twould be a thing unheard of to submit to conditions so severe and so humiliating for the troops without having been cannonaded.

Besides, we have still ammunition, should the enemy wish to attack us sword in hand, and to give battle should the Marquis de Vaudreuil be willing to try his fortune, although with forces extremely disproportionate and with small hopes of success.

If the Marquis de Vaudreuil, through political motives, thinks himself obliged to surrender the Colony now, we ask of him permission to retire with the land forces to St. Helen's island, in order to sustain there, in our own name, the honor of the King's arms, resolved to expose ourselves to every sort of extremity rather than submit to conditions which appear to us so contrary thereto.

I beg the Marquis de Vaudreuil to put his answer in writing at the foot of this present Memoir.

(Signed), Chev. DE LEVIS.

Whereas the interest of the Colony does not permit us to reject the conditions proposed by the English General, which are favorable to a country whose lot is confided to me. I order Chevalier de Levis to conform himself to the said Capitulation and to make the troops lay down their arms.

VAUDREUIL.

Montreal, 8th September, 1760.

Articles of Capitulation for the Surrender of Canada.

ARTICLES OF CAPITULATION between their Excellencies General Amherst, Commander-in-Chief of his Britannic Majesty's Troops and Forces in North America; and the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Grand Cross of the Royal and Military Order of Saint Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King in Canada.

ARTICLE 1.

Twenty-four hours after the signing of the present capitulation, the British General shall cause the troops of his Britannic Majesty to take possession of the gates of the town of Montreal: and the British garrison shall not enter the place 'till after the French troops shall have evacuated it.

The whole garrison of Montreal must lay down their arms, and shall not serve during the present war. Immediately after signing the present capitulation, the King's troops shall take possession of the gates, and shall post the guards necessary to preserve good order in the town.

ARTICLE 2.

The troops and the Militia, who are in garrison in the town of Montreal shall go out by the gate of [Quebec] with all the honors of war, six pieces of cannon, and one mortar, which shall be put on board the vessel where the Marquis de Vaudreuil shall embark, with ten rounds for each piece, and the same shall be granted to the garrison of Three Rivers, as to the honors of war.

ARTICLE 3.

The troops and Militia who are in garrison in the fort of Jacques Cartier, and in the island of St. Helen and other forts, shall be treated in the same manner and shall have the same honors; and these troops shall go to Montreal, or Three Rivers, or Quebec, be there embarked for the first sea-port in France by the shortest way. The troops, who are in our posts, situated on our frontiers, on the side of Acadia, at Detroit, Michilimakinac, and other posts, shall enjoy the same honors, and be treated in the same manner.

All these troops are not to serve during the present war, and shall likewise lay down their arms. The rest is granted.

ARTICLE 4.

The Militia, after evacuating the above towns, forts and posts, shall return to their habitations, without being molested on any pretence whatever, on account of their having carried arms.

ARTICLE 5.

The troops, who keep the field, shall raise their camp, march, drums beating, with their arms, baggage and artillery, to join the garrison of Montreal, and shall be treated, in every respect, the same.

These troops, as well as the others, must lay down their arms.

ARTICLE 6.

The subjects of his Britannic Majesty, and of his most Christian Majesty, soldiers, Militia, or seamen, who shall have deserted or left the service of their sovereign, and carried arms in North America, shall be, on both sides, pardoned for their crime; they shall be respectively returned to their country; if not, each shall remain where he is without being sought after or molested.

Refused.

ARTICLE 7.

The magazines, artillery, firelocks, sabres, ammunition of war, and, in general, everything that belongs to his most Christian Majesty, as well in the towns of Montreal and Three Rivers, as in the forts and posts mentioned in the third Article, shall be delivered up, according to exact inventories, to the Commissaries, who shall be appointed to receive the same in the name of his Britannic Majesty. Duplicates of the said inventories, in due form, shall be given to the Marquis de Vaudreuil.

This is everything that can be asked on this article.

ARTICLE 8.

The officers, soldiers, militia, seamen, and even the Indians, detained on account of their wounds or sickness, as well as in the hospital as in private houses, shall enjoy the privileges of the cartel, and be treated accordingly.

The sick and wounded shall be treated the same as our own people.

ARTICLE 9.

The British General shall engage to send back, to their own homes, the Indians and Morigans, who make part of his armies, immediately after the signing the present

The first part refused. There never have been any cruelties committed by the Indians of our army; and good order shall be preserved.

Capitulation. And, in the mean time, the better to prevent all disorders on the part of those who may not be gone away, the said Generals shall give safeguards to such persons as shall desire them, as well in the town as in the country.

ARTICLE 10.

His Britannic Majesty's General shall be answerable for all the disorders committed on the part of his troops, and shall oblige them to pay the damages they may commit as well in the towns as in the country.

Answered by the preceding Article.

ARTICLE 11.

The British General shall not oblige the Marquis de Vaudreuil to leave the town of Montreal before , and no person shall be quartered in his house till he is gone. The Chevalier de Levis, Commander of the land forces and Colony troops, the Engioeers, Officers of the Artillery, and Commissary of War, shall also remain at Montreal till the said day, and shall keep their lodgings there. The same shall be observed with regard to M. Bigot, Intendant, the Commissaries of Marines and Writers, whom the said M. Bigot shall have occasion for, and no person shall be lodged at the Intendant's house before he shall take his departure.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, and all these gentlemen, shall be masters of their houses, and shall embark when the King's ships shall be ready to sail for Europe; and all possible conveniences shall be granted them.

ARTICLE 12.

The most convenient vessel that can be found shall be appointed to carry the Marquis de Vaudreuil, the Marchioness de Vaudreuil, M. de Rigaud, the Governor of Montreal, and that General's suite by the most direct passage to the first sea-port in France; and every necessary accommodation shall be made for them. This vessel shall be properly victualed at the expense of his Britannic Majesty; and the Marquis de Vaudreuil shall take with him his papers, without their being examined; and his equipages, plate, baggage, and also those of his retinue.

Granted, except the archives which shall be necessary for the government of the country.

ARTICLE 13.

If before, or after, the embarkation of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, news of peace should arrive, and that by treaty, Canada should remain to his most Christian Majesty, the Marquis de Vaudreuil shall return to Quebec, or Montreal; everything shall return to its former state under the dominion of his most Christian Majesty, and the present capitulation shall become null and of no effect.

Whatever the King may have done on this subject shall be obeyed.

ARTICLE 14.

Two ships shall be appointed to carry to France Chevalier de Levis, the principal officers, and the staff of the land forces, the Engineers, officers of Artillery, and their domestics. These vessels shall likewise be victualled, and the necessary accommodations provided in them. The said officers shall take with them their papers, without being examined, and also their equippages and baggage. Such of said officers as shall be married shall have liberty to take with them their wives and children, who shall also be victualled.

Granted, except that the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and all the officers, of whatever rank they may be, shall faithfully deliver to us all the charts and plans of the country.

ARTICLE 15.

A vessel shall also be appointed for the passage of M. Bigot, the Intendant, with his suite; in which vessel the proper accommodation shall be made for him, and the persons he shall take with him: he shall likewise embark with him his papers, which shall not be examined; his equipages, plate, baggage, and those of his suite; this vessel shall be victualled as before mentioned.

Granted, with the same reserve as in the preceding article.

ARTICLE 16.

The British General shall also order the necessary and most convenient vessels to carry to France, M. de Longueuil, Governor of Three Rivers, the staff of the Colony and the Commissaries of the Marine; they shall embark therein their families, servants, baggage and equipages during the passage, at the expense of his Britannic Majesty.

Granted.

ARTICLE 17.

The officers and soldiers, as well of the land forces as of the Colony, and also the Marine officers and seamen who are in the Colony, shall be likewise embarked for France, and sufficient and convenient vessels shall be appointed for them. The officers of the land and Marine troops who shall be married, shall take with them their families, and all of them shall have liberty to embark their servants and baggage. As to the soldiers and seamen, those who are married shall take with them their wives and children, and all of them shall have their haversacks and baggage; these vessels shall be properly and sufficiently victualled at the expense of his Britannic Majesty.

Granted.

ARTICLE 18.

The officers, soldiers and all the followers of the troops who shall have their baggage in the fields, may send for it before they depart, without any hindrance or molestation.

Granted.

ARTICLE 19.

An hospital ship shall be provided by the British General for such of the wounded and sick officers, soldiers and seamen as shall be in a condition to be carried to France, and shall likewise be victualled at the expense of his Britannic Majesty. It shall be the same with regard to the other wounded and sick officers, soldiers and sailors, as soon as they shall be recovered. They shall have liberty to carry with them their wives, children, servants and baggage, and the said soldiers and sailors shall not be solicited nor forced to enter into the service of his Britannic Majesty.

Granted.

ARTICLE 20.

A Commissary and one of the King's Writers shall be left to take care of the hospitals, and whatever may relate to the service of his most Christian Majesty.

Granted.

ARTICLE 21.

The British General shall also provide ships for carrying to France the Officers of the Supreme council, of justice, police, admiralty, and all other officers having commissions from his most Christian Majesty, for them, their families, servants and equipages, as well as for the other officers; and they shall likewise be victualed at the expense of his Britannic Majesty. They shall, however, be at liberty to stay in the Colony, if they think proper to settle their affairs, or to withdraw to France whenever they think fit.

Granted; but if they have papers relating to the government of the country, they are to be delivered up to us.

ARTICLE 22.

If there are any military officers whose affairs should require their presence in the Colony till the next year, they shall have liberty to stay in it, after having obtained the permission of the Marquis de Vaudreuil for that purpose, and without being reputed prisoners of war.

All those whose private affairs shall require their stay in the country, and who shall have the Marquis de Vaudreuil's leave for so doing, shall be allowed to remain till their affairs are settled.

ARTICLE 23.

The contractor for the King's provisions shall be at liberty to stay in Canada till next year, in order to be enabled to answer the debts he has incurred in the Colony, on account of what he has furnished; but, if he should prefer to go to France this year, he shall be obliged to leave, till next year, a person to transact his business. This private person shall preserve, and have liberty to carry off all his papers, without being inspected. His clerks shall have leave to stay in the Colony or go to France; and, in this last case, a passage and subsistence shall be allowed them on board the ships of his Britannic Majesty, for them, their families and their baggage.

Granted.

ARTICLE 24.

The provisions and other kind of stores, which shall be found in the magazines of the Commissary, as well as in the towns of Montreal and of Three Rivers, as in the country, Everything that is actually in the magazines, destined for the use of the troops, is to be delivered to the British Commissary, for the King's forces.

shall be preserved to him, the said provisions belonging to him, and not to the King; and he shall be at liberty to sell them to the French and English.

ARTICLE 25.

A passage to France shall likewise be granted, on board of his Britannic Majesty's ships, as well as victuals to such officers of the India company as shall be willing to go thither, and they shall take with them their families, servants and baggage. The chief agent of the said company, in case he should choose to go to France, shall be allowed to leave such person as he shall think proper till next year, to settle the affairs of the said company, and to recover such sums as are due to them. The chief agent shall take possession of all the papers belonging to the said company, and they shall not be liable to inspection.

ARTICLE 26.

This company shall be maintained in the property of the scarlet cloths and beavers they may have in the town of Montreal; which shall not be touched under any pretence whatever, and the necessary licences shall be given to the chief agent, to send this year his beaver to France, on board his Britannic Majesty's ships, paying the freight on the same footing as the British would pay it.

Granted, with regard to what may belong to the company, or to private persons; but if his most Christian Majesty has any share in it, that must become the property of the King.

ARTICLE 27.

The free exercise of the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion, shall subsist entire, in such manner that all the states and the people of the towns and countries, places and distant posts, shall continue to assemble in the churches, and to frequent the sacraments as heretofore, without being molested in any manner, directly or indirectly. These people shall be obliged by the English government to pay their priests the tithes, and all the taxes they were used to pay under the government of his most Christian Majesty.

Granted, as to the free exercise of their religion; the obligation of paying the tithes to the priests will depend on the King's pleasure.

ARTICLE 28.

The Chapter, Priests, Curates and Missionaries, shall continue with an entire liberty, their parochial duties and functions in the town and country parishes.

Granted.

ARTICLE 29.

The Vicars-general named by the Chapter to administer the diocese during the vacancy of the Episcopal See, shall have liberty to dwell in the town or country parishes, as they shall think proper. They shall, at all times, be free to visit the different parishes of the diocese, with the ordinary ceremonies and exercise all the jurisdiction they exercised under the French dominion. They shall enjoy the same rights in case of the death of the future Bishop, of which mention will be made in the following article.

Granted, except what regards the following article.

ARTICLE 30.

If by the treaty of peace, Canada should remain in the power of his Britannic Majesty, his most Christian Majesty shall continue to name the Bishop of the Colony who shall be of the Roman communion, and under whose authority the people shall execute the Roman Religion.

Refused.

ARTICLE 31.

The Bishop shall, in case of need, establish new parishes, and provide for the rebuilding of his cathedral and his Episcopal palace; and, in the mean time, he shall have liberty to dwell in the towns or parishes as he shall judge proper. He shall be at liberty to visit his diocese with the ordinary ceremonies, and exercise all the jurisdiction which his predecessor exercised under the French Dominion, save that an oath of fidelity, or a promise to do nothing contrary to his Britannic Majesty's service may be required of him.

This article is comprised under the foregoing.

ARTICLE 32.

The communities of Nuns shall be preserved in their constitutions and privileges; they shall continue to observe their rules; they shall be exempted from lodging any military; and it shall be forbid to molest them in their religious exercises, or to enter their convents: safe-guards shall even be given to them, if they desire them.

ARTICLE 33.

The preceding article shall likewise be executed, with regard to the communities of Jesuits and Recollects, and of the house of the Priests of St. Sulpice, at Montreal; these last and the Jesuits, shall preserve their right to nominate to certain parishes and missions, as heretofore.

Refused, 'till the King's pleasure be known.

ARTICLE 34.

All the communities and priests, shall preserve their movables, the property and revenues of the Seignories, and other estates which they possess in the Colony of what nature soever they may be; and the same estates shall be preserved in their privileges, rights, honors and exemptions.

Grantec.

ARTICLE 35.

If the Canons, Priests, Missionaries, the Priests of the Seminary of the foreign missions, and of St. Sulpice, as well as the Jesuits and the Recollects, choose to go to France, a passage shall be granted them in his Britannic Majesty's ships; and they shall have leave to sell, in whole, or in part, the estates and movables they possess in the Colonies, either to the French or to the English, without the least impediment or obstacle from the British government. They shall be at liberty to take with them, or send to France, the produce, of what nature soever it may be, of the goods sold, paying the freight, as mentioned in the 26th Article. And such of the said Priests, who choose to go this year, shall be victualed, during the passage at the expense of his Britannic Majesty; and they shall take with them their baggage.

They shall be masters to dispose of their estates, and to send the produce thereof, as well as their persons, and all that belongs to them, to France.

ARTICLE 36.

If, by the treaty of peace, Canada remains to his Britannic Majesty, all the French, Canadians, Acadians, merchants, and other persons, who choose to retire to France, shall have leave to do so from the British General, who shall procure them a passage; and, nevertheless, if, from this time to that decision, any French or Canadian merchants, or other persons, shall desire to go to France, they shall likewise have leave from the British General. Both the one and the other of them shall take with them their families, servants and baggage.

Granted.

ARTICLE 37.

The Lords of Manors, the Military and Civil officers, the Canadians as well in the towns as in the country, the French, settled, or trading in the whole extent of the Colony of Canada, and all other persons whatsoever, shall preserve the entire peaceable property and possession of the goods, noble and ignoble, movable and immovable, merchandises, furs, and other effects, even their ships; they shall not be touched, nor the least damage done to them, on any pretence whatever. They shall have liberty to keep, let or sell them, as well to the French as to the British; to take away the produce of them in bills of exchange, furs, specie or other returns, whenever they shall judge proper to go to France, paying their freight, as in the 26th Article. They shall also have the furs which are in the posts above, and which belong to them, and may be on the way to Montreal; and, for this purpose, they shall have leave to send, this year, or the next, canoes, fitted out, to fetch such of the said furs as shall have remained in those posts.

Granted, as in the 26th Article.

ARTICLE 38.

All the people who have left Acadia, and who shall be found in Canada, including the frontiers of Canada on the side of Acadia, shall have the same treatment as the Canadians, and enjoy the same privileges.

It is for the King to dispose of his ancient subjects; in the meantime, they shall enjoy the same privileges as the Canadians.

ARTICLE 39.

None of the Canadians, Acadians or French, who are now in Canada and on the frontiers of the Colony on the side of Acadia, Detroit, Michillimakinac and other places and posts of the countries above, nor the married and unmarried soldiers remaining in Canada shall be carried or transported into the British Colonies or to Great Britain, and they shall not be troubled for having carried arms.

Granted, except with regard to the Canadians.<sup>1</sup>

ARTICLE 40.

The Savages or Indians, allies of his Most Christian Majesty, shall be maintained in the lands they inhabit; if they choose to remain there, they shall not be molested, on any pretence whatsoever, for having carried arms and served his Most Christian Majesty. They shall have, as well as the French, freedom of religion, and shall keep their Missionaries. The actual Vicars-general and the Bishop, when the Episcopal See shall be filled, shall have leave to send them new Missionaries when they shall judge it necessary.

Granted, except this last article, which has been already refused.

ARTICLE 41.

The French, Canadians and Acadians, of what state and condition soever, who shall remain in the Colony, shall not be forced to take arms against his Most Christian Majesty or his allies, directly or indirectly, on any occasion whatsoever; the British Government shall only require of them an exact neutrality.

They become subjects of the King.

ARTICLE 42.

The French and Canadians shall continue to be governed according to the customs of Paris, and the laws and usages established for this country; and shall not be subject to any other imposts than those which were established under the French dominion.

Answered by the preceding articles, and particularly by the last.

ARTICLE 43.

The papers of the government shall remain, without exception, in the power of the Mar-

Granted, with the reserve already made.

quis de Vaudreuil, and shall go to France with him. These papers shall not be examined on any pretence whatsoever.

ARTICLE 44.

The papers of the Intendant, of the officers of the Comptroller of the Marine, of the ancient and new Treasurers, of the King's Magazines, of the offices of the Revenues and Forges of St. Maurice, shall remain in the power of M. Bigot, the Intendant, and shall be embarked for France in the same vessel with him; these papers shall not be examined.

The same as to this article.

ARTICLE 45.

The registers and other papers of the Supreme Council of Quebec, of the Prevôté, and admiralty of the said city; those of the Royal Jurisdictions of Three Rivers and of Montreal; those of the Seignorial Jurisdictions of the Colony; the minutes of the acts of the Notaries of the towns and of the rural districts, and, in general, the acts, and other papers that may serve to prove the estates and fortunes of the citizens, shall remain in the Colony, in the rolls of the jurisdictions on which these papers depend.

Granted.

ARTICLE 46.

The inhabitants and merchants shall enjoy all the privileges of trade, under the same favors and conditions granted to the subjects of his Britannic Majesty, as well in the Upper countries, as in the interior.

Granted.

ARTICLE 47.

The Negroes and Panis of both sexes shall remain in their quality of slaves, in the possession of the French and Canadians to whom they belong; they shall be at liberty to keep them in their service in the Colony, or to sell them; and they shall also continue to bring them up in the Roman religion.

Granted; except those who shall have been made prisoners.

ARTICLE 48.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, the General and the Staff Officers of the land forces, the Governors and Staff Officers of the different places of the Colony, the Military and Civil Officers, and all other persons who shall leave the Colony, or who are already absent, shall have leave to name and appoint Attorneys to act for them, and in their name, in the administration of their effects, movable, and immovable, until the peace; and if by the treaty between the two Crowns, Canada does not return under the French dominions, these officers or other persons, or Attorneys for them shall have leave to sell their manors, houses, and other estates, their movables and effects, &c., to carry away or send to France the produce thereof, either in bills of exchange, specie, furs, or other returns, as is mentioned in the 37th Article.

Granted.

ARTICLE 49.

The inhabitants and other persons who shall have suffered any damage in their goods, movable or immovable, which remained at Quebec, under the faith of the capitulation of that city, may make their representations to the British Government, who shall render them due justice against the person whom the same shall concern.

Granted.

ARTICLE 50, and last.

The present capitulation shall be inviolably executed in all its articles, and bona fide on both sides, notwithstanding any infraction, and any other pretence, with regard to preceding capitulations, and without making use of reprisals.

Granted.

P. S.

ARTICLE 51.

The British Generals shall engage, in case any Indians remain after the surrender of this town, to prevent their coming into the towns, and that they do not in any manner insult the subjects of his Most Christian Majesty.

Care shall be taken that the Indians do not insult any of the subjects of his Most Christian Majesty.

ARTICLE 52.

The troops and other subjects of his Most Christian Majesty who are to go to France shall be embarked, at latest, fifteen days after the signing of the present capitulation.

Answered by the 11th article.

ARTICLE 53.

The troops and other subjects of his Most Christian Majesty who are to go to France, shall remain lodged and encamped in the town of Montreal and other posts which they now occupy, until they shall be embarked for their departure; passports, however, shall be granted to those who shall want them, for the different places of the Colony, to go and attend to their affairs.

Granted.

ARTICLE 54.

All the officers and soldiers of the troops in the service of France, who are prisoners in New England, and who were taken in Canada, shall be sent back as soon as possible to France, where their ransom or exchange shall be treated of, agreeable to the cartel; and, if any of these officers have affairs in Canada, they shall have leave to come there.

Granted.

ARTICLE 55.

As to the officers of the Militia, the Militiamen and the Canadians, who are prisoners in New England, they shall be sent back to their countries.

Granted, except what regards the Canadians.<sup>1</sup>

M. Bernier to ———.

Sir,

Quebec, 25th September, 1760.

As the necessity and good of the service cause me to perform actually here the duties of a Commissary of the Marine, I take the liberty to render you an account in this regard, in order that you may have the goodness to inform the Minister thereof; but to resume matters farther back, I shall say:

On the morning of the 7th the town of Montreal was invested by three armies consisting of more than 32 thousand men; the principal one came by Lake Ontario under the orders of M<sup>r</sup> Amherst, Commander-in-Chief; one by Lake Champlain, commanded by Colonel Haviland, and the third from Quebec, in ships. Never was seen more beautiful military combinations or so many troops reunited on the same point and in the same instant, against a body already expiring.

Sth M. de Vaudreuil concluded a general capitulation for the Colony, very favorable to the Colonists, and to all those who have any fortunes in the country. This capitulation is a voluminous work, the length of which deprives me of the pleasure I should have of annexing a copy of it hereunto.

According as the English armies advanced the farmers deserted us, and the troops alone fell back towards the centre. The few domiciliated Indians that remained with us, did not delay joining those of the enemy, serving as their guides, and being the first to massacre those who fed them the evening before.

10th I made a review of the eight battalions of Regulars; I found, sick, invalids all included, 2,200 and some odd men. I believe all the soldiers of the Colony formed into two battalions, numbered scarcely 650 men. This business finished, I started for Quebec, in order to be beforehand with our regiments there, and to make provision with the English Commissaries for their subsistence and lodging. Chevalier de Levis, who arrived also at the same time, ordered me to take the same care of the troops of the Marine and sailors, as there was no Commissary or clerk of the Marine on the spot to render them that service.

The transportation of the troops from Montreal here, was effected partly in bateaux, schooners and other craft. The troops of the Colony, embarked in bateaux, arrived some days ago. I have made the review of them in order to regulate the quantity of rations they required;

And have found:

Extract of the Review of the two battalions of the Troops of the Marine at Quebec, 21st September, 1760.

Officers, fifty-six, .....	56
Servants, fifty-eight, .....	53
Cadets, six, .....	6
Soldiers, seven hundred and fifty-three, .....	753
Women, forty-seven, .....	47
Children, thirty, .....	30

Gunners and bombardiers of the Marine, exclusive of the garrison of Three Rivers, which is 50 or 60 men.

Officer, one, .....	1
Gunners and bombardiers, fifty-one, .....	51
Women and children, five, .....	5

Total of rations to be delivered to the troops of the Marine, each day, ..... 1,007

This number is daily increasing, some of them having gone into the settlements in quest of their baggage.

As for the naval officers and seamen, it has not been possible for me, as yet, to learn their effective number.

The staff of the Regular troops is here, but the whole of that of the Colony is still at Montreal; their departure from that place, is subject to more embarrassment in consequence of their family and baggage.

Since the 20th a continual Northeast wind has prevailed which at moments has been furious; it has destroyed two schooners, on board which were some English troops, but without loss of life; we apprehend like accidents to those in which our two battalions have embarked. I, myself, run the risk of losing all my baggage and papers which are on board a vessel with the regiment of Bearn, whereof there has been no tidings.

This bad weather is the cause of the arrival, daily, here, of troops of soldiers belonging to one corps or another. The English, to hasten being rid of them, wish to put them on board according as they arrive, without considering that they thereby dismember the corps, which subjects us, and me in particular, as regards my business, to infinite labor and confusion.

Chevalier de Levis is now occupied in preventing this inconvenience by his representations.

When the troops of the Marine will embark, I shall make the review of them on the beach, and draw up a duplicate of it, one for the Major and the other I shall reserve to transmit to you.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect, Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), BERNIER.

Chevalier de Levis to Marshal de Belle Isle.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Rochelle, 27th November, 1760.

My Lord,

I have landed this moment; I should have wished to be able to leave immediately for Versailles, but the fatigue and even perils that I have experienced in the passage I have just made, force me to take five or six days for the reestablishment of my health.

The only opportunity I have had this year to write to you, my Lord, was by some ships which sailed last April, from Bordeaux and put into the Bay des Chaleurs, whence the pacquets from the court were brought to us. I have had the honor to answer, by those same vessels, your letters of the 25th February, to send you an account of our operations last winter, of my opening the campaign, and submitting to you my opinions on the then situation of the Colony. 'Twas at the close of the month of June.

But these vessels having been outsailed in the river of Canada by an English squadron, and afterwards defeated by a division of that same squadron, makes me fear that my letters have not reached you.

I annex hereunto a duplicate of that relation, to which I have only to add the assurance that it was not for want of courage in the troops, of union and concert in the best measures to be adopted for the King's service, of zeal and fidelity in the inhabitants no more than of prudence on the part of the chiefs, that the Colony failed to experience a more fortunate fate.

The Regular troops and those of the Colony merit this eulogium, that they have performed prodigies of valor on the 25th of April, to recover an advantage that they might have certainly gained, had bravery availed them in the stead of means. They have maintained the same character, under incredible difficulties, up to the 5th of September, when it became at length necessary to yield to numbers, and to the formidable array of three armies reunited in their combined operations; nor did this take place until after they had offered to immolate themselves, and gave evidence of their entire despair in submitting to the conditions that have been imposed upon them.

I reserve until my return to Versailles, the placing before you, my Lord, the other objects on which I had the honor to write you last June. The request I then made, those I have to submit since that time in favor of the troops, and my supplication to you to lay before his Majesty, on some favorable day, all that those troops have done and suffered for many years in so severe a climate. A more worthy result was due to their courage, but this one was predicted and foreseen for a long time.

I annex in like manner hereunto the continuation of the narrative of the campaign, which terminated on the signing of the capitulation made by the Marquis de Vaudreuil,<sup>1</sup> wherein I had no other part than to have protested against it, in regard to what concerned the treatment shown to the Regular troops, who ought to have merited more attention from the Marquis de Vaudreuil and more esteem from General Amherst. My proceedings on that occasion have not permitted me receiving from General Amherst, or personally paying him, the civilities usual on such meeting between Generals. I have thought it my duty to manifest my resentment and not to appreciate the reasons which that English General has given for his conduct, to wit; that 'twas in satisfaction for the cruelties committed by the Indians with whom the troops had been associated.

Immediately after the town of Montreal was given up, I made the review of the eight battalions, which I found to be about two thousand two hundred men, all included, hospitals, wounded and invalids. As these troops and all the people were to repair by the river in English vessels to Quebec, where the distribution of the embarkations were to be made, I immediately dispatched M. Bougainville in order to be there before them and to maintain discipline and regularity among them, and Commissary Bernier in like manner, to coöperate with the English Commissaries in victualing and lodging them, and I have instructed him to pay the same attention to the troops of the Marine and seamen, as there was no person there to represent the Marine.

<sup>1</sup> PIERRE RIGAUD DE VAUDREUIL-CAVAGNAT, Marquis de Vaudreuil, was the 3rd son of Philip, who governed Canada from 1705 to his death in 1723, and of Louisa Elizabeth de Joybert, of Soulange, and was born at Quebec, in 1698. He married Miss d'Eschambault and served as Governor of Three Rivers; was appointed Governor of Louisiana in 1743, and his administration of that Colony was long and fondly remembered by the people. In 1752 he was appointed Governor of his native country and administered its affairs down to 1760. He returned to France, poor, after a service of fifty-six years, and was thrown into the Bastille, through the efforts, it is supposed, of the friends of the late Marquis de Montcalm. The proceedings against him and others inculpated, continued from December, 1761, to the close of March, 1768. In December, of that year, he was honorably acquitted, but he did not long survive the persecution. He died in 1764, less from the effects of age than from the ingratitude of the government, in whose support he had sacrificed his entire fortune. Garnett. — Ed.

After the departure of the battalions from Montreal, I followed them with M. de Bourlamaque in the resolution of leaving Quebec the last, in order to obtain for them from the English chief, by my presence, all the accommodation possible for the voyage. In spite of my trouble and care, they have suffered extraordinarily, 1st Through the small number of transports the English had; 2nd In consequence of a frightful north-easter which detained them in the river 23 days in peril, and rendered many ships unfit for service, whereby the English were constrained to crowd the men into the remaining vessels, although, however, they have not exceeded their ordinary rule to put only one man per ton, to which I paid the greatest attention; 4th Finally, in consequence of the universal want of money suitable for providing themselves at the English merchants with the comforts necessary for the voyage, and the painful alternative of not having, at least the greater number, any other food than simply the sailors' ration.

After this storm, so contrary and so universal in this country, the battalions arrived piecemeal at Quebec; they had to leave in like manner, as the season admitted of no further delay, nor consequently of having any order or regularity in that embarkation.

I confined my attention to the embarkation of all belonging to the King's troops. I have given orders and instructions to each officer commanding the soldiers in each vessel; have taken a list of nearly all the ships and the number of soldiers put on board, which I enclose, and have been obliged to sail myself; I have directed M. de Bourlamaque, whose vessel was one of the last to be ready, to take the same care regarding the remaining ships, and to draw up a fresh list, on the supposition that some change would be made.

I embarked in a vessel of 200 tons, and took with me the Adjutant-General, the Assistant Quarter-Master General, Commissary Bernier, Mess<sup>rs</sup> Pontleroy, La Rochebeaucourt, the two partizan officers and the Surgeon-Major. M. de Bourlamaque took with him M. de Bougainville<sup>1</sup> and the remainder of our artillery and Engineer officers.

After having experienced much contrary wind in descending the river, being in company with M. de Vaudreuil's ship, who has with him a portion of the Colonial staff, we had off Louisbourg what is called a tempest, which separated us, and cost my vessel one of her masts and kept us two hours uncertain as to life or death, and at length, without any other accident than a very stormy time, I arrived here after a passage of 40 days.

<sup>1</sup> LOUIS ANTOINE DE BOUGAINVILLE was son of a Notary in Paris, where he was born on the 11th November, 1729. After a regular course of study at the University, at the age of 23, he commenced the study of the law and was afterwards admitted an Advocate, but abandoning that career for the profession of arms he enrolled himself in the Black Miqueeters. In 1753 he became Adjutant of the Provincial battalion of Picardy, the year following Aid-de-Camp of General Chivert, who commanded the camp of Sarre Louis, and in the course of the winter of 1754 went to London as Secretary of Legation, when he was received a member of the Royal Society. He rejoined Chevert in 1755, and in 1756 was appointed Aid-de-Camp to General Montcalm, whom he accompanied to Canada, with the commission of Captain of Dragoons. After his return to France, in 1760, he served with the army in Germany, as Aid-de-Camp to M. Choiseul Stainville, where he distinguished himself in a manner to call forth the special notice of the King. After the peace he was engaged by the merchants of St. Malo, to form an establishment at the Malouines islands, and he accordingly received a commission of Captain in the French Navy. He sailed from St. Malo in March, 1763; but these islands were afterwards ceded to Spain. In 1766 he commenced his celebrated Voyage around the world, and to him belongs the honor of being the first French circumnavigator. He returned to St. Malo in 1769, and in 1771 published his Voyage autour du Monde. In 1778 and 1779 he commanded the Guerrier, 74, in Count d'Estaing's fleet, and was at the reduction of Savannah in the latter year, when he was promoted to the rank of Commodore; and in the year 1781 he commanded the Auguste, 80, in Count de Grasse's fleet, and was in the engagement of the 29th of April, against the English fleet, under the command of Hood, and in November following commanded the van, and commenced the action off the Chesapeake, when the French fleet fought that of the English under Graves. After reaching the rank of Marechal de Camp or Major-General, he retired from the public service in 1790, after a brilliant career of over forty years. He was elected member of the French Institute in 1796; next entered a Senator, and afterwards Count of the Empire. He died 31st August, 1811, in the 83d year of his age. Biographie Universelle; Beaumont's Naval and Military Memoirs, VI. — Ed.

I feel it my duty, my Lord, to inform you that the English, perceiving the few transports they had to carry out the engagements of the capitulation, have proposed to me to have our battalion sent to New-York, in order to be embarked more commodiously there, which I strongly opposed, because they would have been annihilated on that route by voluntary desertion or insubordination.

I think that these battalions bring back to France nearly 15 or 1,600 men; more than 500 have quit since the capitulation.

I should wish, at your pleasure, that, in case the corps would desire to enter proceedings against the latter, all such may be suspended until I have had the honor to inform you of what I have done concerning these deserters, which may plead in their favor. This evil proceeds from an error at the very outset, which is, to have permitted them to marry, to take up land and to have promised them their discharge on the conclusion of the war in Canada. The greatest number of those deserters are settlers or such as had taken measures to settle, and who have been unwilling to abandon a state into which they were allowed to enter.

May I, my Lord, before terminating this letter represent to you the circumstances in which all the officers from the highest to the lowest, find themselves who are returning from Canada, they are absolutely without specie; each of them may truly have funds in paper but which is of no value here. Their salaries have been paid them in bills of exchange up to the first of August last; since then three months have elapsed. If it be possible, my Lord, to have them paid by the Marine from the 1st of September to the 1st of January, on the same footing as in Canada, it would be a great relief to them for the journeys and other expenses they have to undergo and whilst waiting the maturity of their bills of exchange.

All are impatiently awaiting the orders you will think proper to give for their relief at a moment so pressing when they are arriving in general need of clothes and articles of the greatest necessity.

I have found here on my arrival only the ship Elizabeth Mary with a portion of the regiment of Bearn, and on the same day two transports arrived with some Colonial troops. I hope we shall not delay receiving others.

I am with respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and Most obedient servant,

Chev. DE LEVIS.

Chevalier de Levis to ———.

Rochelle, 27th 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1760.

Sir,

I have the honor to transmit to you my detail of the operations from last winter up to the eighth of September.

The result thereof is by no means favorable, but how could it be otherwise comparing our force and means with those of the enemy?

Without endeavoring to make out of place eulogiums, I think I may say that the Marquis de Vaudreuil has employed, up to the last moment, all the resources that human prudence and experience can be capable of.

On my part, I have done everything that depended on me to second him, either by the union of the most unanimous sentiments between us both, or by executing his orders, or suggesting means which appeared to me ought to promote the good of the service.

The troops of the Colony, those of the Line, and the farmers themselves have given reiterated proofs especially on the 28th of April last, that the preservation of the Colony could not depend either on their zeal for his Majesty's glory, or their courage in defending themselves, or their willingness to endure the greatest fatigues and the privation of the most necessary articles.

'Tis a consequence of the misfortunes and fatality to which, for a certain time, that Colony was exposed, that the succors sent, this year, from France, did not arrive at the critical moment. However trifling they might be, when joined to the success gained by the King's arms on the 28th of April, I believe I may assert that Quebec would have been retaken.

I will not say more, Sir, on a matter actually decided; I reserve for my arrival at Versailles the entering, if you desire it, into the details relative to the functions of the employment I have filled in that Colony; one of those to which I shall supplicate your favorable attention is that of the rewards which the officers of the Colony deserve who have served with zeal and distinction under my orders.

I have made the voyage with half my Staff in a vessel of 200 tons; we were nigh perishing in a tempest; one mast was cut away in order to save us; I am obliged to stop a few days here for the recovery of my health, having for a long time suffered very great fatigue.

Shortly after the surrender of Montreal I repaired to Quebec with M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamaque, to facilitate by our presence the means of procuring for all the troops the most commodious transports.

A violent gale which detained them 22 days in their passage from Montreal to Quebec and which has made some vessels unfit for service, has rendered that embarkation very difficult and has not permitted it being done with regularity; I have confined my attention to getting on board all the subjects in the King's service; as the season required despatch and my vessel was ready, I took my departure, leaving behind me M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamaque to continue the same attention to the few remaining transports and to take a new list, supposing some changes would occur; I annex hereunto the one up to the moment of my departure.

<sup>1</sup> FRANÇOIS BIGOT belonged to a Guyenne family and had been Commissaire Ordonnateur at Louisbourg in 1745; when that fortress fell into the hands of the enemy he was accused of having contributed to the defeat of the garrison by malversation of the funds appropriated for the construction and repairs of the fortifications. Being connected with an influential family, he not only escaped all censure but was appointed Intendant of Canada 1st January, 1748, with powers considerably enlarged; they extended to Louisiana and all the dependencies of New France. On his return to France, he was accused of malversation by Cadet, the Contractor-General of Canada, and thrown into the Bastille 17th November, 1761, where he remained eleven months without being allowed to communicate with his friends. In December, 1762, a Royal commission was appointed to try all those suspected of having authorized, or connived at, the frauds said to have been flagrantly committed in Canada. More than fifty persons were accused, including the Governor, Intendant, seventeen Commandants of posts, two Commissaries of the Marine, and one Commissary of the Superior Council of Quebec. The President of this commission was M. de Sartine, at the time Lieutenant-General of police; the Reporter was M. Dupont. The trial lasted three years, and engaged the attention of all Europe. The Court decreed a restitution to the King of twelve millions of livres. The Marquis de Vaudreuil was acquitted of all blame. In March, 1763, Messrs. Bigot, the Intendant, Varin, the Commissary at Montreal, Bréard, the Controller of the navy at Quebec, who were convicted of having, during their administration, tolerated, favored and committed, themselves, the abuses, malversations and frauds charged in the indictment, received only a sentence of banishment (Mr. Bigot to Bordeaux, where he passed the remainder of his life in ease and comfort). Major Péan (supra, p. 85), whose wife was Bigot's mistress, and the M<sup>de</sup> Pompadour, of Canada, was mulcted in the sum of 600,000 livres. Encyclopédie Méthodique: Jurisprudence t. II., 206; Collections Quebec Historical and Literary Society, 1838, p. 40; Smith's Canada, I., 207, 220, who specifies the powers and duties of the Intendant. — Ed.

The regular troops numbered on the day of the surrender of Montreal, 2,200 men, all included, sick and invalids, and I expect 16 or 1,700 of them will return. The rest have remained in the country where they have formed settlements.

The pay has been liquidated from the 1st of January to the 1st of September in bills of exchange; I hope, Sir, that in consequence of the protection you grant to troops who have been in your department, you will be pleased to obtain for them the continuance of their pay to the 1st of January, which would be a great relief for the journeys and other expenses they have to make, and the delay attendant on their papers maturing.

I have found on my arrival here only the ship Elizabeth Mary with part of the regiment of Bearn, and on the same day arrived two transports with some troops of the Colony; I hope 'twill not be long before we receive others.

I have the honor to be with respect, Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,
(Signed), Ch<sup>er</sup> DE LEVIS.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

On board the Ship Adventure, in the Brest roads, 25th November, 1760.

My Lord,

By my letter of the 10th of 7<sup>ber</sup>, I have had the honor to report to you the necessity to which I was reduced of capitulating on the 8th of last month with General Amherst, being persuaded, my Lord, that you will have appreciated the force of the motives which have obliged me to that course, I flatter myself you will have the goodness to approve my conduct to the King, and that you will have recognized therein as much of prudence as of attachment to a people whose fidelity to his Majesty has never been falsified.

The moment I arrive, I shall not lose any time, my Lord, in having the honor to transmit to you another copy of my letter of the 10th 7<sup>ber</sup>, of the capitulation and of other documents annexed thereto.

My health being feeble before I left Canada, it has not failed to suffer during the voyage, which has lasted 40 days. This circumstance obliges me to postpone my departure for a few days, but I beg you, my Lord, to be persuaded that I shall hasten it as much as will be in my power, through the anxiety I feel to appear before you. 'Twill be to me a great satisfaction to assure you vis à voce of the very profound respect with which I am, my Lord,

Your most humble and most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. Berryer.

Brest, 10th December, 1760.

My Lord,

I feel more than any one else the impression which the loss of a great country must make on the mind of a Monarch, jealous of the glory of his arms. The late events have been so much the more mortifying to me as in a defensive career, long brilliant, I was not accustomed to humiliations; but, my Lord, circumstances have been such as to render it impossible to do better; the Council of War held with all the principal officers is proof of this; the posterior representation of Chevalier de Levis<sup>1</sup> was not the effect of relief arrived or of new resources discovered, but only of the conditions imposed on the troops by the enemy.

<sup>1</sup> FRANÇOIS, afterwards Duke, DE LEVIS, belonged to the ancient house of Mirepoix, and was born in 1720 at the castle of Ajac, in Languedoc. He entered early, as Chevalier de Levis, into the military service; was Aid-de-Camp to Marshal de Levis Mirepoix, with whom he captured two battalions of the enemy, near Montalban, by persuading them that they were surrounded by the whole French army. After his return from Canada, he served as Lieutenant-General in Germany and commanded the vanguard of the army under Condé, at the battle of Johannisberg, August 30th, 1762. The peace of Versailles terminated his military career, for he was promoted to be Governor of the Province of Artois. In 1771 Chevalier de Levis had conferred on him the command of a company of the guards of Monsieur, afterwards Louis XVIII. He was created Marshal of France in 1783; Duke de Levis in 1784, and died at Arras in 1787, in consequence of sickness which was aggravated by the effort he made to open the sittings of the States of Artois. This Assembly, to testify their respect for the character of this brave and good man, voted that he should be interred at the public expense, and erected a monument to his memory in the cathedral at Arras. The insane fury of the populace during the Revolution destroyed, however, both church and monument. Biographie Universelle. — Ed.

In such a situation, the impossibility of resistance being demonstrated, ought I to sacrifice all my people and even the troops, rather than submit to conditions doubtless little honorable to the [King's] arms, but the severity of which is somewhat balanced by the interests preserved to the Colony and the Colonists. Besides, my Lord, on this occasion there was no question of making a defence; the walls of Montreal did not permit any; it became necessary, then, to attack. Would not the glory of the King's arms have been rashly compromised in view of the disproportion of numbers, and the visible impression it was producing on the soldier. I doubt not M<sup>r</sup> de Levis and the superior officers of the troops speak of it in the same terms. Notwithstanding the desire they would have felt to do better, they have never been able to prevent themselves appreciating these inconveniences, more to be dreaded for them and for the glory of arms, than the onerous conditions of the capitulation.

In regard to what I have had the honor of observing in my letters of the month of June, the uncertainty of the forces that the enemy could employ, the assurance I had received by your dispatches that the English were not sending any new forces to America, the hope of peace in the course of the campaign, founded upon all you did me the honor to observe to me; all that, my Lord, animated my confidence; its justification is in the extreme desire I felt to preserve the Colony to the King. I shall not fail, my Lord, to execute what you have prescribed to me in regard to the officers who have come with me from Canada.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL

P. S. The continuation of my fit of the gout detains me still here in spite of myself.

Observations on certain Peculations in New France.

In 1750, the ship L'Original of 66<sup>s</sup> was lost at Quebec for want of order in the launching. Anchors at first, or some vessels kept in the offing to pay out a hawser to that ship, would have prevented the current in the middle of the river, whither she was propelled, carrying her to Ance des Mers, a quarter of a league above and on the same side as the ship yard; her bow was stove in on a rock at a fathom's distance from the shore; there were twenty feet of water under the stern post; there was a cable ashore on a corps mort for caution, which having caught, had to be cut; one of the persons, the cause of this loss, had nevertheless S @ 10,000 livres for the iron taken from L'Original dépressé.

There had been, at that time, and up to 1758, vessels built by a company which seized on the entire commerce and coasting trade of the Colony; this manœuvre was protected; there was sent from France in the same taste, everything necessary, or supposed to be so, to the service, without any verifications; the magazines in town and in the country, were the same; in fine, everything was carried off from the Quebec settlements that was accumulating in them down to the very shalots, to send them elsewhere; after the most severe scarcity had raised the price of every article to the highest point, a storekeeper publicly retained at Montreal a sloop loaded with butter; this was in September, when everybody was laying up his winter supplies. The merchant began to retail his butter at eleven sous the pound, but the keeper of the store, quite at ease in regard to the police, offered 13 sous for the whole, too well assured of gaining by the speculation.

Sticks of timber belonging to the King's yard were sold at 5 @. 6<sup>s</sup> the cubic foot as damaged, to a supposed individual; this same timber was used for field carriages and other artillery necessities at 30 and some sous; they had become petrified, no doubt.

In 1755, when Mr Dieskau was in command of the troops, two of the King's clerks were named Commissaries to that General's army, when he went to attack the George intrenchment on Lake St. Sacrament or George, on the confines of New-York. The French possessed in the vicinity, Forts Carillon and St. Frederic on Lake Champlain, 20 leagues south of Montreal; those appointments were, at first, found very proper; but things changed; these honest men were dismissed, and through connections, the office was given to a favorite officer, who knew enough to give the stores, where he realized what he pleased, a preference over his profession. Bad articles were delivered to the troops, who gave strong proofs of their sensibility of the fact. When Mr Dieskau was repulsed from that intrenchment, some Indians went at Carillon to notify this confidant of the stores thereof, adding: Comrade, the French are all dead. He left incontinently the frontier fort, and fell back on Saint Frederic. Repose is necessary in trade.

The consumptions were beyond measure, and the transportation of goods, which were not furnished, was so much the more onerous, as the major part was often stolen or dissipated, no one being responsible for what he had in his charge.

In January, 1760, it was difficult to get a Montreal clerk to be responsible for the clothing of the troops and for other indispensable articles of great scarcity, destined for Isle aux Noix. This commissary made bales, and saw bales made, of them, conducted them carefully because he was forced to do so; returned from his mission in three days, without stopping on the way, for which he was applauded; previously it required a month, and the robberies succeeded each other in the stoppages and on the road; but a procès-verbal of a bale or puncheon  $\frac{1}{4}$  @.  $\frac{1}{2}$  or  $\frac{3}{4}$  empty of the goods, provisions or liquors they contained or should contain at starting, was all the satisfaction for the robbery.

Had provisions, &c., been economised at the beginning of this war, they would not have fallen short so early; at the posts on Lake Champlain, the horses were fed on bread; 'tis true 'twas the surplus of the rations of two pounds, which quantity many do not eat, and the contractor does not give tickets of savings, because bread was yet cheap; but it would have been proper to have baked and delivered only what could be eaten and that the King or the contractor should have credited the soldiers with the overplus at the current price of provisions, in order to economise this object so important in a country where 'twas to be feared the enemy would cut off all communication with France, whence the most of the provisions were brought during the war; there were in the Colony regiments to spare and legions of Indians came down to Quebec, a distance of 1,200 leagues. So little economy was observed in this regard, that the best tables and the greatest facilities, which was not the case everywhere, were to be found with those entrusted with the King's provisions. That will be too much the case always, if striking examples are not made; and the superiors of those fellows must absolutely have neglected the King's interests or be partners in the waste and plunder.

This conduct, which creates a scarcity of everything at once, has given rise to mutinies among the troops; one occurred in 1755 or 1759 at Carillon, one in 1760 at Isle aux Noix; it follows that no parties have been sent out which were occasioning extraordinary consumptions. The Indians never bring back any part of what they receive for a scouting or war expedition; a month's provisions are devoured in 8 days or less, if they return sooner. The Canadians might have easily waged this war. The same defect has prevented the English being harassed during the winter of '59 @ '60 in the environs of Quebec; who, unable to obtain a cord of wood for fuel and the ovens, would have been obliged to surrender.

It has been generally asserted, at the time Quebec was besieged by the French in the spring of 1760, a single ship would have accomplished that object; the English appeared in the roadstead the first, the siege was raised; had it been the French, the enemy would have surrendered voluntarily or by force, notwithstanding the scarcity of ammunition. Then, a French fleet, over lazy, was obliged to take refuge in the Bay of Chaleurs in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, not being able to get up to Quebec. The effects of this fleet ought to have been delivered in greater quantity to the Acadians, wandering and wretched for five years. The enemy profited by this want of vigilance; 'tis no less certain that they would not after the capitulation, have met the crowd at the sortie from the post of Ristigouche, had consent been previously given to the baking of a supply of biscuit in case of accident. In fact, that post would have been rather evacuated when orders were sent to return to France; previously the coasts of Acadia cost the King considerable, although it was a time when the advance to the farmer consisted of the bit for a bridle, spurs, fans, &c.

In 1758, Fort Frontenac on Lake Ontario contained all the provisions, merchandise, ammunition and the presents for the posts of the Upper country, but being guarded only by 45 men, M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm expressed his impatience and apprehension on this point; that post required much more people; an English army of 4,000 men which was long known to be in the vicinity, laid siege to it and immediately captured it; half the people that had to be levied in the district of Montreal, when this news arrived, would have sufficed to preserve that precious object; the enemy burnt, sunk, and, in addition, carried off the fleet of schooners detained in port.

At the close of 1758, preparations were making at Detroit, a most considerable post situated between Lake Erie and Lake Huron, to send provisions for the relief of Niagara, to the Beautiful river, whence they were ordinarily forwarded; this plan approved at first, was afterwards set aside, as these provisions, &c., were required for the private and invincible trade of some person in that very post itself, and at those of the Mis-à-vis and Ouyatanons quite near. In the spring of 1759, 150 Militia, almost all belonging to Fort Duquesne, who had wintered at Detroit, were also detained under pretext of the necessity of making a ditch around the stockaded fort which tumbled down immediately; authority was abused; there was no cause for apprehension, 1,800th of a tax on the entire post, but the workmen were paid, in fact, out of the King's stores. Had those Militia and several farmers gone early to the relief of Fort Machault, a frontier post on the Oyo and had the provisions destined for it been forwarded there at the same time, Fort Niagara, the key of the Upper posts, would not have been stripped, for the sake of peltries, of 400 of the best men, and of provisions for the Beautiful river; that fort was immediately afterwards besieged, it held out 15 @ 17 days, but 'twould have successfully resisted had the force not been divided; that post taken, all the others fall of course.

At Detroit the people desolated by their taxes, wished to abandon their farms; those only were permitted to do so who ceded them to the receiver of the land tax. The letters were intercepted by the Commandant for fear the Court would be informed of these manœuvres. Nephew du Cours is storekeeper.

At Montreal, in 1760, some honest people paid for articles belonging to the King 4<sup>s</sup> p<sup>c</sup> above the price in France, to replace those they had lost in the service and others were giving only cent per cent for their ordinary necessaries. 'Tis pretended also, that the old levy of wheat was very critical.

One of the contractor's clerks, conducting a large quantity of provisions and ammunition from Montreal to Frontenac, on the river, wished the Captain of the transport between that and Niagara to take charge of his provisions according to the invoice, of which he was the bearer. The casks and barrels appeared full, but they were not so, in fact, by a great deal; part of the flour was rotten, and moreover, stove in at one end. This Captain was advised not to take charge of anything for the King, for whom ordinarily supplies were taken at Frontenac on his account, for, as things would turn out, 'twould be necessary to explain that such barrels were only half full, &c. The clerk did not wish that; he was answered that the Commandant of Niagara would make his remarks on the invoice; he had the hardihood to say that he should surely take some out; at all events this half postille [a]. He was one of those men of whom there are hundreds, who, from being half naked on coming to Canada, have had 100,000 francs 100,000 écus 2 @. 3 years after.

In the spring of 1759, 2 months before the siege of Niagara, there was at the River aux Bœufs only very bad bread, and a pound a day at that; no brandy for the detachment for Fort Machault, and, at the same time, the Indians remarked: "'Tis not the French who are fighting, 'tis we;" 50 men, without succor, formed the garrison of the latter fort. Again, Detroit could then do without men and provisions in that quarter; navigation being open since the beginning of March for other things, ought to have been for that in preference.

At the Little Fort of Niagara, the Carrying place was worth whatever one pleased; the effects of which the King was to pay the freight, being estimated by him who received the pay therefor himself.

The workmen of the fort were rather employed in the spring of 1759, at that portage, in making shoes and in private speculation; they were not the less paid by the King.

Entire families of adopted Indians were going for a Frenchman, the Com<sup>d</sup> of the Little Fort, to make la taille at the Large Fort of Niagara; this was permitted only to the Indians themselves; they obtained for peltry, worth about a beaver, a pot and  $\frac{1}{2}$  of brandy, which cost only 35 sous the pot.

This beaver was often paid at the Little Fort by Indians for a loaf, no doubt, from the stores, and brandy, disbursed so sparingly by the King to the Nations, was then worth 2 Louis. The Commissary's clerk and those attached to that Frenchman, have been seen making the most rapid trade at the Little Fort; liquors, bread, ornaments adapted to those Nations, were selling in abundance for peltries, which ought not to be the case there.

In the beginning of the autumn of 1759, at the close of the siege of Quebec, the General of the French troops was defeated and killed when the enemy landed at l'Ance des mers, a very precipitous hill. That General made very great efforts. General Wolf was killed also, but about 3,000 men, whom the former had by platoons, were forced to give way before 5,000 picked soldiers; their landing was a feint. Quebec was to receive in the night from 3 Rivers some bateaux of provisions; the enemy was aware of the fact; whilst approaching in barges at day-break, they answered the sentinel on shore:—This is flour from three Rivers—a landing is effected and the guard seized. This happened within musket-shot of Quebec; the major part of the troops in the general camp at Beauport,  $\frac{1}{2}$  a league below that town, received orders to abandon baggage and ammunition to go, partly in disorder, through the woods to Jacques Cartier, instead of helping M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm, and Quebec was surrendered to the English without firing a shot. Such is the general opinion; 'twas thought, perhaps, that provisions would fail; many inhabitants of the town had considerable, notwithstanding. Biscuit was promised from Jacques Cartier; perhaps people wish it. 'Tis also asserted that there were letters; one to capitulate: another to make a defence, and certainly the enemy would not be any better able than the French to open the trench, earth being scanty towards the country, which is a cape.

The general capitulation concluded at Montreal has been foreseen by the French who were not too well stocked with means to resist the enemy, as almost all the warlike stores had remained at Quebec. The Nations were discouraged by the fall of Niagara, where they procured all their necessaries. Nevertheless, General Muré, the Commandant of Quebec, permitted, notwithstanding his barbarity, but he was interested, that refreshments and liquors should be taken from his quarters for certain French favorites at Montreal.

The troops were no less in total want of brandy and salt at the posts.

At that of La Présentation, where great waste prevailed, people reformed by passing the supplying of fire-wood by the King; as regards the baking of bread for the Nations, the provision contractor had caused his traveling deputy to establish that fraudulent practice.

It may be added to the article of the 50 lucky fellows, that some have had millions nearly; that is to say, more or less simple clerks were keeping their tables, clothes, carriages, and spending like Lords in times of great distress. There are some who at present are issuing bills of exchange at any price people please, because they have plenty of them. 'Twere proper that such things were marked, in order that the most legitimate may be liquidated at their price.

Many farms and houses in Canada and in France have sprung out of these fortunes.

In regard to the Little Niagara fort, it may be said, that some accommodating Squaws have cost the King very dear at some of the posts.

ARTICLE ON ACADIA.

On the 11th July, 1760, Abbé Maniac, the Missionary of the Bay des Ouyacs, or Miramichi, went over suddenly to the English with 15 Acadian families and some Indians; he had abandoned a rich chapel and published, some time previously, at the church door, to the Acadians that he had orders from the enemy to enjoin on them, on pain of punishment, to denounce all the movements of the French that they should be informed of.

This Abbé had, in September, the audacity to write to Beausejour, that having Micmacks in that quarter, he had pursued his object; he was their Missionary.

Memoir on the Boundaries of Canada. By M. Dumas.

'Tis supposed that the plenipotentiaries named for the future Congress, are incapable of adopting the frivolous ideas entertained in France respecting our possessions in Canada; statesmen have notions different from the simple vulgar. The French are too volatile and too superficial to trouble themselves about the future; but Ministers whom wisdom has selected and ability directs, will, of themselves, observe that the interests of commerce, the progress of navigation, the good of the State and the King's glory necessarily require that the restitution of Canada be laid down as a preliminary in the Treaty of peace.

In more favorable conjunctures, we would be justified in demanding of the English damages corresponding to the enormous depredation of our Marine, as well commercial as national, but the circumstances which will exist at the conclusion of the peace, are to decide the sacrifices we shall be obliged to make, or the advantages which are possibly to result therefrom.

Commerce has changed the face of Europe; it is now evident that in the long run the more commercial nation will become the more powerful.

We can no longer dispense with America without falling sensibly from our state of splendor.

On the restitution of Canada depends the fate of the rest of our Colonies.

These principles, clearer than the day, once admitted, that restitution ought to form the basis and foundation of the Treaty of peace.

But will the work of our Ministers be durable? For want of local knowledge, will they be in a condition to manage, beneficially, the interests of the King and Nation in this regard? Will they prevent the subterfuges in which English trickery will not fail to envelop them? Will they desire peace, do they desire it to be lasting? Will they renounce that system of maritime despotism which constitutes the sole object of their policy? Will they not preserve a constant hankering to render themselves masters of the whole of America? And will they not allow it to appear, when we shall be least on our guard? Incapable of accomplishing that project now, in consequence of the exhaustion of their finances, will they not renew it at another time? In front of an enemy so active, so ambitious, so enterprising, conjectures are as good as demonstrations; the past cannot render us too cautious for the future.

By a fatality which cannot be comprehended, the English were better acquainted than we before the war, with the topographical map of our possessions. Aided by similar help, what advantage do they not possess to cheat us? To this object, then, should be directed all the prudence and sagacity of our plenipotentiaries.

BOUNDARIES.

I limit their labors, respecting Canada, to four general objects:

- 1st The entire property of both shores of the River and Gulf of St Lawrence.
- 2nd The property of the lakes and rivers which form the natural communication between Canada and Louisiana; they consist of Lake Ontario, Lake Erié and the Ohio.
- 3rd That neither of the two Nations can form any establishments on the rivers watering the possessions of the other.
- 4th That both Colonies shall exist and increase by population, without covering their frontiers with advanced posts, which is a principal of jealousy, suspicion and distrust; an occasion always at hand or a pretext often specious, for a rupture between the two Nations.

As for the first article; to cede to the English, as they pretend, the entire peninsula of Acadia is to reduce ourselves, evidently, to a precarious possession. That peninsula is susceptible of an immense population; its position is one of the most advantageous both for the erection of fortifications and of posts there. Solid settlements, of every description, can be found there; agriculture can be followed with the greatest success. In vain would France flatter herself that she would preserve, in peace, the possession of the mouth of the river, if the English obtained the entire cession of that peninsula. Already masters of Newfoundland, they should grant us the property of a country whereof they would guard the entrance.

The Peace will scarcely be signed, when the activity of that ambitious people will be revived; soon will they be seen establishing themselves on the North side of that peninsula and neglecting the remainder, if necessary, in order to transport to that quarter all their industry in favor of plantations.

What service would not the plenipotentiaries be rendering the State, if by their ability they would induce the English to consent to a division of that peninsula, so that France should preserve the property of the Northern part, from Cape Canso to Minas?

But if their zeal become useless; if English firmness leave no hope on that point, they ought to be prepared to rather break all conference than to give up one inch of ground on that continent. 'Tis evident that our Colony would lose thereby all communication with the metropolis; we should no longer possess the free entrance of the river, except so far as the English would think proper. The lines of demarcation which separate the respective possessions on the map, annexed to this Memoir,<sup>1</sup> are drawn in accordance with the largest sacrifices that it is possible for France to make. 'Tis for the plenipotentiaries to take advantage of favorable events to obtain the best terms; but in all possible reverses 'twill be more advantageous for the King and the State to renounce Canada and consequently Louisiana, which cannot exist without it, than to cede an inch of territory beyond that division.

The blue color indicates the French possessions.

The red indicates the British possessions.

The green, what can be ceded towards Hudson's bay; should events require France to make further additional sacrifices.

I have said, and repeat it, Louisiana cannot exist for us without Canada. But 'tis more advantageous for France promptly to cede these two Colonies to the English, than to accept conditions worse than those indicated by the lines drawn on that map.

On this hypothesis, let the River Pentagouet be the boundary of the English possessions on the continent on the N. E., and let them be precluded from settling only the right bank.

Let the River St. John bound the French settlements and let them be precluded from settling only the left bank.

The territory between these two rivers shall perpetually remain neutral and undivided between both nations, as marked on the map by the yellow color.

The second object of the labor of our plenipotentiaries relative to Canada, regards the communication of that Colony with Louisiana. The projects of the English would be accomplished beyond their hopes, were the freedom of that communication not stipulated and solidly established by the treaty of peace; 'twould be separating two Colonies which cannot sustain themselves except by their immediate affinity. Now, that communication can occur only by the Ohio; every other route renders it very difficult, often even impracticable. 'Tis essential then to insist strongly on the entire possession of the Ohio.

That river, navigable throughout all its course for very large craft, threatens Louisiana afar, and combines the advantage of distance in concealing preparations, with that of extreme rapidity of current for promptitude of execution.

To make the Ohio the boundary of the respective Colonies, is to surrender it entirely to the English. In fact, already the English population is advancing towards that river, it has only one step to take to clear the Apalachies, and that step would be taken on the day after the signing of the treaty. The left bank of the Ohio would be under English cultivation in less than four years, whilst our population would not reach that point in the space of a century. Who does not perceive in that explanation the approaching and inevitable fall of Louisiana?

The entire possession of the Ohio cannot then be too much insisted on, the Apalachies constituting the limits; but if events were such as to force us to give way on that important article, the only middle course to adopt is marked on the map by the yellow color; namely, to leave the course of that river neutral, unsettled, without ownership, free to both nations to convey on it their goods for movable trade, with express reservation to France of the communication between both those Colonies.

The possession of Lakes Ontario and Erié, which is the consequence of that communication, is a point of the greatest interest to us, the rather as for want thereof those lakes assure another passage by the Miamis and Ouabache rivers, more difficult, more uncertain, but which furnishes nevertheless, a resource in times of misfortune. I admit that very favorable events would be required to reduce the English to abandon the South shore of Lake Ontario of which they are a long time in possession through Fort Choueguen; a possession usurped but constant and, as it were, unopposed; an empty protest by the French government, when the first foundations of that post were laid is the only contradiction they have experienced.

If circumstances were such, on the conclusion of the peace, as that France had to make good its advantages, that would be the moment to protest against that usurpation. This important object merits the greatest attention of our plenipotentiaries. It is sufficient to consider the course of the waters to perceive that that Lake commands the whole of Canada. General Amherst has found no route more certain for invasion; the event has not over justified his principles and mine.

If, on the contrary, we are reduced to take back Canada in the same condition that we possessed it before the war, France might consent to confine its cultivated settlements to the North shore of Lake Ontario, leaving the South shore free from the Bay of Niaouré to the River Niagara.

The English would preserve the freedom of conveying their merchandise for movable trade to the mouth of the Chouaguen river, and could extend themselves only to the Onondaga river on one side and as far as the River à la Famine on the other.

But nothing should make France give up the property of the soil, so that the freedom of trade granted to the English, could not at any time invest them with a title thereto.

Let their possessions be always confined to the heads of the rivers by which they are watered, and let the height of land be constantly the limit between the two nations.

The entire possession of Lake Erie ought to belong to France incontestably up to the head waters of the streams that empty into that lake on the South side; the rivers flowing towards the Ohio are included in the neutrality proposed by that river.

The 3<sup>d</sup> object proposed at the head of this Memoir will be rendered clearer by a brief reflection.

The English are ten to our one in America. But if passing the height of lands, we should push our posts as far as the heads of the rivers which water the English Colonies, all their superiority in numbers, means and resources would not guarantee them against an invasion when it should please us to attempt it.

He who meditates an expedition prepares it secretly, and when 'tis time to put it in execution, if he have in his favor the current of the stream which conveys him with rapidity, he surprises his enemy and infallibly succeeds; the same is not the case where the aggressor has to ascend the rivers, has portages to make, lakes to traverse and mountains to pass; the immense preparations necessary to be made for that purpose, discover the movement, and the slowness of the execution affords time to the menaced province to place itself in a state of defence.

The English Colonies are in the latter position in respect to Canada, and Canada would be in the first relative to the English Colonies were the English to advance their settlements on Lake Champlain, Lake Ontario or the Ohio.

I am fully convinced, and every man of sense who is conversant with the manner in which war can be carried on in that country, will agree with me that all the resources of the state will never preserve Canada if the English are once settled at the heads of our rivers. 'Tis, again, one of the conditions which must never be consented to. Should peace be concluded under unfavorable circumstances to France, I point out the only middle course to be adopted, which is the neutrality of certain districts; such might Lake St. Sacrament be without great prejudice to us, provided the English confine their settlements to the sources of the waters flowing into the River of Orange.

Come we now to the fourth principle:

I know nothing more useless in that country than forts to cover the frontiers; they are equally a burthen to both Nations, which have an equal interest in demolishing them; they are, in time of peace, a source of useless expense, and experience has demonstrated that, in time of war, they would be good for nothing. These frontier posts are adapted only to create difficulties, to afford umbrage and sometimes furnish pretexts for a rupture.

They would favor that Nation which would preserve the desire to seize the possessions of the other. By aid of those stand-points, it would pounce on its enemy when least expected, whilst every considerable enterprise becomes more difficult, more tedious, were they no longer in existence. If entrepôts must be established, the step forward is a cry "To arms!"

The French plenipotentiaries will labor usefully for that Colony, and more profitably still for the Royal Treasury, if they agree with the British Ministers on not preserving any post on the frontiers on either side; thus, Choueguen and Niagara will be demolished.

That does not exclude useful settlements in the interior of the possessions, either relatively to trade or otherwise, which each Nation is to be at liberty to direct, according to its interests; but merely on what is called frontier, an outlet which may tend to supply means of an invasion.

To place matters at the worst, if the fortune of war be unfavorable to France this campaign, and peace be concluded in an unpropitious moment for us:

If, in order to obtain the conditions I propose, we be under the necessity of making new sacrifices in any part of Canada, the least dangerous for us would be to allow more extent to the English possessions in the direction of Hudson's bay. Let us cede to them the whole of Lake Superior rather than one inch of territory in the south part, at this side the height of land or the Apalachies. That sacrifice, which is to be made by France at the most critical moment, is marked by the green color on the map.

Anything beyond those lines of demarcation, and France must give up Canada, inasmuch as it is evident she cannot preserve it; moreover, to maintain ourselves in that state, the Minister must essentially and constantly occupy himself therewith, but above all things, must men be carefully selected, to whom the government, the police and finances are to be confided.

Otherwise, we shall labor for our enemies. Canada, bathed in the blood of our unfortunate Colonists, will soon be the appendage of the English. Our clearances, our settlements, our villages, will be so much fruit to be gathered by them when they have arrived at maturity.

Let the height of land and the Apalachies be the limits between the two peoples! Nature appears to have marked them expressly. The caprice of man cannot change that barrier always permanent and always ready to protest against the usurper. People aspire to a factitious peace when they seek to establish it on arbitrary lines which the revolutions of time or the interests of men can destroy. 'Tis, perhaps, a fault into which have fallen our ablest negotiators, yet 'tis the most important object of a treaty of peace, since it destroys or foment the fatal germ which is the occasion of most wars.

The height of land and the Apalachies once determined on as the line of separation between the two Colonies, the modification, the compromises I propose by neutralizing certain districts, may be admitted according as circumstances will be more or less favorable to France, when peace will be concluded.

One reflection more remains to be submitted, which, although not bearing directly on the boundaries, is, nevertheless, very intimately connected with them.

Considering the enormous expense entailed on us by the service of Indians in the war, I have always thought that the King would maintain at much less expense in Canada a permanent corps of troops capable of defending it at all times, and when I have weighed, with reflection, the utility of their assistance, I have found it to be only one of opinion and prejudice. But this prejudice is founded on the terror inspired by their cruelty and barbarity in their customs; it consequently will preserve its power.

This terror will be always very useful to the Nation which will be best able to manage the alliance and attachment of those people. We possess one real advantage over the English in this regard; let us carefully avoid doing it the smallest damage by any convention with our enemies which could cause the Indians to suspect our alliance and good faith. However simple and natural such an accord might be, the English would not fail to present it to the Indians in a light that would render it odious to them. These people are proud, jealous, suspicious and vindictive; an appearance of defection on our part, after all the blood they have poured out in our defence, would render them irreconcilable to us from generation to generation, and that would be the greatest of misfortunes for both our Colonies. Our plenipotentiaries ought to be distrustful on this point. I am fully convinced that the British Ministers will set snares for them on this point, which is of more importance for them in America than the gain of many battles.

As for the rest, a Governor-General, instructed and attentive, will know how to maintain the alliance of all the people of this continent in peace as in war, without those enormous expenses which knavery conducts and ignorance tolerates.

M. Bourlamaque to M. Accaron.

My Lord,

I take the liberty to address you a Memoir on Canada. You will be able to see the objects treated therein by a recapitulation at the end of the Memoir. 'Tis the fruit of my inactivity since I returned from Malta, and of my information acquired in that Colony during the five years that I have been employed there. 'Tis true that actual circumstances do not permit of this Memoir being of any utility. But independent of the public not being able to penetrate the views of those who govern, these circumstances may change, and I have thought it my duty at all hazards to render you an account of my labors and ideas. At the worst, this Memoir will let you know the desire I feel to be useful and my zeal for all that appertains to the King's service.

I am with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Paris, 1st August, 1762.

Memoir on Canada by M. de Bourlamaque.

Were an opinion to be formed respecting this Colony from the expenses which it has occasioned during the war, and the profits derived from it since its establishment, its possession would appear disadvantageous to France. But in seeking for the causes of those expenses and the sources of those profits, it will be easy to convince oneself that the errors of administration have produced the one and dried up the other.

It is not pretended, however to enter into the detail of those errors, and still less to cast suspicions on the conduct of those who have been charged therewith; but it can be asserted without rashness that since the commencement of the century, Canada has been governed on false principles both as to its increase and its commerce, either because those who had the administration thereof have been wanting in sagacity, union and that tone of truth so necessary to instruct Ministers on distant objects, or that the Court has paid too little attention to the resources and interests of the country.

The military department has not been treated more successfully; no arrangement during the peace, no frontier solidly established nor even recognized, no reasonable project for defence or attack; a few troops but without form, instruction or discipline; no magazines, and the sole resource, a blind confidence which, united to the base apprehension of displeasing, promised successes instead of pointing out wants.

Hence it has arisen, that the war could be sustained only so long as the enemy would be weak or ill conducted. For, although the efforts of the troops and the fidelity of the inhabitants have retarded the loss of the Colony up to the moment of the most frightful scarcity, it can, nevertheless, be asserted that the second campaign would have been the term of the defence, had the enemy, who were infinitely more numerous, had, at the commencement of the war, chiefs of the slightest experience.

I do not speak here of private interest and cupidity, shameful vices which cannot be attributed to people in office, but which do not fail to injure the public good, by infecting subalterns, whenever the chiefs want sagacity or firmness.

Honors almost equal and an equal authority between the Governor and Intendant, might well have sometimes been a source of abuse. If these two men are equally capable, they will be enemies, because it is the part of humanity not to desire any one to participate glory and favor; and each of them will seek, perhaps, to degrade the views of his colleague, either directly or by underhand means. If one of them be superior in talent, the weaker will equally endeavor to injure him, because vanity and jealousy are still more frequent among men of middling minds than among others, or else he will become his creature and echo. 'Twould be necessary then to place confidence in only one or divide it among three.

When the French commenced settling Canada, the natives of the country waged a cruel and obstinate war against them; thence, the Colonists accustomed themselves to entertain a great respect for the Indians. It has since existed notwithstanding their weakness and the augmentation of the forces of the Colony. 'Twas believed, up to the last moment, and an effort was made to persuade the Court, that their alliance was almost sufficient to repel the English. The expenses have been prodigal in order to please them; or that confidence has at least served as a pretext for excessive expenditure. Experience ought to have corrected the error as to the aid to be expected from them. The Indians are good for petite guerre, and when well disposed, a General will derive great benefit from them in the way of obtaining intelligence and making prisoners; but this is all. The best are at most huzzars; besides, they act well in their way only when one is in possession of a decided superiority. They cost a great deal, famish an army, are importunate and occupy to much of the Chief's time, and although despised by the soldier, are capable of discouraging him on every occasion. I believe it to be essential, then, to preserve the alliance of the Indians, as much for the interest of our trade as to constitute members in war; but we must not either fear them, or rely too much on their assistance; by treating them with justice and firmness, they will be rendered much better. Complaisance renders them insolent, very costly and less useful.

We shall omit here the advantages the possession of Canada will confer, as regards the navy, which requires sailors experienced by commerce; the benefit to be derived from it by our manufactures to which Colonial luxury assures the sale of old fashioned goods; we shall confine ourselves to giving an idea of the useful productions which the Kingdom can obtain from that country.

The soil of Canada produces grain of every description in abundance; if cultivated ever so little, 'twill furnish much more than is necessary for its inhabitants. Sufficient might be exported to feed our American islands and even the maritime provinces of the Kingdom, which are sometimes in want thereof. Hemp grows there quite well; cattle are abundant, and will furnish, when required, hides, salted provisions and wool, much superior to those of France, and almost equal to those of England. This last particular especially merits great consideration. Cod is caught at the mouth of the River St. Lawrence and on the western shores of the Gulf. In Canada are found building timber, which will pass as very good when well selected, if private interest does not succeed in depreciating it; in all cases, the commercial navy will purchase its ships there, as the English do in New England. The stave trade will not be more difficult for us there than for our neighbors. Tar and the gums are abundant. Mines of iron are found there, demanding only good management, and even lead in the districts bordering on the River Mississippi.

The major part of the above objects have been of little consideration up to this time, because no permanent measure has ever been adopted to increase the cultivation of the soil and the cattle—sources of inexhaustible wealth for that country. The iron mines and ship building have not been of any great use; the extraordinary price of labor has absorbed the profits thereof. Doubtless it has not been perceived that this has been caused by the negligence of the government, for it is not with a Colony which produces the materials of subsistence, as with our American islands. Labor may be a little dearer there than in Europe, but 'twill never be so high as it has been in Canada whenever the credit of specie will be maintained and attention paid to primary matters. Monopoly has been sometimes seen to invade the commerce of primary productions in the interior and produce a scarcity on an abundant soil, but which, like all others, experiences years of sterility.

The fur trade, which appeared alone to fix attention, will doubtless be more considerable when the posts where the Indian trade is carried on, shall no longer be in the hands of private individuals who, fixing an arbitrary price on the goods they furnish and on those they receive, discourage the Hunter, and excite in him the desire to convey his skins to the foreigner. The monopoly of the beaver conferred on the Company of the Indies must be prejudicial, for every privilege of that description is a licensed monopoly, and the license does not remedy frauds.

The rage for extending its power afar has always exhausted the strength of Canada. The interior of a country, rich in all sorts of productions and bare of farmers, has been neglected, to go and plant new settlements of no use, and without any communication; the expenses thereof have been immense; agriculture has been thereby arrested; the most robust youth annually destroyed, and only a small number of private individuals benefitted, who have found therein the source of their fortune at the King's expense.

On this occasion, we cannot avoid saying, that whatever limits the English prescribe to us in that part of the world, as long as France shall retain both banks of the River St. Lawrence and the tributary streams, from its mouth to Lake Ontario, and the power of trading with the Indian Nations by the lakes and the Grand river, even without any property in those lakes, we shall have lost nothing except chimeras and shall not be deprived of the source of real wealth.

As for the rest, I do not deny that it would be more advantageous to the French to possess, alone, posts on the Lakes, to exclude the English from all commerce in that quarter; but this advantage would have reference only to peltries, and our loss in this respect, in consequence of more confined boundaries, would be of little moment, in comparison with what would remain ours in the interior of the country. Those who pretend that, if a treaty of peace reduce our boundaries ever so little, 'twould be better to cede the entire Colony, understand very imperfectly the advantages that might accrue to it from a good administration, and, doubtless, reason as some Canadians do, who, having spent their lives trading with Indians, know no other interest and direct all their views to that.

'Twere useless to demonstrate the advantage the possession of Canada would confer on France, if the impossibility of defending it oblige us to expect the destruction of our hopes at the first moment of a rupture; but fortunately, nature has endowed that country with means of defence. The only question is, to employ the season of peace in turning them to advantage.

Canada is open to attack only from Lake Ontario, Lake Champlain and the River St. Lawrence.

I suppose the English masters of the sea; but I suppose at the same time, that the Governor has taken care to form magazines of provisions in sufficient abundance to feed the troops during a campaign, should a year of barrenness occur in the course of the war. I suppose, again, that arms and ammunition have been sent him before the means of transportation are intercepted. Thus, 'tis for him to form his plan of defence, independent of aid from Europe.

'Tis necessary that he have this plan before his eyes the very moment France will reënter into possession of Canada, and that he lose not a single day, without working at its execution.

On the Lake Ontario side no great fear need be entertained, if people are willing to remain at the Rapids of Cataracoui. That frontier will be impenetrable, if ever so little advantage be taken of the favorable positions those Rapids afford. A few properly located forts and troops very inferior to the assailants, will be sufficient for defence. 'Tis true that in 1760, Major-General Amherst who was Commander-in-Chief of the English troops, selected that frontier to attack Canada, with the main army. He was aware of it being impossible for us to send any troops there, and of the resolution of the domiciliated Indians of the Colony to abandon our alliance; besides he dreaded, or feigned to dread, the post of Isle aux Noix which he had respected the preceding year, and wished to prove that, if he had not completed the conquest of Canada in 1759, the fault ought to be imputed to Brigadier Gages whom he had commissioned to penetrate by those Rapids. However that may be, that choice of attack does little honor to his military knowledge; the defection of the Indians and of the corps of Militia to whom the defence of the Rapids had been confided, saved his army from utter annihilation,

On the Lake Champlain side, Ile aux Noix furnishes an excellent post. It is situated in the middle of the River St. John, and if ramparts and casemates are constructed there, it may be guaranteed as impregnable. 'Tis true that it defends only the channel of the river, and that both banks may be traveled beyond the range of cannon shot. But the country is most of the time overflowed and passable only in extremely dry seasons. There will, then, remain the resource of amusing the enemy in the woods by a flying camp, which will draw subsistence by the River St. John or the River St. Lawrence, whilst the enemy will be obliged to make his transportation by wagons in a country intersected by marshes and creeks with a fort in his rear. A very inferior corps will then possess a great advantage to prolong the campaign until the arrival of forces capable of fighting him on the setting in of the rains which overflow the country. 'Tis necessary, moreover, to have a fort on the same river in the rear of Ile aux Noix, and some small armed vessels which will find shelter at that Island, secure its communication with the lower part of the river, and prevent the enemy throwing bateaux below Ile aux Noix, after having made the portage in front of that island. It may be asserted even that if we could have a superior navy on Lake Champlain, 'twould be very difficult for the enemy to undertake anything this side the lake.

I now suppose that the enemy, notwithstanding those difficulties, are strong enough and fortunate enough to render themselves masters of the country between Lake Champlain and the River St. Lawrence; the worst will be to evacuate all the settlements in that quarter, and to remove the farmers and cattle to the left bank of the river: These settlements will be laid waste, the river Chambly will experience some incursions of light troops, but so long as Ile aux Noix will hold out, as the enemy has no bateaux to cross the river, we shall be very sure to see him repass Lake Champlain at the close of the campaign, for, even though he should have sufficient pioneers to make a firm road to the bank of the river, and sufficient horses to transport bateaux and cannon, two or three armed bateaux on the River St. Lawrence would be sufficient to render the passage of it absolutely impossible for him.

In this plan for the defence of the Colony on the side of the lakes, I have reduced its boundaries greatly below what they were before this war, and I do not suppose any solid post at Niagara, Frontenac or at St. Frederic, because I do not think it possible to have during the peace, either the time or the means to give these posts the necessary strength. Besides 'tis the settlements of the Colony that require to be defended. These do not extend beyond the Rapids of Cataracoui and terminate five leagues below Ile aux Noix. To draw one's forces within a smaller compass in order to augment them, is an axiom so much the more true, as in the case under consideration, it will not produce any loss, and 'twere desirable that it had been practiced in the war which Canada had just sustained. Yet forts can be built at Niagara, Frontenac and St. Frederic when more essential objects will have been attended to.

On the sea side the River St. Lawrence affords no defence up to Quebec. It has often been remarked that there were islands or capes adapted to the closing the passage of the river. This is a mistake; a thousand fortresses below that town will not be able to prevent the enemy's ships reascending it. And even between Quebec and Point Levis, although the river be at that place only 600 toises wide, to stop ships there would require batteries on both sides of the river, which is an impossibility, because no fortress can be erected opposite Quebec that would not be excessively commanded. It would stay the enemy only the very brief time required to reduce it. Therefore, we shall be always restricted to the batteries of Quebec, and however formidable these may be, they will not stop ships which will take advantage of the wind and tide.

These inconveniences must not prevent Quebec being regarded as Canada's essential point of defence. A fortress can be constructed there capable of sustaining a long siege, and be abandoned to its own resources when the enemy will have forced the landing and acquired a decided superiority; then he will stop to besiege it, or endeavor to penetrate into the country. If he undertake the siege, supposing he have time to terminate it before the departure of the ships, and sufficient force cannot be mustered to oblige him to raise it, he will be very bold if he hazard leaving a garrison in Quebec during the winter. The French troops cantoned around the town will not permit that garrison to quit the covert-way without fighting. How can it be able to provide immense quantities of fuel necessary to pass the cold season? Where will it find cattle for the sick, who cannot be fed on salt meat? This plan of forming cantonments around Quebec was proposed in 1759, and would have forced the English to surrender the place in the midst of winter; but the Governor and Intendant, before whom it was laid, assured that the Colony was absolutely unable to furnish provisions necessary to feed the troops in those cantonments.

Should the enemy, instead of laying siege to Quebec, content himself with blockading its garrison with a portion of his army and undertake to penetrate into the interior of the country, then the defeated troops will retire ten leagues above Quebec, across the River Jacques Cartier, which forms an impenetrable barrier and covers, by land, all the left bank of the River St. Lawrence. The right bank, which is less important, is intersected, at nearly the same distance, by rivers and positions easily maintained, and the troops posted on those two banks will be able to sustain themselves and keep up a communication by crossing the river.

But 'tis not sufficient to be posted on both sides of the river, which is so wide that the enemy would easily remount it, without any opposition from the land batteries. 'Tis necessary to provide, before the war, some flat-bottomed frigates; that is to say, drawing 8 or 9 feet of water, each armed with 18 or 20 twenty-four pounders. They will fight advantageously those of the enemy, who will not dare compromise his ships of the Line in a river where the want of water would expose them to run aground at each instant.

If, nevertheless, the knowledge of the country had given him the idea of getting similar vessels built superior in number, the Richelieu Rapids, 14 leagues above Quebec, would still be remaining to stop them. Ships can remount that part of the river only one by one and with the aid of a strong wind. Four frigates anchored above those Rapids would easily destroy a hundred ships, one after the other. The troops, by fortifying themselves at those Rapids, will be able to prolong the campaign until bad weather sets in, and if Quebec hold out, the campaign will always wind up by the departure of the enemy.

'Tis to be observed that I have placed things at the worst; that I abandon Canada to its own resources, and that it is not to receive any succor from France; for, were a squadron sent before the arrival of the enemy, 'twould be morally impossible for the latter to remount the river above Quebec, even after having beaten that squadron, because its debris reunited with the navy of the country and placed in proper positions, would suffice to render the navigation of the river impracticable.

Neither have I mentioned the numberless defensive stratagems that may be employed, such as fire-ships (brulots) rafts and artificial fires, chains and gun-boats. I have supposed that the troops destined to prevent the landing have been defeated, and have remained very inferior to the enemy. 'Tis, nevertheless, improbable that the latter could transport a number of troops considerable enough to render the defensive very disproportionate.

This is so much the more true, as the three corps of troops which are to defend Canada, if it be simultaneously attacked on its three frontiers, have the advantage of being able to form a junction again whenever judged proper, in order to fight the enemy whose position will be the more uneasy, and afterwards return, each to its own district; whilst the enemy cannot establish any communication, nor even any precise concert between the different corps he will put in motion.

I think I may conclude, without rashness, that, in fortifying Quebec in a respectable manner, which is quite possible, the worst that will happen will be, after many reverses, to behold one-fourth of the settlements of the Colony destroyed. But the departure of the enemy will always leave the property thereof to the King, and as timber is very abundant there, this loss will soon be repaired. 'Tis even to be supposed that the enemy have the inhumanity and the opportunity to burn all the settlements he will have overrun. In regard to the grain and cattle, they will be sent up to parts where the enemy cannot penetrate. The destruction just mentioned need not even be feared, could a considerable number of flat-bottomed frigates and gun-boats be constructed previous to the war, in order to possess a superior Marine before Quebec.

I shall remark on this occasion what occurred in the campaign of 1759, which opened on our side without any preparations for Quebec. That town was not capable of sustaining a siege. No precaution was taken beforehand to close the river. A few merchant frigates, armed and commanded by some privateering officers, constituted our whole navy. The fire-ships were badly managed and were too few. The passage of the river below Quebec was not contested. The army, which opposed the landing, amounted to not more than 3,000

Regulars; the Militia who were joined to them were excessively diminished by desertion. The English, after having been repulsed on landing, surprised above Quebec a height that might have been very easily defended, and, having formed with great promptness, defeated on the 13th September our little army, which retired behind the River Jacques Cartier, without provisions, ammunition, artillery or tents. The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec opened his gates to the English without having been attacked. All these advantages did not give them confidence enough to dare ascend any higher than Quebec, although there were still six weeks of campaign. They contented themselves with posting a garrison in that place during the winter. Had Quebec been in a condition to sustain a siege of three months, what advantage would the English have derived from their landing and from the victory of the thirteenth of September?

After having disposed of the utility Canada may be to the Kingdom, and of the possibility of placing it in a position to defend itself, I proceed to hazard my ideas on the manner it ought to be governed and the expenses it would occasion during the peace.

'Tis necessary that the Governor of that Colony be a Military man, in order to be able to dispose it to sustain a war; a statesman, to promote agriculture, trade and the industry of the inhabitants; of a firm and active character, laborious himself and seeing to everything; jealous of the public good; an enemy of rogues and irreproachable as to interest. 'Tis proper the Court should fix a sum for the expenses of the Military, Marine and fortifications, the expenditure whereof should be left to his judgment.

'Tis no less essential that the Intendant should be an honest man, economical, enlightened, instructed in every department of government, police, justice, finance, agriculture, population, trade, industry, details of Marine, &c., vigilant of the King's interests and of those of his country; severe on the subject of swindling, and submissive to the authority of the Governor-General in all cases wherein the council hereinafter [mentioned] would not be assembled.

The head of the church ought to be a Bishop, who combines with the talents of a pastor, the knowledge of the most essential departments of the civil and political administration, and who is sufficiently enlightened to prevent religion being, in his hands, an obstacle to the good of the Colony.

The Court may invest the Governor-General with all authority when he will be such as above described; but as 'twill be necessary to secure the liberty of the citizen, and to provide against vexations, as well as against enterprizes which too extended a confidence might engage him to undertake of his own motion, there shall be appointed a Council of State, composed of the Governor-General, Bishop and Intendant. This Council shall meet whenever one of the three shall require it. Business shall be disposed of by a plurality of votes. Its decisions shall be recorded; copy of the registers shall be furnished each of the members to be sent to the Court, each of the three being responsible for his opinions.

There shall be a Secretary of the Council of State, whose duty it shall be to make a minute of the business to be discussed; to keep the register and do the writing, and make whatever copies appertain thereto.

Every citizen of the Colony who will have reason to complain of the Governor-General, shall be at liberty to apply to the Bishop or the Intendant, who, on the information they will take of the grievance, shall be entitled to cause the Council of State to be summoned, if the case appear to them worth the trouble.

They shall, one and the other, be at liberty to have the Council convoked whenever they will perceive that the Governor-General (military expenses excepted) will be guilty of innovation, which would appear to them in conflict with the public good or the King's interests, or whenever they will have, themselves, any useful novelty to propose.

The Governor-General shall assemble the Council of State also whenever he will consider himself obliged to make essential innovations, and conform to its decision, before having received the consent of the Court thereto. In regard to military matters, he shall render an account thereof only to the Court, whose instructions will serve him as a rule.

Justice shall be administered as usual in the Superior Council.

There shall be established at Quebec a Chamber of commerce whose deliberations and decisions shall be subject to the revision of the Council of State, which will not prevent such Chamber of commerce reporting directly to the Court its decisions or whatever propositions it will have submitted to the Council of State.

It shall be composed of the most experienced merchants, and there shall be allowed, on the report of the Governor-General, some honorary reward to the members of that Board who will have proposed the most useful means to increase the trade of the country relatively to the interest of the Kingdom.

The Chamber of Commerce shall pay attention to prevent monopolies and enlighten the government on this head. The Council of State shall be considered sovereign in this matter.

The Council of State shall be privileged to impose a tax on provisions and merchandises, both foreign and domestic, if it observe that they are rated at too high a price.

No other money shall be current in the Colony except that of printed paper and of the same form as was in circulation there formerly, with this difference, that the notes (ordonnances) shall be stamped and signed not only by the Intendant, but also by the Governor-General and a Commissary or Comptroller appointed for that purpose.

The notes (ordonnances) shall be carried, as formerly, to the Treasury annually, before the departure of the ships, in order to be withdrawn by the Treasurer and replaced by bills of exchange at one or two terms in favor of those who shall bring them in.

A minute shall be drawn up of the notes (ordonnances) converted into bills of exchange, which shall be signed by the Intendant, Comptroller, Treasurer, and countersigned (visé) by the Governor-General; which minute shall be transmitted to Court.

The notes which will have been withdrawn shall be burnt and the minute of their numbers preserved, in order to be replaced under the same title, according as needs shall be.

All the fixed expenses shall be regulated by returns from the Court. Extraordinary or unforeseen expenses shall not be approved, if not clothed with the authority of the Council of State, unless they regard the Indians or Military department.

Although the military expenses be entirely referred to the prudence of the Governor-General, the Intendant and, under him, the principal clerks (officiers de plume) are authorized and obliged to take an exact and detailed knowledge thereof; not to oppose the plans which regard war and may be within his resort, but to instruct the Governor as to the prevarications he may overlook, and the Court on those the Governor would not perceive.

Goldsmiths shall be forbidden to melt gold or silver coin, and with this view, shall be obliged to render an account of the materials they will employ and of the work they will deliver.

As efforts should be made to give the most advantageous circulation to the paper money, it would be for the King's interest to withdraw from Canada the gold and silver coin which the English will possibly leave there; and to this end, as soon as there shall be in circulation sufficient paper money for daily trade, a Bank should be established which would convert gold and silver coin into bills of exchange payable at sight, with a moderate premium. This operation would prevent gold and silver coin depreciating the value of the notes, or passing by means of smugglers into foreign countries.

The Governor-General shall, the first year, order a Census to be taken of the inhabitants of the Colony in the towns and in the rural districts; a return of the acres of land under cultivation; their average annual produce; the quantity of horses and cattle, and on the knowledge he will acquire of the situation of the country in this regard, shall, in concert with the Council of State, form regulations for the increase of agriculture, population and cattle. He shall even be authorized to make advances, at the King's expense, to the poorer classes.

The troops being able, with very few exceptions, to meet, in time of peace, all the wants of the service, the farmers shall return to their farms in order to cultivate them, but those who will volunteer to be employed on the King's works and in voyages, shall be admitted and favored by the government.

As the inhabitants of the rural districts shall be no more diverted from their labors, they will be at liberty to devote themselves entirely to the cultivation of their lands and to the increase of their cattle. But the Canadian being naturally lazy and working precisely only to furnish himself with necessities, it would be proper to force him to reasonable labor by some impost which obliges him to draw from his land what may naturally be expected from it. This impost ought to be in provisions, and the best manner of levying it would be to oblige the farmers to feed a part of the soldiers whom the King will keep there. This plan will be explained hereafter.

Spruce beer being the natural drink of the country, molasses, which is necessary for its manufacture, shall pay only little or no impost duty. Wines and brandies shall pay seven or eight per cent. Merchandises of the greatest necessity shall be taxed five or six per cent, and those of luxury shall pay higher import duty in proportion to their uselessness.

Taverns in the towns and suburbs shall pay license.

The fees of verification (droit de controle) on all instruments (actes), also the mutation fines (droit de lods et ventes), shall be strictly levied.

Magazines of salt shall be established in the towns and principal forts. The King's ships shall import it from France, and it shall be sold for his profit, at a very low price, in order to encourage the Colonist to manufacture salt provisions, the trade in which would be very profitable to the country.

The King's ships shall also carry gunpowder, which shall be sold to the inhabitants at the same price as in France.

Experienced overseers shall be sent to Canada to work the Iron mines near Three Rivers, who shall furnish iron, shell and shot necessary for the artillery, and whatever will not eventually be consumed in the King's service, shall be sold to private persons.

Officers of the Regular troops, Commissaries or other persons in the King's service, shall not be permitted to pursue any trade of what nature soever it may be, directly or indirectly, by themselves, their wives, children or domestics; neither shall they be at liberty to enter into any speculation nor to furnish horses and carriages for the service, transports for voyages by sea, or on the lakes and River (St. Lawrence); nor to take charge of any improvements, furnish any merchandise or provisions, of what nature soever the same may be. This article must be strictly observed, as it is of great consequence. Officers and others in the King's service shall be at liberty only to improve farms, take tracts of land (concessions) and sell the produce thereof of every description.

'Twould be proper to attract foreign families to Canada without regard to religion; that Colony would be thereby augmented without damage to the Kingdom, and the small number of Protestants, whom that toleration would introduce there, would never be considerable enough to injure the religion of the ancient inhabitants; the odds are that most of those families would soon embrace the dominant religion. They might, however, be constrained to have their children baptized.

These families would be conveyed to Canada in the King's ships; lands would be granted them on arriving, and the Governor authorized to make them advances in cattle, implements, grain and subsistence, which advances will be repaid at a fixed time.

All grants formerly made to private individuals and not improved, shall be annulled at the end of three years, if said individuals have not placed any settlers on them, and the King shall be at liberty to grant the land to other persons.

The posts at which trade is carried on with the Indians, shall no longer be granted to individuals. Trade there shall be free to every one, and no fees shall be exacted from those who will send canoes thither.

Commandants of posts shall be relieved at least every two years; they shall not be at liberty to carry on any sort of trade thereat, either in merchandise or in furs. They shall receive only such presents as the Indians may make them; it being well understood that the King shall not be obliged to make them any other compensation, and that the Belts which the Indians will give shall belong to the King.

The garrisons of the forts shall be relieved every year, and the provisions necessary for the year, and the goods intended for the Indians, shall be sent thither at the same time. A clerk or commissary shall be appointed to convey them and he will be responsible for them.

The canoes that are to carry these provisions and merchandise shall be armed by the soldiers belonging to the new garrison, and if the number be insufficient, some others shall be detached who will return with the canoes. When navigation will be difficult, as it is for all distant posts, Militia will be detailed to pilot and instruct the soldiers.

The Governor-General shall adopt the best measures to save the King from purchasing at the posts, the goods necessary for Indian presents. He will regulate those presents, and as this department has been the source of very costly frauds, he shall take care to be informed by trustworthy agents, of the number of Indians who will visit the posts, and he shall be authorized to make gratuities to the commanders who will conduct themselves properly, and to punish, with the greatest rigor, those who shall have proved unfaithful.

He shall regulate the prices of goods at the posts, and take care that the commandants prevent monopoly at them.

He shall fix the places where trade will be carried on with the Indians, and shall reduce the number of the posts as much as possible, especially those more distant. It is sufficient to prevent the Indians trading with the English, and for that purpose he shall regard, as a principle, to procure for them the best and cheapest goods possible.

Could we possess, on this point, an advantage over the English, the Indians would be easily attracted with their packets to places less distant from the Colony.

Care should be taken to prevent Canadian and French vagabonds (libertins) being received among the Indians, because, once adopted by them, they are lost to the State.

The King having discharged what remained of the soldiers belonging to the troops of Canada, after the reduction of that country, it is impossible to reorganize those troops, which would be composed of new levies and consequently incapable of waging war. It appears indispensable to transfer to that Colony some Infantry regiments which shall remain in garrison there during three or four years. And as the officers of those regiments would be deprived of the privilege of visiting, from time to time, their families, from whom they derive their resources, it would be right that the King indemnify them by a more liberal pay. This will be stated by and by.

The finances would gain by this arrangement. The King would not be obliged to keep up a greater number of troops during the peace, and would, consequently, save the expense of those he keeps up in Canada. 'Tis true that when war would break out, 'twould be necessary to fill up this void by augmentations. But this would be less inconvenient than to confide the defence of a Colony to soldiers who have never been in the field.

Canada requires a small corps of artillery, composed of gunners, bombardiers, artificers and workmen. This corps cannot be less than two hundred men during the peace, and will be increased in time of war.

There shall be stationed in the Colony, one Chief-Engineer and 4 ordinary ones. The number will possibly be less when no more fortifications will be constructed.

It would be proper to form, in Canada, a troop of volunteer Chasseurs, commanded by Canadian officers conversant with the language of the Indians. This troop, destined for skirmishing (petite guerre), would serve in time of peace in collecting together the stragglers (libertins) who ordinarily give themselves up to the Indians, and would be employed in such services as correspond with its organization. It would suffice for it to number 150 men during peace; in war it might be easily increased to three or four hundred men; the people of the country being very well adapted for this service.

'Twould, besides, be necessary to keep up a corps of sailors there, who would serve in time of peace in lake and river transportation, and during the war, would man the ships destined to defend the entrance into the Colony. It could, in time of peace, be merely 150 or 200 men, who, having acquired the knowledge of the navigation of the country, would be officers of a crew during the war. The expense of their maintenance would be advantageously compensated by the continual and necessary transportation, the expense whereof they would save to the King.

The Militia of Canada are very good. That country possesses a much greater number of naturally brave men than other countries, from whom, when reduced to obedience, great advantage can be derived in war. The Canadian is an enemy to constraint, and inconstant, but very docile when he meets firmness and justice in his officers. He prefers skirmishing (la petite guerre) and is well adapted to it. Yet it will not be difficult to make him fight according to order when supported by Regulars, if his love of glory, which is natural to the inhabitants of Canada, be flattered.

In war time, 8,000 good Militia can be put under arms; but 'tis necessary that the levies be made with care and rigorously. There are no tricks and intrigues which good men will not employ to get the bad to march in their stead. In critical times the levy can be raised to 11 @ 12,000 men; and if population be attended to during peace, 'tis to be hoped that at the end of twenty years, the Militia will be one-third more numerous.

On the ordinary strength of the battalions in time of peace, 'twould be necessary that there should be constantly in Canada twelve battalions of old troops; this would give about six thousand men, which would be few were the Colony attacked before it had received any succors from France. 'Tis to be supposed, however, that before the entrance were closed on transports, time will be afforded to convey some new battalions thither, or at least the ordinary augmentation, which is 160 men per battalion; then, there would be 8,000 infantry, which, joined to the Militia, would suffice to preserve the country, when the lines of defence would be contracted, as proposed, it being understood that the Court will send a stronger force thither, if possible, and endeavor to repair the annual losses by risking small convoys, which will hardly ever be intercepted if dispatched towards the end of February.

'Twere desirable that among the twelve battalions there should always be two or three of German troops, the soldiers of which would be allowed to marry in the country after three years' service; this would be the means of augmenting the population without affecting that of the Kingdom injuriously. Besides, these battalions would be a decoy for the bushrangers and vagabonds of the English Colonies, where there are a great number of Germans.

If the capitulation of our German regiments, or the difficulty of recruits should prevent their conveyance to Canada, the French battalions which might go there, may be allowed to enlist into each company a certain number of Germans whom they would leave in the country.

Perhaps the condition of Canada, when it will return under the King's rule, will not allow of the twelve battalions being sent thither at once. It might be inconvenient to procure quarters and subsistence for the officers. In that case, 'twere well to send only eight or ten the first and second years, during which arrangements might be made for the reception of the rest.

'Twould be proper to allow each Captain a gratuity of 400<sup>li</sup> per annum, and each Lieutenant 250<sup>li</sup>; the superior officers in proportion.

As the soldier is to be victualled by the King or the farmer, 3 sous 6 deniers a day will be stopped from his pay; he will have 2 sous remaining.

The King will retain also the stock purse (la masse) and supply the clothing.

The soldier's ration in Canada cannot be less than 25 ounces of bread, 6 ounces of peas and 8 ounces of salt meat, or 12 ounces of fresh meat. The air of the country requires more food than that of France. This ration will cost at most 8<sup>s</sup>.

Foreign goods and provisions being dearer in Canada than in France, 'twould be proper that the King should grant officers the privilege of carrying gratis on board his ships as much as 25 tons per battalion. The same favor will be allowed as formerly to the Governor-General and Intendant; it may be extended to the staff of forts and to Commissaries; this would amount to 450 tons, which would be an inconsiderable object when divided among the ships the King will dispatch annually to Canada.

The troops will be permitted to leave in France one officer per regiment in the ports of the Kingdom to take charge of the correspondence, and make purchases and attend to commissions for the officers.

The soldier's clothing will be the same as in France, adding merely a blanket and jacket every two years, a pair of cloth gaiters, a pair of mittens and six pairs of shoes every year.

Hereafter outfits shall not be furnished soldiers going on any war expedition, nor to officers nor servants. The Militia who will serve shall receive only one pair of shoes per month, one pair of leggings and a braguet per campaign, a jacket and pair of leggings to those on duty in winter. The expense of outfits has always been very considerable and useless. One soldier has no need of two suits. Servants ought to be supported by their masters. In regard to Militiamen, they must be obliged to carry wherewith to clothe themselves during the campaign; the people of Canada are in sufficiently easy circumstances to dispense with this allowance, except an aid to the poorest sort, by way of a gratuity.

When the troops will be detached throughout distant forts or encamped in uninhabited frontiers, and, when on the march, the officer shall receive one ration for himself, similar to the soldiers, and one for his servant, it being well understood that such is to be given only to the effectives; in every other case, he shall support himself on his pay.

Artillery officers shall no longer possess the privilege of passage nor of powder (droit de voyage ni de poudre).

Persons who travel shall no longer be allowed certificates of their expenses to be paid on pretence of service; those who make bonâ fide journeys, in extraordinary cases, by order of the Governor-General, shall be indemnified for their disbursements by gratuities, and great attention shall be paid thereto.

As the Governors of Montreal and Three Rivers are useless in time of peace, and can be advantageously replaced in time of war by the superior officers of the battalions, 'twill be well to suppress those governments. Each of the three towns shall have only one King's Lieutenant, one Major and one Adjutant.

The posts of Major and Adjutant in these towns shall be given to active and intelligent officers, because they will have charge of the detail of the Militia under the King's Lieutenant and the Governor-General.

The latter shall be Inspector of the troops; there shall not, in future, be any Major-General Inspector Commandant of the troops—an improper office, which is expensive, embarrassing and good for nothing.

Recruits shall be furnished by the King and conveyed in his ships, according to the returns the Governor-General shall transmit at the close of autumn.

Each of the King's Lieutenants shall cause the Major to keep an exact roll of the Militia within his government between the ages of 18 and 50, wherein those who are married shall be designated, the whole to be divided into three classes—good, middling and bad.

The King's Lieutenants shall make, twice a year, the review of the Militia at the beginning and at the end of summer. The Governor-General shall be present at one of these reviews; each Militiaman shall be obliged to have a good musket, a powder-horn and a shot bag.

'Twill be necessary that the King should have conveyed to Canada 400 master and journeymen mechanics of all trades, especially for the forges and ship yards, who will be victualled at the King's expense during the first years, and not be employed except at public works.

'Twill be necessary to have tools of all sorts also sent out in sufficient quantity, and a supply of iron for the first year, until the forges can furnish some.

It is most important to have buildings erected for the artillery stores, as the air of Canada is very destructive, Timber being abundant, this expense will be trifling.

The provisions necessary for the subsistence of the troops cannot be expected to be found in Canada the first year; fifteen or twenty thousand barrels of flour and four or five thousand barrels of pork will have to be sent from France; this will not augment the expense.

We now proceed to enter upon the detail of the expenses that Canada will occasion the King during each year of peace, including what will have to be done there to place it in a state of defence.

The annexed table will show what salary is proposed to be given to the Governor-General, the Intendant, the Staff, Civil officers and those of justice. They ought to appear sufficient to every disinterested man who has a perfect knowledge of the country.

200,000<sup>l</sup>, which we propose for Indian presents, will be more than sufficient in the hands of an enlightened Governor who attends to the King's interests.

150,000<sup>l</sup> for extraordinary expenses will meet unforeseen items, gratuities for subjects who will distinguish themselves and any advances to be made to new settlers during the first years of the peace.

The Governor shall be obliged to render an exact account of these two items, and furnish thorough information thereof to the Intendant, who, however, will not be at liberty to refuse to discharge, in this regard, the Governor-General's orders.

200,000<sup>l</sup> for the expense of management and clerks ought to suffice, if the Intendant be economical and experienced, the rather as the ration, which we have estimated at 8 sous, will cost less, if the purchases be judiciously made, and the milling, curing and fattening be well managed. The Intendant shall be obliged to render an account to the Governor-General of this department as well as of all other details of finance.

Recruits will not cost the King anything, because he will find, from the non-completes and gratuities, a profit in pay and subsistence that will suffice for this item.

The Hospitals and Missions have endowments in Canada. If these are not sufficient for the support of the Clergy and the Nuns, for the attendance on sick soldiers, by giving up the price of the ration, and for the support of the Missionaries of the Colony, some pensions on the livings will supply any want without taxing the King.

It remains to enter into the detail of the expenses to be incurred for the fortifications, artillery, royal buildings, forges and ship building.

As the materials to be used in these different objects exist in the country, the expense cannot be better estimated than by calculating the workmanship.

People can work in Canada only from the 15th of May to the 15th of October. The cold, during the remainder of the year, is excessive.

During those five months the troops will be in camp in those places which are to be fortified; during winter they will be quartered on the farmers, except the garrisons for the towns and forts; these may be estimated at 1,500 men.

From the five working months must be deducted the Sundays and principal holidays, there remains 130 days.

12 battalions in camp will be able to furnish 2,500 workmen who will be paid at the rate of 12 sous each working day.

1,200 volunteer workmen can be drawn from the towns and country, who will be fed and receive 10 sous per day.

All these items are calculated in the annexed table.

The soldiers in camp will be fed, for five months in the year, at the King's expense. The 1,500 men in garrison also during the winter months. But the remainder will be fed at the farmers, on whom he will be quartered, and at the expense of said farmer, who, with trifling labor, will be able to derive from his farm wherewith to feed his lodger, the rather as those who will not lodge any men will contribute their share of the subsistence, according to the rolls which shall be drawn up for this purpose in each parish, and this sort of tax will be the only one that the Canadian will pay the King.

A number of horses, sufficient for the works of the fortifications and artillery, shall be purchased or hired on the King's account. About 300 will be required which can be found without any difficulty in a country where there are too many. This expense, and the other extraordinary disbursements for the works, have been estimated at 120,000<sup>li</sup>.

The King retaining 3 sous 6 den. a day from the soldier's pay, there have been properly deducted from the total of the expenses, 415,157<sup>li</sup>, since this sum will return into the extraordinaries of war, or be employed in the receipt of the Colonial treasurer. The annual expense will therefore be only 2,005,773<sup>li</sup>.

If we calculate what the King is to receive from the import duties on all liquors and dry goods, tavern licenses in the towns, from the registry, mutation fines, the sale of salt and powder, and from the grants of land, this sum will exceed 500,000<sup>li</sup>, and increase, annually, in proportion to the population. Thus, there will remain about 1,500,000<sup>li</sup> to be provided for each year for Canada, which sum will not begin to be paid, only the second year, at the maturity of the bills of exchange; a part of that sum even will return the first year in the country in paper money.

'Tis easy to see by the table that more than one-half of that sum will be employed in the fortifications and other works belonging to the King, and consequently will be no longer required when those will be completed.

If higher views determine the King to release his Canadian subjects from every species of import for some years, the farmers would then have to be paid for subsisting the soldiers who would be quartered on them, and this could not be less than 5 sous a day, which would amount to 255,000<sup>li</sup>, to be added to the above sum.

In regard to the duration of the works, it appears impossible to determine that at present; yet, we may promise ourselves that, in five or six years at most, the three frontiers will be in a state of defence, if care be taken that the 4,000 men destined for those works be well employed.

It is not pretended that the table of expenses is free from omissions, but such would be trifling.

The warlike stores, the guns and artillery furniture with which Canada must necessarily be provided, are not included in this estimate; neither the implements of every description, and cordage for the navy which must be sent thither until the Colony be able to furnish them. The article of artillery would be very considerable if the King were obliged to purchase it in one year. But we could, the very first year of the peace, begin to make this provision by dismantling those places in the Kingdom nearest the sea, which will be afterwards supplied at leisure. The expense, though heavy in itself, will, in this way, be light.

The estimate for this provision will be furnished, if necessary.

We shall not treat here of the profits which the King's finances and the State will derive indirectly from Canada in the way of trade. But 'tis to be presumed that if that Colony be well governed, it will amply indemnify for the 1,500,000<sup>li</sup> it will have cost during the first years of the peace.

Many things proposed in this Memoir may be objected to ; especially, by those who know little of Canada, or by those who have private interests there. Those objections might be answered in advance, but they would have swelled into a volume. The only object of this Memoir, which is already too long, is to fix the mind on the expense Canada would occasion and the means of governing it well. Nothing is put forth but what is established on solid reasons or experience.

In consequence of the indifference, incapacity or private interest of those who have almost at all times administered its affairs, the importance of Canada has never been presented before the eyes of the Court in a true point of view. Besides the loss of that beautiful and vast country, France has lost 70 @ 80 thousand inhabitants, the species of which is so much the more rare as there never has been a people so docile, so brave and so strongly attached to their Prince. The vexations they have suffered for several years, and particularly during the five immediately preceding the surrender of Quebec, without murmuring or daring to transmit their just complaints to the foot of the Throne, afford sufficient proofs of their docility. I have related to two striking instances in the Memoir I have addressed to the Minister in the month of March last, whereof this is merely an abstract.

The severe laws imposed on them were always justified and covered by the respectable cloak of the King's authority. Their love and submission for their Prince, made them sacrifice everything rather than wish to be suspected of the slightest disobedience to his Majesty's orders. This is so true, that not a single one made the slightest complaint, even when their grain, cattle, sheep, hogs, &c., were carried off, notwithstanding they were obliged to purchase for their support the same things at double what had been paid them.

'Tis to be feared that this bad treatment will have caused them to receive with too much readiness the mild regime of the English, the latter in their policy having neglected nothing to expedite the return of that comfort and liberty which they enjoyed before Sieur Bigot's advent into the Colony, nevertheless, I do not doubt but they would still prefer the domination of France, were they certain of finding the same advantages and same tranquility that they enjoyed up to 1750.

'Tis not for me, simply a private individual, to penetrate the wise views of the Ministry, but 'tis permitted me, as a good citizen, ardently to wish that the State do not ever lose sight of Canada. Events sufficiently propitious may intervene, as well from the constitution of the government of England, the aversion the Indians entertain towards the English, as through the friendship all the Nations feel for the French, to restore to the latter the possession of that country. In this idea, it were well to find means to prevent the extinction of that love which the inhabitants of the Colony may still feel in their hearts for the domination of France. These are the means I propose :

There is remaining in Canada a pretty considerable sum in notes, the circulating medium before its invasion. I calculate that  $\frac{4}{5}$ ths at least are in the hands of the farmers who are persuaded, for the English never cease to insinuate, that France will never pay them.

The King will have to determine the question of those notes by finding some means of withdrawing them. This means would serve as a pretext for sounding the farmers as to how they are disposed. But two or three persons, well known to them, must be found, for whom they entertained some respect, persons both of discretion and intelligence.

These would be invested with orders from his Majesty to pass, with the approval of the Court of London, to Canada to take up those notes and to conclude with the farmers such settlement as would be determined on; pretexting, apparently, some expenses of the Colony the amount whereof it is desirable to ignore in consequence of the want of order in the administration. The pretext will appear, unfortunately, sufficiently specious.

'Twould not be necessary to have the farmers brought into the towns; on the contrary, 'twould be better for the object of the operation, to go from parish to parish, in order to be more at liberty to converse with them, on pretence of unwillingness to divert them from their work.

Perhaps I shall be told that the proper persons for the execution of this project would be hard to find. I believe there are plenty sufficiently disinterested to abandon their personal interest in order to concur with that of the State, and the delicacy of whose mission is not liable to suspicion. But in that there could not be too much caution and discretion.

What I have stated above is the abstract of the Memoir I have furnished last March, the object of the amount of the notes then remaining in the hands of the farmers being more considerable, the pretext to retire them might be more specious; but the operation would not have produced such important effects as it might do now in regard to the open war which the Indians are waging against the English; besides, the latter having somewhat abandoned the lenity with which they treated the farmers from the time Quebec was surrendered until they were sure of the cession which France made to them, it will be easier to persuade the Canadians to shake off the yoke, especially when certain of being sustained by the Indians with whom they would reunite. I understand the Canadian; he is sometimes extravagant and enterprising; two wise heads are only required to excite among them that fermentation; the Indians even might be excited to pretend to force the Canadians to revolt; threatening to wage war against them the same as against the English. The latter would, then, have less reproach to make them if this project and that of the Missisipi should fail.

Should the fermentation commence whilst the persons charged with this mission would be in the Colony, and should the English suspect them, there is no doubt of their running some risks; but they can adopt some precaution to get clear by means of the Indians. Here is the way I shall manage :

I shall go, first, to Montreal to commence operations respecting the notes; I shall proceed at once to The Lake of The Two Mountains for pleasure; I shall not fail to meet Nepissings and Algonquins there, who have begun to bestir themselves in order to reunite the other Indians; I shall advise some chiefs of the object of my mission and dispose them to stand ready to facilitate my escape through the Upper country and conduct me to New Orleans.

I shall return from the Lake of The Two Mountains to Montreal without making any beginning; I shall have myself conveyed to the South shore to commence operations from parish to parish as far as Cap Moraska; return thence to Berthier<sup>1</sup> in order to cross over to St. Joachim and return by the North shore as far as St. Anne on the Island of Montreal, within 3 leagues of the Lake of the Two Mountains, the last parish, which would terminate my operation. And for more assured safety, under all circumstances, I believe it would be prudent for me to return by New Orleans.

M. de St. Ange to M. d'Abbadie.

Extract of the letter from M. de St. Ange, Commandant at the Illinois, to M. Dabbadie, 9th 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1764.

[ Inclosed in M. D'abbadie's letter of the 29th January, 1765. ]

The peace which the English reported to have made with the Indian Nations has not been so stable and general as they might suppose. One party only of what are called the Five Nations, had accepted the propositions, and through the lure of plunder had promised to escort all the detachments the English might turn out for Detroit. In fact, I did hear from Frenchmen and Indians that 500 men of that party had accompanied Mr Bradcheet, who commands 1,200 men and 300 Canadians as far as Detroit, where, after a conference with Pondiak, they had returned to their first resolution and assured that chief that they would do all in their power to persuade the English of their fidelity, so as to betray them at the proper time. I annex hereunto a letter that Commandant writes me, which will inform you nearly of the course he was to pursue. This letter has been handed me by some Indians sent express here.

Captain Maurice<sup>2</sup> has been arrested by Pondiak, who has sent me word that he should forward him to me this spring. This officer was bearer of Instructions which Pondiak has kept.

Mr Bradcheet has written me from Cedar Point,<sup>3</sup> near the Miamis river, 18 leagues from Detroit. I do not know what has become of him and his army; I have had no news of them since.

Pondiak, far from making the peace which that officer was instructed to negotiate with all the Nations, got angry and furious when 'twas proposed to him, and as a token of his never having had any such idea, sent at once, through all the Nations, a Belt at least 6 feet long and 4 inches wide, on which are marked all the Nations in his interest. He invites, first, all the Red men to help him, and next threatens them with his hatred and that of all his people, if they will not consent. He describes the English as the most cruel of enemies, with whom there is no guarantee for any conventions they might enter into as to what regards their country, and who would conceal their resentment until they would have an opportunity to satisfy it.

The Chaouanons, whom I have had the honor to announce to you in my letter of the 12th of August, have arrived here on the 27th of that month, to the number of 60, to demand of me their most urgent necessities, which I could not supply; in view of the circumstances and their dispositions to continue the war against the English, however, I could not refuse giving them something, so as not to drive them against us. I had the message explained to them which you convey to them, in answer to the one they had sent you. They appeared to me satisfied with it.

The chief of that Nation has decided on going to see you, to explain to you the wretched condition to which it is reduced, his resolution, his attachment to the French, and finally, its hope that they would relieve it. He goes down in this bateau with his wife.

You can appreciate, Sir, the embarrassment I labor under with those people, who were every day making demands on me which tended only to vast expense and are contrary to the King's intentions and the orders you have given me on this head. On the other hand, the fear of driving them against us, by rejecting all their demands; of their accusing the French of abandoning them entirely, and finally, that they should be driven to despair, has caused me to pass very uncomfortable moments. Their sojourn here has not failed to occasion heavy expense for their subsistence alone.

An Iroquois chief came here some twenty-five days ago. After having held such conversation as is usual among Indian Nations, he asked me for some assistance which I could not give him, having neither the right nor the ability to do so. He decided on going down with some hunters. It is twelve days since he left with a Frenchman who accompanied him from the Chouanons.

I cannot express to you, Sir, the uneasiness present circumstances give me; I should have to respond to all the Nations, and I am unable to do so. To speak to them of peace, that's all; nothing can afford them less satisfaction. There are at least fifty Red men here every day who must be fed, and who no longer recognizing but this post where they have a father, most frequently leave very much dissatisfied and afterwards return under the impression that they will meet with more favor.

This, Sir, is my present condition. Circumstances and your orders permit me only to talk to them of peace, which they will not listen to, and the total want I am in of goods puts it out of my power to give any mark of benevolence to these unfortunate people.

I have had the honor to request you, Sir, to have regard to my situation. If the English do not take possession of this country, in a short time, I shall be overpowered this spring by all Poudiak's partizans, who are increasing daily. So much for the Indians, &c.

Colonel Bradstreet to M. de St. Ange.

Sir,

I have been informed of the pains taken by M. de Neyon, before leaving the Illinois country, to remove all suspicion and to put a stop to false reports that were disseminated among the settlers and Indians dwelling there, which would tend only to render them unfortunate and are very disadvantageous to the English troops sent to take possession of that post.

I doubt not, Sir, that you have followed such a good example, and that you will afford all the protection in your power to Captain Morris, of the English troops, who will hand you this letter, to enable him to execute the orders he has received from me.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

M. de St. Ange to M. d'Abbadie.

Extract of a letter from M. de St. Ange, Commandant of the Illinois, to M. Dabbadie, of the 2nd X<sup>ber</sup>, 1764.

Since my last, which I had the honor to write you by M<sup>r</sup> Datchurrut's bateau, nothing new has transpired here. I have had no news of Pondiak nor from Detroit, where he continues to be. I am also ignorant of what has become of M<sup>r</sup> Bradstreet and his detachment, but I know that all the Nations continue their enterprise and that neither the English nor French could, by any means, turn them from their purpose. Their principal object at present is, to have their Father back. In fine, Sir, there is always some one of these poor wretches on the King's bounty, and who announce to me the visit of their people this spring.

All the Lake and most distant Nations have sent to tell me the same thing, and knowing them to be in want of everything, I doubt not that they will keep their word, and with so much the more reason, as they are almost all wintering at the Illinois river and at that of St. Jerome.<sup>1</sup> Being, thus, near here, their first movement this spring will be to come hither.

Their ordinary harangues are, to see their Father, and to be assured that the English will never come here.

Conference between M. d'Abbadie and the Indians.

Speech of the Chouanon Indian Charlot Kaské to M. Dabbadie.

I come from a great distance ; the Master of Life has vouchsafed my coming here and my heart is pleased with beholding you. Though I have no retinue, I am no less a man of influence of the Chouanon Nation, deputed by the Grand Chief to visit and to talk with you. Here's a Belt of five rows which he has instructed me to present to you ; it contains the names of 47 villages who are willing to die in alliance with the French, defending their lands to the last drop of their blood. They hope that you will succor them and never abandon them. I came here formerly ; all the world appeared gay and happy ; now, everything is sad. I see a great many people whom I do not know ; I am sad myself, yet, since I behold you my heart is content, and my eyes are getting clear. I shall tell my Nation how I saw you and how you received me.

Father, I ask you to relieve your children, the Chouanons, who have always held the French by the hand. Our warriors, our old men, our women and our children are sad at not seeing the French any more among us. The English are coming there and saying, that the land is theirs and that it is the French who have sold it to them. You know well that our fathers have always told us that the land was ours, that we were free on it, that the French did come to settle there only for our protection and defence, as a good father protects and defends his children. You placed the tomahawk in our hands to strike the English, which we did; we will keep it eternally, and we will repeat unceasingly to our children, that they must retain it also for the defence of their land.

I am deputed by all the chiefs to demand aid from you to continue the war, and to know from you what you wish us to do. We have adopted you as our Father and will never hearken save to your word. Send us traders; we shall pay them well; we are rich in furs; our women and children are all naked since the French have ceased coming to trade with our Nation. If the French do not abandon us, the English will never take our lands, and if we behold the French among us, our hearts will be glad.

M. d'Abbadie's Answer.

M. de St. Ange,<sup>1</sup> your Father, has advised me of your visit. The chiefs who are here and know you, have long ago told me who you are. I thank the Great Spirit for having conducted you to your Father. He receives you as a dear child and will provide for your wants. What you tell me of the Chaowanons and other Nations who wish to die attached to the French, affects my heart. But if they are sad because they will behold the French no more, the French and your Father are sad also, at seeing the earth always stained with the blood of the Red and of the White man.

Has not M. de Neyon,<sup>2</sup> your Father, announced to you, on the part of the Great Chief, that the Great Emperors of France and of England had made peace? That by this arrangement the English and French were friends and that the Red men, who are partisans of the one and the other, should look on each other as brothers? Why, children, do you continue the war? And what will it avail you thus to redden the earth with your blood? It is repugnant to Nature and the Great Spirit forbids it. When Nations make peace, they forget whatever was done during the war and bury their hatchets. If the French retire to their lands, you are free on yours, and wherever the French chiefs and their warriors will be, they will always <sup>1</sup> Captain LOUIS ST. ANGE DE BELRIVE was a veteran officer. He commanded the escort which accompanied Father Charlevoix, the celebrated historian and traveler, through the country in 1721, and distinguished himself against the Outagamis in 1728. He was one of the principal officers in Louisiana in 1730; succeeded Nyon de Villiers in June, 1764, in the command of Fort Chartres, which he surrendered to the English on the 14th October, 1765, and retired to St. Louis. It is said, however, that he afterwards returned and resumed the command at Fort Chartres for a brief period. He was on the Mississippi as late as 1772. Charlevoix, Journal Historique; Lettre XXVII; Goyarré, I, 440; II, 114; Monette, I, 411; Johnson to Dartmouth, 4th November, 1772.

<sup>2</sup> NYON DE VILLIERS was the youngest of seven brothers, six of whom, 'tis said, lost their lives in the wars in Canada. He succeeded Captain Macarty in the command of Fort Chartres, which he held until the 15th of June, 1764, when he received the Cross of St. Louis as a reward for his fidelity and services. M. Gayarré confounds him with his brother, Coulon-Villiers, called the Great Villiers, to whom Washington surrendered in 1764. History of Louisiana, II, 100, 110, 114; Bossu's Travel, I, 185. — Ed.

bear you in their hearts, and with pleasure provide for your wants through their traders. You know that they are settled on the right bank of the Great River Mississippi, but the powder and ball they will carry you are to be used only in hunting, so as to feed and clothe your old men, yourselves, your women and children. Give up, then, waging war, my children, and reject, as evil counsel, whatever is told you of the English. Peace will bring back plenty to your villages, and the English themselves will hasten with goods to supply your wants.

Attend well to this word Charlot Kaské; let it have weight among the Nations and assure them that the Great Emperors of France and England have made peace only for the happiness of the Red men and of the Whites.

Surrender of Fort Chartres to the English.

LOUISIANNA.

Minute of the Surrender of Fort Chartre to M. Sterling, appointed by M. Degage, Governor of New-York, Commander of His Britannic Majesty's troops in America.

This day, the tenth of October, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-five, we, Louis Saint Ange de Belrive, Captain of Infantry, Commandant for his Most Christian Majesty at the said Fort Chartre, and Joseph Lefebvre, King's storekeeper and acting Commissary at said fort, pursuant to orders we have received from Mess<sup>rs</sup> Aubry, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of Saint Louis, Commander of the Province of Louisiana and Foucault,<sup>2</sup> Commissary Controller of the Marine, Ordonnateur in the said Province, surrender said Fort Chartre to M<sup>r</sup> Sterling,<sup>3</sup> deputed by M<sup>r</sup> Degage, Governor of New-York and Commander-in-Chief of His Britannic Majesty's troops in America and in all the left portion of the Province of Louisiana, according to the Seventeenth Article of the definitive Treaty of Peace concluded at Versailles

<sup>1</sup> M. D'ABBADIE succeeded M. de Kerlerec (supra, p. 281) in the government of Louisiana, or of so much of it as remained to the French after the peace of 1763, and arrived, on the 29th of June, of that year, at New Orleans where the King kept a factory, of which M. d'Abbadie was commissioned Director-General, with the powers of a Military commandant. In 1764 he received orders to surrender the country to Spain; he was profoundly distressed by the duty he was instructed to perform, and the grief which it occasioned caused the death of this worthy man on the 4th of February, 1765. He was a disinterested ruler, just towards all, and inflexibly firm in causing the laws to be respected; he severely repressed the excesses of masters towards their slaves, and protected the Indians from every kind of repression. By his example, he caused religion and morality to be honored, and left a memory dear to all the Louisianians. French's Historical Memoirs of Louisiana, V., 142; (Gayarré's Louisiana French Domination), IL, 96-116. M. d'Abbadie was succeeded by Captain Aubry (supra, p. 901).

<sup>2</sup> Mr. FOUCAULT succeeded M. Rochemore as Intendant of Louisiana, where he arrived in June, 1761, and was appointed Comptroller on the 10th February, 1763. He was the very personification of treachery. In 1768 he was one of the principal conspirators against the Spanish Governor, Ulloa. He had always kept up a scandalous connection with a widow Pradel, and at her house it was supposed that conspiracy was concocted. He afterwards turned informer against his colleagues, but was arrested by order of Governor O'Reilly, in August, 1769, deprived of his office and sent a prisoner to France 14th of October following, where he was thrown, on his arrival, into the Bastille. He was a conceited and narrow minded man, and cheated a host of people in Louisiana. Gayarré's History of Louisiana, IL, 88, 91, 92, 186, 232, 273, 306, 307, 310. — Ed.

A Declaration addressed in the name of the King of France to all the ancient French of North America.

The undersigned, authorized by his Majesty, and thereby clothed with the noblest title, with that which effaces all others, charged in the name of the Father of his country, and the beneficent protector of his subjects, to offer a support to those who were born to enjoy the blessings of his government—

To all his Countrymen in North America :

You were born French; you never could cease to be French. A war, which was declared against us only by seizing nearly all our seamen, and the principal advantages of which our common enemies entirely owed to the courage, the talents and the numbers of the brave Americans, who are now fighting against them, has wrested from you that which is most dear to all men; even the name of your country. To compel you, in spite of yourselves, to bear the arms of parricides against it, must complete the measure of misfortune: with this you are now threatened: a new war may justly make you dread being obliged to submit to this most intolerable law of slavery. It has commenced, like the last, by depredations upon the most valuable part of our trade. Too long already have a great number of unfortunate Frenchmen been confined in American prisons. You hear their groans. The present war was declared by a Message in March last, from the King of Great Britain to both Houses of Parliament, the most authentic act of the British Sovereignty, announcing to all orders of the State, that to trade [with America] though without excluding others from the same right was an offence; that frankly to avow such intention, was to defy this Sovereignty ; that she should revenge it, and deferred this only to a more advantageous opportunity, when she might do it with more appearance of legality than in the last war ; for she declared that she had the right, the will, and the ability to revenge, and accordingly demanded of Parliament the supplies.

The calamities of a war thus proclaimed, have been restrained and retarded as much as was possible, by a monarch whose pacific and disinterested views now reclaim the marks of your former attachment, only for your own happiness. Constrained to repel force by force, and multiplied hostilities by reprisals which he has at last authorized, if necessity should carry his arms, or those of his allies, into a country always dear to him, you have not to fear either burnings or devastations : and if gratitude, if the view of a Flag always revered by those who have followed it, should recall to the banners of France, or of the United States, the Indians who loved us, and have been loaded with presents by him whom they also call their father ; never, no never shall they employ against you their too cruel methods of war. These they shall renounce, or they will cease to be our friends.

It will not be by menaces against our countrymen that we shall endeavor to avoid combating them ; nor shall we weaken this Declaration by invectives against a great and brave nation, which we know how to respect, and hope to vanquish.

As a French gentleman, I need not mention to those among you who were born such, like myself, that there is but one august House in the universe under which the Frenchman can be happy, and serve with pleasure ; since its head, and those who are nearly allied to him by blood, have been at all times, through a long line of Monarchs, and are at this day more than ever delighted with bearing that very title which Henry IV. regarded as the first of his own. I shall not excite any regrets for those qualifications, those marks of distinction, those decorations, which, in our manner of thinking are precious treasures, but from which, by our common misfortunes, the French Americans, who have known so well how to deserve them, are now precluded. These, I am bold to hope and to promise, their zeal will soon make them recover. They will merit them, when they dare to become the friends of our allies.

I shall not ask the companions in arms of the Marquis de Levi, those who shared his glory, who admired his talents and military tact, who have cherished his cordiality and frankness, the principal characteristics of our Noblesse, whether there be other names in other nations, among which they would be better pleased to place their own. Can the Canadians who saw the brave Montcalm fall in their defence, can they become the enemies of his nephews ? Can they fight against their former leaders, and arm themselves against their kinsmen, at the bare mention of whose names, the weapons would fall from their hands ?

I shall not observe to the Ministers of the altars that their evangelic efforts will require a special protection of Providence to prevent the faith being diminished by example ; to prevent worldly interest getting the better, and the political indulgence of Sovereigns, whom force has imposed upon them, becoming less proportionably as those Sovereigns shall have less to fear ; that it is necessary for religion, that those who preach it should form a body in the State ; and in Canada, that no other body would be more considered, or have more power to do good than that of the Priests taking a part in the government, because their respectable conduct has merited the confidence of the people.

I shall not represent to that people, nor to all my countrymen in general, that a vast monarchy having the same religion, the same manners, the same language, where they find kinsmen, old friends and brethren, must be an inexhaustible source of commerce and wealth, more easily acquired and better secured, by a reunion with powerful neighbors, than with strangers of another hemisphere, among whom everything is different, and who, being jealous and despotic Sovereigns, will, sooner or later, treat them as a conquered people, and doubtless much worse than they treated their late countrymen [the Americans] who made those Sovereigns victorious. I shall not urge, to a whole people, that to join with the United States is to secure their own happiness; for, a whole people, when they acquire the right of thinking and acting for themselves, must know their own interest; but I will declare, and I now do formally declare in the name of his Majesty, who has authorized and so commanded me, that all his former subjects in North America, who will not acknowledge, any longer, the supremacy of Great Britain may depend upon his protection and support.

<sup>1</sup> CHARLES HECTOR, Count d'ESTAING, was born at the Chateau of Ruvel, in Auvergne, in 1729. He commenced the military career as Colonel of an Infantry regiment; soon became Brigadier; served as such in India under Count Lally and was taken prisoner at the siege of Madras in 1759. He was released on parole which he afterwards broke; was a second time taken and then sent to England where he was thrown into prison at Portsmouth. He finally returned home vowing eternal hatred to everything English. At the peace of 1763 he was promoted to be Lieutenant-General of the navy and to be Vice-Admiral in 1778, when he was sent, with twelve ships of the Line, to aid the cause of American Independence. He made an attack on Savannah in October, 1779, and afterward reduced the Islands of St. Vincent and Grenada, and defeated Admiral Byron. He returned to France in 1780, and continued to serve until the peace of 1783, when he was at the head of the combined fleets of France and Spain. In the course of the French revolution he took sides with the movement; was appointed Commandant of the National guard of Versailles, where he connived at the outrages committed at the Palace by the populace on the 5th and 6th of October, 1789, on which occasion he seemed to have lost that daring spirit which he had formerly evinced. He next removed to Paris and enrolled himself as a private in the National guard of that city. He soon became suspected and was thrown into the prison of St. Pelagie. He was afterwards called on to testify against the unfortunate Marie Antoinette, but though the Queen had been his political opponent, he had too high a sense of honor to tell anything but the truth, and spoke only of her heroism and her noble resolution, expressed in his presence, to die with her husband. He was dragged, himself, soon after, before the Revolutionary tribunal and guillotined 28th April, 1794, at the age of 65 years. He met his fate with his characteristic bravery. Biographie Universelle; Alison's History of Europe (Harpers' ed.), I, 86, 222. — Ebn.
